

GEORGE R.

GEORGE the Second, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. to all to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting: Whereas Edward Symon, Thomas Osborne, John Wood, and James Crockatt, of Our City of London, Booksellers, have by their Petition humbly represented unto Us, that they have spent many Tears, and expended several thousand Pounds in procuring, buying of Books, and employing a Number of learned Gentlemen in the compiling, writing, and publishing, AN UNIVERSAL HISTORY, FROM THE EARLIEST ACCOUNT OF TIME TO THE PRESENT; collected from the best Authors both Ancient and Modern; in drawing of Maps, making Chronological and other Tables, for the better illustrating the same, to be comprised in Eight Volumes in Folio; a Work hitherto attempted in vain by other Nations; which the Petitioners, with the utmost Submission, apprehend may be of great Service to the Publick, as it will be reducing a very extensive but very useful Science to a regular System or Digest, at an easy Rate to the Purchaser, and thereby much encourage and promote a necessary Branch of Learning: And as this Undertaking is near finished, they are desirous of reaping the Fruits of their Labour, and of enjoying the full Profit and Benefit that may arise from Printing, Publishing and Vending the same, without any other Person interfering in their just Property; which they cannot prevent without applying to Us for Our Royal Licence and Protection: Therefore they have humbly prayed Us to grant them Our Royal Licence and Protection for the sole Printing, Publishing and Vending the said Work, in as ample Manner and Form as has been done in Cases of the same Nature. We being willing to give all due Encouragement to such a useful Work, are graciously pleased to condescend to their Request: And do therefore by these Presents, so far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Behalf made and provided, grant unto the said Edward Symon, Thomas Osborne, John Wood, and James Crockatt, their Executors, Administrators, and Assigns, Our Royal Privilege and Licence for the sole Printing, Publishing and Vending the said Work for and during the Term of Fourteen Years to be computed from the Date hereof; strictly forbidding and prohibiting all Our Subjects within Our Kingdoms and Dominions to Reprint or ABRIDGE the same, either in the like, or any other Volume or Volumes whatsoever, or to import, buy, vend, utter, or distribute any Copies thereof reprinted beyond the Seas, during the aforesaid Term of Fourteen Years, without the Consent or Approbation of the said Edward Symon, Thomas Osborne, John Wood, and James Crockatt, their Heirs, Executors, Administrators, and Assigns, under their Hands and Seals first had and obtained, as they and every of them offending therein will answer the contrary at their Peril. Whereof the Commissioners, and other Officers of Our Customs, the Master, Wardens, and Company of Stationers, of Our City of London, and all other Our Officers and Ministers, whom it may concern, are to take Notice, that due Obedience be given to Our Pleasure herein signified.

Given at Our Court at St. James's, the 24th Day of March 1738-9, in the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

By His MAJESTY's Command.

Holles Newcastle.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

TO THE HONORABLE
MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th inst.

relative to the proposed amendment to the bill for the relief of the estate of the late John D. Rockefeller, deceased.

The bill is now pending in the Senate, and it is my duty to report thereon to the Senate.

I am, Sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. M. McKIM

Very truly yours,
J. M. McKIM

Enclosed for the House of Representatives is a copy of the bill for the relief of the estate of the late John D. Rockefeller, deceased.

I am, Sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,

Very truly yours,
J. M. McKIM

TO THE
WILLIAM
LORD TALBOT,
BARON of HENSOL.

My LORD,

WE presume to lay before Your Lordship the Fourth Volume of the Universal History; a Work which has hitherto received a favourable Applause, and is at present read by most Nations of Europe in their several Dialects, and by the Learned of all Nations in that Language which is peculiar to Men of Letters. The Names of the Noble Personages who have given Countenance and Protection to the foregoing Volumes, have, no doubt, greatly contributed to the uncommon Approbation they have met with, and heightened their Reputation among our own Countrymen, as well as Foreigners. That this Volume might, at its first Appearance in the World, be attended with the same Advantages as the former, is the Motive that has induced us to take the Liberty of inscribing it to Your Lordship: For who can be so little conversant in the Histories of the present and past Ages, as not to be greatly influenced in favour of a Performance, which displays the Illustrious Name of TALBOT? The Name of a Family from which your Lordship is lineally derived, near as ancient as our Monarchy, and ever revered by this Nation, as it has eminently adorned the highest Offices both in Church and State : For whoever turns over the English Annals, must find the TALBOTS exerting their great Talents for the Service of their Country, Commanding Armies in the Field, Presiding in the Senate, or at the Head of a glorious Administration. And here, my Lord, we must ask Pardon for reviving Your's and the Kingdom's deplorable Loss, when we reflect upon that Great and Good Man Your Father, who, to his immortal Honour, was the Darling of the present, as he will be the Admiration of all future Times. My Lord, a Subject so copious as the CHARACTER of the last Lord Chancellor, we are sensible, cannot be confined to the narrow Limits of a Dedication ; and we shall the rather decline it, because we hope to see THAT become one of the most amiable Parts of some future Volume : Besides, my Lord, as You are universally allowed to inherit his extraordinary Virtues, we will not dare to offend that remarkable Modesty, which, with his other valuable Qualities, hath descended to Your Lordship. Therefore we shall not presume further, but only, with Your Lordship's Permission, to acquaint the World, that the sole Aim of this Address is to pay a Reverence to such exalted Merit, and to have the Honour of declaring ourselves to be, with the utmost Duty and Respect,

My LORD,

Your LORDSHIP's most Obedient, and Devoted Humble Servants,

CHAP. XI.

The History of the Jews from their return from the Babylonish captivity to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian, with an account of their dispersion and condition to this present time.

THIS chapter, long and extensive as it is, it containing an epocha of five hundred and thirty-six years from their return into Judæa to the birth of Christ, and seventy-three more from that time to the destruction of Jerusalem, and total dispersion of the Jewish nation, may be conveniently enough divided into seven sections or eras, according to the following chronological order.

THE account of their dispersion and condition to this present time we shall give in an appendix.

BUT before we pass to the first section, it will be convenient to premise some few things concerning the state of the Jews during this new epoch; for from this time they are no more to be looked upon as that free, rich and glorious people, which they had before.

had been, either under their former theocracy, as Josephus rightly terms it ^a, or under their opulent and warlike monarchs, and the direction of their prophets. Their condition, government, manners, their very name, and every thing but their religion, is now intirely changed ! And indeed, it could hardly be expected otherwise, when we consider that those that had been carried away into Babylon, were sold for slaves, and dispersed far and wide through that vast empire, according to the custom of those conquerors ; and though some of them we find to have attained to very considerable posts ^b, or grown exceeding rich in the land of their captivity, yet these are but few in comparison of those who groaned under the heavy hand of their oppressors ^c. Neither was it the former, but the latter, that is, the poorer sort, that came back into Judæa ; and even of these, the whole amount of all that came, either with Zerubbabel, Ezra, or Nebemiab, did scarcely come up to seventy thousand ; among whom a multitude of strangers was likewise intermixed, either by marriages, or otherwise, most of them so indigent, that they were forced to be supported in their journey by the charitable contributions of those that stayed behind.

THEY were indeed to be governed by their own laws ; but as they still continued in subjection to other nations, to the Persians, Egyptians, Syrians and Romans, that privilege, as well as the exercise of their religion, did very much depend on the arbitrary will of their conquerors, and was often curtailed, and sometimes wholly taken away. Even whilst they were under the Persians, the lives and estates of the whole nation were on the brink of being sacrificed to the ambition of a favourite Haman, had not Esther's interest miraculously prevented the execution of that bloody edict ^d ; and so weak did they continue under them, that they were a long time exposed to the injuries of even the neighbouring Samaritans. They seem however to have recovered themselves by degrees, and to have lived in more peace and plenty during the two following centuries ; and that is perhaps the reason of that vast chasm of near two hundred and fifty years in their history, between the death of Nebemiab, and the times of the Maccabees, when those glorious heroes not only shook off the foreign yoke, but raised the glory of their nation by their victories and conquests, and by obliging other nations to embrace the Jewish religion. But this epocha was but short-lived, and eighty years were hardly expired, before the ungovernable ambition of some of their unworthy successors introduced a general apostasy, and brought them under such subjection to the Romans, as they could never more shake off. Herod indeed, whom these raised to the royal dignity, did greatly increase the glory and opulence of the Jewish nation ; but as he was an Idumean, who had gained the crown by the destruction of the Asmonean race, as he was a vassal to the Romans, and a tyrant of the Jews, they could neither be said to be free or happy during his hateful reign, much less under those of his successors, when the government of Judæa was split into so many toparchies ; so that the nation went from thenceforward from bad to worse, till their total destruction. We observed that they were changed in their very name ; that of Israelites was quite lost, as well as those of all the other tribes, which were absorbed into that of Judab. So that from their return they were chiefly known by the name of Jews, in opposition to the Samaritans, who were a mongrel mixture, partly of the ten tribes, partly of revolted Jews, and of other nations, as the sequel will soon shew. Religion was the only thing that received the least change since their re-establishment, and if we except some apostasies occasioned by persecutions, or the ambition of some of their high-priests, we shall find them in the sequel more averse to idolatry, and all heathenish superstitions, than ever their fore-fathers had been prone to them before the captivity ; such strict observers of the sabbath, as to suffer themselves to be murdered by whole armies, rather than violate it by standing on their defence ; in a word, so zealous for their religion, and such strict observers of their oaths, whether of allegiance or confederacy, as to suffer the most bloody persecutions, and horrid butcheries, with utmost courage and constancy, rather than to violate their laws or fidelity. This is indeed a virtue, which, as Josephus rightly observes, was peculiar to the Jews ^e, and which no other nation or religion could ever lay any claim to, till the sufferings, number, and constancy of the christian martyrs, did in a great measure eclipse the glory of the Jewish ones. We have already seen several instances of these last in a former volume, but shall find them still more frequent in this sequel of their history.

The history of the Jews from their return out of Babylon to their being governed by their high-priests, where the canonical books end.

- ^a AS soon as the seventy years captivity pronounced by Jeremiah against this rebellious people ² were fully accomplished (A), God was pleased to raise up the great Cyrus to the throne; who upon the very first year of his reign, issued out that decree in favour of them, of which an account has been given in a former volume ³. By this edict they were not only permitted to return to their own land, which that prince had doubtless beheld in some late expedition, lying desolate and barren, though naturally fertile (B); but also to rebuild their temple at Jerusalem, renew the divine worship, and transport thither all the sacred utensils which Nebuchadnezzar had brought away from thence. These last he ordered to be delivered by Mithridath, his high treasurer, to Seshbazzar, whom we take to be the same with Zerubbabel (C), who, being the grandson of Jeboiakim, or Jeconiab, king of Judah, was then the

(A) These seventy years are differently computed; some begin them from the fourth of Jeboiakim, when the first Jewish captives were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar (1), and end them at the first issuing of Cyrus's decree. Others from the words of Zechariah (2) place the beginning of it at the destruction of Jerusalem, and its conclusion at the publication of Darius's decree for the building of the temple, and restoring liberty to the Jews.

Both computations may be justly maintained, and may have even been designed by Jeremiah, since between either of the two epochs there are just seventy years, and the latter begins and ends just eighteen years after the former.

For as the captivity which began in the fourth of Jeboiakim, could not be said to be completed till the total destruction of the city, and Jewish monarchy; so neither could their deliverance, begun at the first decree of Cyrus, be said to be completed till the fourth year of Darius, which confirmed and put it in full vigour and execution.

We may still reckon a third method or stage of computing these seventy years, which answers in the same exactness with the two former; namely, from the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, when Nebuzaradan carried off all the remainder of the conquered Jews; at which time the captivity was completed to all intents; and the full restoration of their temple worship, at the solemn dedication of the new temple, and their celebrating the first passover immediately after it in the seventh year of Darius's reign; when, and not till then, was fully completed the end of their thralldom, and the Jewish religion restored to its ancient splendour and regularity. All these the reader may see fully demonstrated by the learned Prideaux in the place last quoted.

However the words of the prophecy before us, we own, seem to fix the epocha according to the first of these stages; though those of Zechariah do more plainly belong to the last, as will be shewn in its due time.

(B) We have shewn in a former volume †, that the Jews were obliged by the Mosaic law to let their lands lie fallow every seventh year (4); but this had been neglected for a considerable time; for which God caused it to lie desolate and uncultivated, till it had recovered that full respite, of which that rebellious nation had deprived it (5).

It therefore we reckon the whole seventy sabbatic years to be here implied, it will follow, that the omission of this law began even before the time of David, or even of Samuel; but it is scarce credible, that it should have been suffered under the government of two such pious persons; whereas, if we date the desolation of the land from the murder of Gedaliah, at which time those few Jews that were left there fled into Egypt; to this first year of Cyrus, the number of sabbatic years will be just fifty-two, and will carry us back three hundred and sixty-four years, that is, to about the beginning of Abra's reign, from which time the people began to be very remiss in this and many other particulars of the Mosaic law (6).

(C) It is likely, that the first was his Babylonish name (7), it being customary for those conquerors to change the names of their captives, as we find they did those of some of the later kings of Judah (8), as well as those of Daniel and his three companions (9). As to the title of Tirshatha, or Hatirshatha, though some derive it from the Chaldee, חַתִּיר שְׂרָתָא dispenser potus, or a cup-bearer, such as Nehemiah seems to have been to Artaxerxes; yet it is most likely, that the word implied some high dignity, such as a governor, lord lieutenant, a deputy, and the like; for such was here our Seshbazzar or Zerubbabel.

The vessels that were delivered to him by the king's order, were, according to Ezra (10), thirty chargers of gold, a thousand chargers of silver, thirty batons of gold, four hundred and ten of silver, twenty-nine knives, besides many others, amounting in all to five hundred and forty; but these were not all that had been carried out of Jerusalem; the rest were afterwards brought thither by Nehemiah.

first prince of the royal blood, and was therefore appointed head governor of Judæa,^a under the title of Tirshata^b. He likewise gave directions concerning the dimensions of the temple, which was to be sixty cubits in height and breadth, built upon a strong foundation, with three rows of great stones, and a row of timber; the expence of the whole to be furnished out of the king's house^c; to all these the king added a full permission to all the Jews that were so disposed to return into Judæa, and to those who preferred staying behind, free liberty to contribute, as liberally as they pleased, gold, silver, or any other precious stuffs, towards the building and adorning that sacred edifice, and the renewing and carrying on the worship of God there^d.

IMMEDIATELY upon the publishing of this edict, the chiefs of the tribes of Judab and Benjamin, together with the priests and Levites, assembled themselves; and as many^b as retained still a love for their country, and a zeal for the God of Israel, disposed themselves to return to that once happy land. As for the rest, which were the far greater number, who preferred the land of Babylon to it, they contented themselves with furnishing their returning brethren with gold, silver, cattle, and other conveniences, either for their journey, or for the building of the temple and city. At the head of these were Zerubbabel mentioned above, and Jesua, the high-priest (D). The next in rank were Nebemias and Mordecai (E), Serajab, Reelajab, Bilsham, Mispar, Bigvai, Rebum, and Baanab, who were all heads of families, and assistants to Zerubbabel in the re-establishment of the Jewish affairs both in church and state^c. The rest amounted to about forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, including those that came afterwards with Nebemias, besides their servants and slaves of both sexes, which were in all seven thousand three hundred and thirty-seven^d. Neither were they all of the tribes of Levi, Judab, and Benjamin, though from that time they were all blended together under the name of Jebudim, or Jews; for many of those of the other ten tribes, which had been formerly carried away by Tiglath-pilezer, Shalmanezzer, and Ezra-baddon, and had still preserved the true worship of God, took the advantage of the king's edict to return into the land of their forefathers. To these we may add a great number, who had formerly gone from the idolatrous ten tribes to put themselves under the protection of the kings of Judab; and this may be the reason why the whole number of those mentioned in Ezra's list, amounts but to twenty-nine thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and to thirty-one thousand and thirty-one in that of Nebemias; whereas both these historians make the sum total to be forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty; so that the overplus seems to be added from those of the other ten tribes which returned with those of Judab and Benjamin (F). We find likewise mention made of two hundred men and women singers, whom they brought with them, four hundred and thirty-five camels, seven hundred and thirty-six horses, two hundred and forty-five mules, and six thousand seven hundred asses^e.

ONE may see by this list, how small the number was of those who returned, in comparison of those who stayed behind; neither must we be much surprized at it;

(D) This office belonged to him by a lineal descent, he being the son of Jozadach (11), whose father Seraiah, high-priest at the taking of Jerusalem, had been put to death at Riblah (12). As for Jozadach, he was carried captive into Babylon, and had been dead some time before the publishing of this decree, so that Jesua was then the head of the pontifical family.

(E) Some think these two to be the same with those so often mentioned in the books of Esdras and Nehemiah, and that finding the work of the temple obstructed by their enemies, they returned again to Shushan (13); but it is generally believed, that they were quite different persons of the same name (14).

As for the other seven, the Jewish writers affirm them to have been the chiefs of the Jewish synagogue, or grand council of the Jews, which they say did sit at Jerusalem after their return from Babylon. We shall have occasion to speak more largely of this synagogue in the sequel of this chapter.

(F) Accordingly we find the decree of Cyrus's, and afterwards that of Artaxerxes, extended not to those two tribes only, but to all the people of the God of Israel, and to all those that worshipped God at Jerusalem, which could not but include all the other ten (16).

In consequence of which Ezra concludes the chapter in which the above-mentioned list is, with these remarkable words; So the priests, levites, people, singers, porters, and nethinims, dwelt in their cities, and all Israel in their cities. And when he speaks of the expiatory sacrifices which were offered at Jerusalem, he mentions expressly twelve he-goats according to the twelve tribes of Israel (17).

a for if even their forefathers, who were brought with so many wonders out of the furnace of Egypt were almost continually plotting to return thither, what could be expected from their sordid offspring, but that the far greater part of them would prefer the place of their captivity, where they were possessed of lands, houses, and money, to that of Palestine, which had lain so long desolate? And accordingly the Jews themselves tell us ¹, that only the bran came out of Babylon, but that the flour staid behind; even of the priests, who, as we observed in the former part of their history ², were divided into twenty-four classes, only four of these returned, namely those of Jedajab, Immer, Pashur, and Harim. These however soon after their arrival, subdivided themselves each into six, that they might again make up the old number, and called themselves by their names accordingly (G) ³. Some of these there were, who not being able to make out their lineal descent from the priesthood, were deprived of the office and privileges of it until some high-priest should arise who could decide their title by the urim and thummim ⁴. The same dispute happened also concerning some others, who being come from Telmela, Telbarja (H), and other places, could not prove themselves to belong to any tribe ⁵. These were about six hundred and fifty in number, besides upwards of three hundred and ninety nethinims, the posterity of those Gibeonites whom Solomon did afterwards dedicate to the service of the temple ⁶; so small was the number of those of unquestionable descent, who returned either with Zerubbabel or Nebemiab. And hence it is, that ever since this time the number of Jews that dwelt in Palestine was always vastly inferior to those that were dispersed in Chaldea, Persia, &c. The priests, levites, singers, nethinims, and other officers of the temple settled themselves as well as they could in or near Jerusalem, that they might more readily vacate on the service of God, by rearing up his altar, and preparing all other things against the next grand solemnity; as for the rest, the greater part of them dispersed themselves in the neighbouring cities and country, where some of them had formerly dwelt, and where they probably found also some of their brethren whom Nebuchadnezzar had left there.

By this time the month Tisbri, which, as we have elsewhere shewn ⁷, was the first of the civil, and seventh of the ecclesiastical year, was at hand. The first day of it was the feast of the trumpets, because the new year was to be proclaimed by the sound of that instrument ⁸. It ushered in moreover two other great solemnities, namely the expiation day, or grand fast, which was to be kept on the tenth ⁹, and the feast of tabernacles, which begun on the fifteenth, and ended on the twenty-second of the month ¹⁰ inclusive. The greatest part of that of expiation, such as the high-priest entering on that day into the most holy place, &c. they were forced to set aside for want of a temple; however they failed not to come from all parts to the solemnity, and to fast, pray, &c. and to offer the proper sacrifices on the altar, which they had by this time repaired, so that from this day they ceased not to offer the morning and evening, and all other sacrifices prescribed by the law of Moses. The feast of tabernacles coming five days after that of expiation, they erected them booths at Jerusalem, and celebrated that festival with the usual solemnities, and so set about in good earnest to restore the worship of God in that metropolis.

In this solemn assembly, it was resolved to set about the rebuilding of the temple, towards which every one cheerfully contributed according to their power; the whole amounted to sixty-one thousand drachms of gold, and five thousand minas of silver (I), besides an hundred vestments for the priests to officiate in. This was

(G) Hence it is that Zechariah the father of John the Baptist is said (18) to have been of the course of Abiah, and Matthias the Maccabees to have been of that of Josabab (19), though 'tis plain neither of them, nor any other but the four above-mentioned, returned into Judea.

(H) Perhaps the same with Telassar, a province of Assyria; if not, we own we are in the dark about the situation of those places.

(I) Every drachm of gold being computed to be worth about ten shillings of our money, and every mina of silver, about nine pounds sterling, the whole amounted to seventy-five thousand five hundred pounds. This was indeed a great sum, if we suppose it to have been all contributed by that small number of poor people just returned from a long captivity; and therefore it is generally thought, that it included likewise the offerings of those who staid behind, and who, as we have seen above, did all contribute largely towards it; but then this indeed a small sum toward such a vast and expensive undertaking; and therefore we do suppose it to have been a free-will addition of their own, to a much greater one which had been contributed by their brethren, who chose to stay in the places of their dispersion. This money was put into the hands of proper officers, who were to oversee the work, who immediately hired workmen, sent to Tyre and Sydon for cedars from Libanus, pursuant to Cyrus's decree, and employed the first year in preparing the materials for the building ^a.

The foundation

In the second month of the following year, which was the third of Cyrus's reign, and the second from their return, they began to lay the foundation of the temple with great solemnity, in the presence of Zerubbabel their governor, of Jesua the high-priest, and of the whole congregation. It was accompanied with the sound of their trumpets, and other musical instruments, the priests and musicians singing some psalms proper to the occasion, and all the people shouting for joy at the laying of the first stones. But whilst the younger sort were thus expressing their joyful zeal upon this occasion, many of the priests, levites, and heads of families, who had seen that famous building in its splendor fifty-three years before, could not forbear sending the loudest cries of grief at the sight of that which they were now going to build; insomuch that the acclamations of the one, and the sighs and groans of the other, were so intermixed, that it was not easy to distinguish them from each other (K) ^b.

WHILST the work was carrying on, the Samaritans (L) came to Zerubbabel, and the Jewish congregation, and expressed an earnest desire to join their assistance in it, ^c seeing this sum will appear vastly too short, considering the vast number, richness, and usual munificence of those that stayed; besides, it is scarcely to be supposed, that had this been the whole that had been collected both in and out of Palestine, they would have so readily set about so magnificent a building; for which several millions would scarcely have sufficed.

It seems therefore more probable to us, that this collection was raised among them who returned, and were then at Jerusalem; and consequently, that though the bulk of them might be as poor as the Jewish writers make them, yet there were some considerable ones, who were both opulent and liberal enough, to add this offering of seventy-five thousand five hundred pounds to that which had been contributed by their brethren abroad, and which was thought sufficient to set about that noble edifice.

(K) That there was a real and even considerable disparity between the old and new temple, is very certain, since God is pleased to comfort them for it, and to promise to raise the glory of the latter above that of the former by the presence of the Messiah (10).

This difference however cannot be understood of its largeness, since the new was built upon the foundation of the old. Of the two the decree of Cyrus seems to allow this new one three times the breadth of that of Solomon; this being but twenty, and that sixty cubits broad (21); but our learned Prideaux has sufficiently proved that the dimensions were the same, only differently taken, viz. the one from in to in, and the other from out to out.

The Jews indeed tell us, that the second temple wanted five considerable things, which were the chief glory of the first (22); and these were, 1st, the ark or mercy-seat: 2. the divine presence, called by them the Shekinah: 3. the holy fire upon the altar: 4. the urim and thummin: and lastly, the spirit of prophecy. And they are certainly in the right; but then it doth not appear from the sacred historian, that these were the things which the Jewish elders bewailed, at the foundation of this second temple (23).

It seems therefore probable, that their grief did arise from the unlikelihood that it would ever be raised to the grandeur and magnificence of the old one, seeing the one had been built by the wisest and richest king, and constantly adorned by some one or other of his posterity; the other was now begun by some few exiles just returned from their captivity: the one in the time of profound peace, and greatest opulence; the other in time of adversity and oppression from their enemies round about: the former was built of the most curious and costly stones, and timber, and other materials wrought with the most exquisite art, and overlaid with a prodigious quantity of gold; insomuch that the overlayings of the most holy place, which was but thirty foot square every way, is said to have amounted to six hundred talents of gold (24), that is, to four millions three hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling. What likelihood therefore was there, that this, which was mostly built of the materials that were dug up out of the ruins of the former would ever come up to it? Lastly, there were in the old one many sumptuous galleries, buildings, gates, and other ornaments, which were not in this, nor were added to it till Herod's time, that is, about five hundred years after, as shall be seen in its proper place.

(L) These were not of the seed of Israel, but the posterity of that mixed multitude, whom Shalmanezzer, king of Assyria, sent from Cuthah, Ava, Hamath, Sepharvaim, and other provinces, to inhabit those parts, out of which he had carried the ten Israelitish tribes, as we have seen in a former volume †; they therefore took the name of Samaritans from Samaria the capital of that kingdom, but by the Jews they were called Cuthim from Cuthah, one of the provinces out of which they came (25).

These had, soon after their settlement in and about Samaria, been taught the worship of the true God, but they likewise retained, each of them, the worship of their own Gods, so that their religion was a mixture of judaism and heathenism. Samaria having been then totally destroyed by Shalmanezzer according to the prophecy (26), they did not think fit to rebuild

- a seeing they had worshipped the same God ever since the time of Esfarbaddon king of Assyria, who had settled them there. But whether the Jews suspected the sincerity of their offer, or out of contempt to a people, who were not of the seed of Israel, but only imperfect worshippers of God; Jeshua, Zerubbabel, and the whole congregation, refused to let them bear any part in the undertaking, alledging, that the decree of Cyrus being only directed to those who were of Israelitish descent, it would be a dishonour to their nation to admit any strangers to be partners in the work. Whether this refusal was really justifiable or not, we will not pretend to determine, since the scripture doth no where either praise or discommend it (M). Sure it is, that it proved ^{Why obstructed by the Samaritans.} the

it, but went and dwelt at Shichem, near mount Gerizzim, and made it their capital (27).

However they seem to have rebuilt and re-peopled the old city, at least in some degree, by that time the Jews were returned from Babylon, since both Ezra (28) and Nehemiah (29) make mention of the inhabitants of Samarina, and in this situation they were when they came to offer their assistance to Zerubbabel.

(M) The Jews, out of their innate hatred to the Samaritans, do one and all commend the zeal of that assembly, in refusing to admit them to the work; and they think that the resentment which that people shewed immediately after, is a sufficient token of the insincerity of their offer, especially seeing they are said no-where to have forsaken the old worship of their country gods. We do not know of one christian commentator that hath not given into this Jewish notion, or has been at the pains to examine this refusal in a different light, notwithstanding its having proved so fatal to them, and so detrimental to their religion.

We shall therefore for once take the liberty to inquire how far they may be justly blamed for this refusal, and so be answerable for all that long train of mischiefs it brought after it.

First, then, the sacred historian doth no-where intimate that they came to offer their assistance out of any hostile design, which he would scarcely have omitted, had that been the case; but plainly tells us, that they came and offered their assistance to the Jews. It is true, he calls them the adversaries of the Jews, for such they became when rejected by them; but it proves not that they were so before; besides, we have shewn heretofore, that the word Ἄλλοι Tzār, here used, doth often signify a rival or competitor*, and may be as capable of a good sense as of a bad one, and why not in this case?

For the Samaritans had been long since instructed and initiated in the law of Moses, and been worshippers of the God of Israel; and as for the idolatries which their forefathers had intermixed with it, we think it more than probable, that they had long since forsaken them upon reading the severe prohibitions that are interspersed in the pentateuch, which they had in their hands. This seems beyond dispute, not only from the confession they made before the Jewish congregation (30), but also from their constant behaviour, even after their rupture with the Jews, since we do not find them any-where taxed with idolatry, nor find the least monument or relic of it, though in every thing else diametrically opposite to the Jewish nation; though, if this had been the case, the admitting of them into their commonwealth, and partnership in the work, might probably have proved an effectual means of curing them of it; and it was indeed their duty to endeavour it, because

porate into their church and state all, except two or three nations therein excepted, that would become circumcised, and observers of the law (31). And might it not be in right of this law, that the converted Samaritans claimed their admittance into the work? especially since,

3dly, As servants of the God of Israel, they knew that after the temple was once rebuilt, they would be equally obliged with the Jews to come and worship there, and there only; and if they were thus equally intitled to, and desirous of enjoying the benefit of the temple, why might they not be equally zealous to contribute towards the rebuilding of it? There could be then no just pretence for excluding them, since even heathens were allowed to send their offerings both to the temple, and for maintaining the divine worship there. Now is it not more than probable, that if the stiff Jews had admitted them to any share in the undertaking, though it had been only to contribute towards the charges of rebuilding, they might have found them as hearty friends to them, as their haughty refusal made them enemies?

We have seen in a former volume how Josiah, one of the best kings that ever reigned in Judah, thought these nations worthy to be invited to the solemnities which were celebrated at Jerusalem, and with what zeal he destroyed all the idolatrous monuments that were in that kingdom (32); and was not his example very well worth imitating, especially at this juncture?

If it be asked how this zeal of the Samaritans, if it had been sincere, came to be so soon turned into the bitterest rancour, we need not now go far to seek for an answer. It is plain, first, they thought themselves unjustly used by their refusal, since even the law of Moses condemned it; and in the next place, the Jews answer was couched in such haughty and contemptuous terms, as plainly gave them to understand, that if ever they came to be again masters of themselves, instead of being looked upon as brethren, and servants of the same God, they must expect to be used with the same heavy hand as the Canaanites, and other conquered nations had been by the former kings of Judah and Israel. It was natural therefore for them to use all proper endeavours to prevent it, which they did by opposing all their measures to the utmost of their power; and their first step was to obstruct the rebuilding of the temple, which the Jews relenting and retaliating, the enmity improved to such a degree, that no two nations ever hated, or were more cruel to each other upon all occasions, than the Jews and the Samaritans. All which might in all probability have been prevented, had the former complied at least in some measure with the request of the latter.

Upon the whole then we think, that instead of commending them for their zeal, we may much more reasonably look upon all the misfortunes which the

the source of a bitter and irreconcilable hatred between these two nations, the sad effects of which the Jews soon felt in the immediate obstruction of their undertaking, and by numberless ill offices, which the incensed Samaritans did to them, and of which we shall give a further account in the sequel of this chapter.

THE first step the repulsed Samaritans took to obstruct the work, since they knew they could not procure a reversion of the king's decree, was to bribe underhand some of his head ministers and officers, to represent the Jews as a rebellious nation, and their rebuilding of the temple as dangerous, and tending to shake off their obedience to him. They failed not to carry their point, and the work was accordingly stopped, in a great measure, not only during the remaining five years of Cyrus's life, but also during the reign of his successor (N); however, while Cyrus lived, the Jews did still keep on gathering materials for the work, in hopes of better times; they were still assisted in it by the Tyrians and Sydonians, who furnished them with cedars from Libanus, with masons, carpenters, and other workmen; and these being as it were pent up in their maritime cities, received in return a proportionable quantity of corn, wine, and oyl from the Jews, as their ancestors had formerly done from king Solomon. But Cyrus was no sooner dead, than the Samaritans, encouraged by the ill disposition of his successor Cambyfes, called in scripture Abasbuerus, instead of their former seditious practices, declared themselves openly against the Jews, and against their undertaking; and writ in the most pressing terms to that monarch to put an immediate stop to it. Cambyfes however, probably out of respect to his father's decree, would not seem to revoke it, but privately gave them leave to obstruct the execution of it, so that the work, tho' it was not wholly suppressed, went at least very heavily on during his whole reign, which lasted but seven years and five months.

the Samaritans made them suffer, to have been sent them as a punishment for their uncharitableness.

The only thing we can see may be objected against what has been said is, that the Jewish congregation had some inspired persons among them, such as the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (33), whom they probably consulted before they gave a definitive answer to the Samaritans; and if so, their refusal must have been conformable to the will of God. But the text doth no-where say they did consult them; and they might indeed do as Joshua had formerly done with respect to the Gibeonites (34), think the case too plain to require it; and so forgetting that charity which the Mosaic law commands towards its proselytes , they might only listen to their natural contempt for all that were not of the seed of Israel; however that be, the event shews this their refusal to have been the unhappy source of endless evils, in which the Jews did almost constantly bear the bigger share, as the sequel will soon shew.

(N) This suppression of the work is supposed to have given occasion to Daniel's three weeks fasting and praying, which we read of (35) in the third year of Cyrus's reign, and which began on the third day of the first month (36), and at the end of which he saw the famous vision of the Persian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, contained in the three last chapters of that prophet, and which seem to have been the last he ever had.

And indeed, if we compare what he says in the close of them, with his great age, it is reasonable to believe he did not outlive it long, since he was then in the seventy-third year of his captivity, to which, if we add but fifteen, the age he was of when carried into Babylon, and less than that he cannot be supposed to have been, he must then have been near ninety years old; however, whether he died when we suppose him, or lived any time longer, we hear no more of him, except in the talmudic writings.

What the Jews opinion is concerning him and his writings, has been seen in a former volume †. But Ezekiel, and even Josephus, give him much the preference to the other prophets (37); and what is of more weight than all, our Saviour himself (38) acknowledges him to have been a prophet; and if the Jews since then had not been fatally blinded, they must have been forced to own that they had found him a very true one to their cost. But this will best be seen in the sequel of their history.

In the mean time we cannot forbear observing concerning his prophecies, whether those that relate to the Messiah, or to those foreign empires above-mentioned, that they are the clearest and most circumstantiated of any; inasmuch that Josephus, in the place above quoted, rightly observes that he did not only foretell future events, as the rest of the prophets did, but did also determine the time in which they should come to pass.

And this wonderful agreement between the facts when accomplished, and the prophecies that foretold them, appeared so exact and irrefragable, that Porphyrus could no other way elude the force of it, than by supposing the latter to have been written after the former (39).

Besides those prophecies of his, which were originally written, partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee; the Latin version has some other pretended pieces of his, which were however never admitted by the Jews into their canon, and are therefore thrown out by the protestants among the apocrypha; of this kind are the history of Susanna, of Bel and the dragon, &c. concerning which the reader may see all that is worth knowing in the authors quoted in the margin (40).

- a Cambyfes being dead, and one of the magi having mounted the throne (O), as has been eliewhere related *, the Samaritans failed not to renew their accusation against the Jews to that usurper ; they represented to him that that nation had been always famed for rebellion, for the truth of which they appealed to ancient records ; and added, that if they were suffered to go on in the rebuilding of their city and temple, which they were then about, they would not belong ere they shook off the yoke, and refused to pay him either tribute or obedience, and that their example might soon be followed by other provinces on that side the Euphrates, and occasion a general revolt. The usurper, who had been one of the chiefs of the sect of the magi, against whom the Jews were known to be diametrically opposite in point of religion, did not want any great arguments to induce him to suppress them, but sent an immediate decree to them to desist from their enterprize, and charged the Samaritans to see it executed. These therefore having received the order, went straitway with it to Jerusalem, and by virtue of it, caused a total stop to be put to it, till the Jews obtained a fresh decree in the second year of Darius his successor's reign, that is, about two years after.
- THE Jews by that time had been so disheartened, partly by the constant opposition of the Samaritans, and partly by this last decree, that though this last ceased with the discovery and death of the usurper, yet did they not shew the least readiness to resume their enterprize, till God had punished their indolence with a great dearth, and let them know by his prophet Haggai, that it was upon that account that both their harvest and vintage had failed them †. This was indeed an effectual argument to awake the zeal of that selfish people, who had by this time took care to seat themselves in commodious and sumptuous houses, without giving themselves any further thought about the house of God. The prophet was therefore sent to the governor, to the high-priest, and to the rest of the heads of Judah, to upbraid them with their ingratitude ‡, and at the same time to assure them, that if they would now set about the work in good earnest, God would not only make it prosper in their hands, but that he would make the glory of this second temple to exceed by far that of the first §. This reproof had at length the desired effect, and the people, roused up by these promises and threats, resumed and pursued the work under the eye and guidance of Haggai and Zechariab ¶.
- IN the mean time the Samaritans, who kept a watchful eye over them, being surprized that they should dare to go to work again, in spite of the decree they had obtained against them, went and applied themselves to Tatnai, whom Darius had made governor of Syria and Palestine, and acquainted him that this enterprize was resumed, not only against the king's order, but to the manifest detriment of his realm ; they expected probably that this new governor would have immediately suppressed that work ; but he being a man of more temper and moderation, came directly to Jerusalem accompanied with some of his counsellors, and with one Shetbarboznai, who is supposed to have been governor of Samaria, and inquired of the Jews by what authority they ventured upon that work. Zerubabel and Joshua undertook to answer for the rest, and acquainted him with the decree they had formerly obtained from Cyrus, and at the same time produced the sacred vessels which that monarch had ordered to be restored to them in order to renew the worship of God in Jerusalem. Tatnai having received this answer, thought the matter of too great consequence to interfere with, till he had sent a full account of it to Darius, and desired that search might be made concerning that decree. It was accordingly found among the records that were kept in the place of Ecbatan †, where Cyrus was at the time of his granting it, and Darius out of respect to that great monarch, two of whose daughters he had then married, readily confirmed it by a new one, in which all the grants of the old were repeated and ratified, with this severe penalty annexed, that whosoever should presume to contravene or obstruct it, his house should be pulled down, and a gallows made of the timber of it, and the offender hanged upon it. ^a The execution of the decree was committed to Tatnai and Shetbarboznai, and was brought to them accordingly much about the beginning of the fourth year of Darius's reign (P), and by them communicated to the Jews ^a.

It was then that the building began to rise apace, since they were now not only free from any obstructions from their enemies, but were supplied by the king's order, with all necessaries towards the expence of it, out of the treasury of that province; and this addition of the king's bounty, joined to the offerings which both they of Palestine and their brethren abroad paid towards it, caused such a dispatch in the work, that it was completely finished in three years, that is, in the sixth year of Darius, and in the month Adar, which is the last of the Jewish year, answering in ^b part to our February ^a. The dedication of that sacred building was celebrated with suitable solemnity and joy, and with abundance of sacrifices; after which they prepared themselves likewise for the approaching festival of the passover ^b, to which many of their brethren from other provinces assisted, having heard of the success which that long-wished-for enterprize had met with; and from this time we reckon the complete restoration of the Jews mentioned in the first note of this chapter. Accordingly, when those that dwelt in Babylon sent about this time to Jerusalem to inquire of the prophets whether they might not thenceforward desist from keeping the fasts of the fifth and seventh months (Q), Zachariab among other things contained in the seventh and eighth chapters of his prophecies, tells them, that they had now kept those fasts ^c seventy years ^c. In memory of this decree, which, we observed, was given from Shushan, or Susa, the Jews gave the name of Shushan to the eastern gate of the outward temple wall, and caused a bas-relief of that metropolis to be set up over it, which continued there till its total destruction by the Romans ^d.

In the mean time, the mortification which the envious Samaritans received from the king's decree in favour of the Jews, and the wonderful dispatch with which they had finished their temple, did but serve to augment their rancour against them; their being obliged to pay, not only towards the rebuilding of that edifice, but towards the sacrifices and oblations that were daily to be offered up there for the prosperity of the king and the whole realm, and towards the maintenance of the priests who officiated ^d there ^e, was what they seemed to resent above all the rest; and therefore, as soon as the temple was finished, though the outbuildings were still unrepaired, and continued so for many years, they made it a pretence for with-holding the usual tribute, pretending that it was to cease as soon as the building was finished. This obliged the Jews to send a deputation to Darius, at the head of whom were Zerubbabel, Mordecai, and Ananias, to complain to the king of it. Darius received them with his usual benevolence, and after a full hearing issued out a fresh decree, commanding his officers at Samaria to cause the usual tribute to be paid to the temple, and for the future on no pretence whatever to give the Jews any cause of complaint upon that article ^f. After this they met with no further obstacle during the rest of that monarch's ^e reign, which lasted twenty-eight years longer, nor during the twelve years of his successor; but enjoyed a perfect peace, being governed by their high-priests in matters of religion, and in those of state, by the heads of the tribe of Judab, though still in subjection to the kings of Persia, and subordinate to his governors on this side the

(P) The learned Usher seems to place this decree one year sooner; but if we consider that it was about the beginning of the third year of that monarch that Tatnai sent to the king about it, one may reasonably allow six months for the messenger's going and coming from Jerusalem to Shushan in Persia, since, as we have seen a little higher, Ezra was four months in coming from Babylon; and less than another six months can hardly be allowed, before they could obtain, in so great a court, an order for searching the records, going from Shushan to Ecbat-

(Q) These were fasts which the captive Jews kept in those two months in memory of, first, Jerusalem being first besieged by Nebuchadnezzar: Secondly, Of its being taken by him: Thirdly, Of its being burnt with the temple: And, Fourthly, For the murder of Gedaliah: All which fasts they still keep to this day, though they have somewhat changed their place in their calendar.

- a Euphrates (R). Xerxes had so soon succeeded his father, than he confirmed all the privileges formerly granted to the Jews. This was not without a singular mark of the divine providence, since the temple of Jerusalem was the only one that obtained this particular regard from that prince, whilst he was plundering and destroying all the rest that came in his way. But he was in both cases fulfilling the prophecies of Isaiah & Jeremiah ^b, which had long since foretold both the downfall of the heathen idols and temples, and the restoration of the Jewish one, under the protection and favour of Cyrus and his successors. Josephus adds from a passage out of an ancient poet (S), that the Jews assisted Xerxes in his wars, and that he had a band of them in his army ^c. It is true, the meaning of the poet has been much canvassed by very great critics; but whether or no he intended the Jews by it, it is hardly to be supposed, that they, who were so well known for their valour, fidelity, and attachment to that prince, should be the only people excused from the war, when his army was composed of all the other nations of the Persian empire. In the third year of his reign, according to the Alexandrian chronicle, died the Jewish high-priest Jeshua in the fifty-third year of his high-priesthood, and was succeeded by his son Joiakim ^k; and Xerxes being murdered in the twenty-first year of his reign, was succeeded by his third son Artaxerxes, whom we have elsewhere shewn to have been the Ahasuerus of scripture, the husband of Ester [†], and consequently the greatest friend the Jews ever had, either before or since their restoration.
- c How he came to be so above all his predecessors, we chiefly learn from the book of Ester, whose history there related is so well known, that we shall content ourselves with giving our readers as short a summary of it as is necessary for the thread of our history. Ester or Hadaßab was an orphan of the tribe of Benjamin, brought up and adopted by her uncle Mordecai; this last was a descendant of those who had been brought captives into Babylon, with Jeconiah king of Judah, and by his constant attendance at the palace-gate, seems to have been one of the king's porters. He had had interest enough to introduce his niece into the palace, among other beauties who were to be candidates to succeed the repudiated Vashti; and she had already so captivated the Persian monarch, even before he had set the diadem on her head, that she could obtain any thing from him, which her uncle bid her ask of him; it being a peculiar privilege of those virgins whenever their turn came to appear before the king, to obtain whatever they asked of him ^l. It is therefore reasonably supposed, that it was by her interest that Ezra, a very learned and zealous Jew, of the house of Aaron (T), obtained an ample commission from Artaxerxes to return to Jerusalem, with

(R) These particulars we have from Josephus, who adds, that Zerubbabel was the person who answered the wise question proposed by the king, which we have in the apocryphal book of Baruc. But we scarce think it worth inserting here, though the same author tells us, the rebuilding of the temple, and the restoration of the Jews, were granted him as a reward for his merit and judgment. The canonical books are silent as to all those particulars, and we shall stick close to them as far as they go.

(S) The passage is out of Charius, and is to this purpose: That a strange people, who used the Phœnician dialect, and dwelt in the high and hilly grounds of Solyma, near to a great lake, marched under his (Xerxes) standards. The Jews speaking then the Syriac language, Solyma being one of the names of Jerusalem, and its being situate upon hills, and near the famous lake Asphathites, it was natural for Josephus to understand the people here mentioned to have been the Jews. Some great critics however (43) have pretended to apply it to the Solymi of Ptolema, against whom Salmafius has undertaken to vindicate the Jewish historian (44), who seems indeed to be most in the right.

(T) He calls himself here, according to the Hebrew

idiom, the son of Seraiah (45), who was the high priest, whom Nebuchadnezzar caused to be slain at the taking of Jerusalem (46); but had he been his real son, he must then have been at least a hundred and thirty-two years old, supposing him to have been an infant when his father died (47), and so wholly unfit for such a journey and employ; whereas we find him capable of reading the scriptures to the people from morning to noon, one whole week, and of assisting Nehemiah in his office thirteen years after (48), when he must have been at least a hundred and forty-five years old.

But since he there also calls Azariah the son of Meraioth, though it appears from the book of the Chronicles (49), that there were six descendants between them, what should hinder, but he may himself have been some descents off Seraiah, though it doth not appear how many?

What reputation he was in at the Persian court, may be gathered from the commission itself, which is so extensive in favour of the Jewish nation, as well as of Ezra himself, that a less interest than that of Ester can hardly be supposed to have procured it to him; it was to this effect (50):

with as many of his nation as were willing to go with him, and there to regulate or a reform all matters, whether of church or state, as he should see fit. This commission was granted to him in the seventh year of that monarch's reign, in virtue of which he began his journey from Babylon on the first day of the month Nisan, answering to the middle of March; he staid some days near the river Abava for the rest of his company, and during that time, being willing to take some nethinims with him to Jerusalem to serve there as formerly in the temple, he sent some of his retinue to Iddo, who was chief of those that dwelt near the place Casipbia (U), from whence he gathered about two hundred and twenty of them, besides some priests and levites; after which having proclaimed a solemn fast, to implore the divine protection, they set forward, and arrived at Jerusalem on the first day of the fifth month, or the middle of July, that is, after a journey of four months. b

At his arrival he opened his commission before the whole Jewish assembly, and there delivered to the priests the offerings which had been made by the king, nobles, and by the Babylonish Jews (W); after which having sent to acquaint the governor of Syria and Palestine with the power he had received from the king, he set about putting it in execution; he began with appointing judges and magistrates, to reform every thing that was contrary to the law of Moses, and pursuant to his commission, impowered them to punish offenders, not only with fines, imprisonment, and other lesser punishments, but even with banishment and death, according to the nature of the crime. Ezra continued in the faithful discharge of his authority thirteen years, that is, till he was c succeeded by Nebemiah, who was sent thither with a fresh commission from the same monarch. But before that, the Jews having received fresh tokens of the king's favour upon his raising Esther to the diadem, Ezra relying upon the protection of two such powerful friends as the new queen and Mordecai, who now engrossed the king's favour, gave himself up wholly to the care of the Jewish affairs, and to reform some crying abuses which had crept in among those, who were returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel.

"Artaxerxes, king of kings, unto Ezra the priest of the law of the God of heaven, peace, &c. It is our decree, that whosoever of you, whether priests, levites, &c. shall be desirous to return to Jerusalem, be permitted to go safely thither—We give you power to settle and reform every thing according to the law of your God, and to convey thither all the money, vessels, &c. which we, our counsellors, as well as the priests and others of your nation that stay in the province of Babylon, shall freely offer for the service of the temple of your God, which is at Jerusalem, or to dispose of it in any other way you shall think fit—and that whatever other charges Ezra shall think necessary for the house of God, shall be forthwith furnished to him out of our revenue on the other side the Euphrates, as far as a hundred talents of silver, a hundred measures of flour, wine and oyl, &c.

"And we do likewise forbid our governors in those provinces to levy or demand any toll or taxes on any of the priests, levites, singers, &c. of the temple; and we impower you, Ezra, to appoint judges, magistrates, &c. according to the wisdom with which God has endowed you, to judge that people on that side the river, and to condemn every offender to death, banishment, or any lesser punishment, according to the nature of his crime."

(U) It is not easy to guess what place this was: the text calls it בְּרִינְתָא דְּחַמְסִין, Casipbia hammakom, Casipbia the place. Some have taken it for the Caspian mountains, situate between Media and Hyrcania, in the mines of which these captive nethinims are supposed to have been sent to work; if so, it is no wonder they should be so ready to embrace the benefit of the king's decree.

Josephus passes by this whole affair, and is so out both in his chronology and history, that he makes this decree, as was that which Nehemiah obtained thirteen years after, to have been both granted by Xerxes, contrary to the Hebrew text, which calls him Artaxerxes; but this is not the only place where that historian is out.

(W) These offerings amounted to (1) a hundred talents of gold, besides twenty basons of gold, amounting to a thousand darkoonim (or darics, which were equivalent to our jacobus); (2) six hundred and fifty talents of silver, with vessels of silver, to the weight of a hundred talents more, and two vessels of some fine copper, then reckoned as valuable as gold.

From this new reformation made by Ezra in the Jewish church and commonwealth, the learned Pri-deaux begins the computation of Daniel's weeks; but as this is a subject quite out of our province, we refer those readers who are curious about it to consult the book itself (3).

- a from the captivity to appear before him at Jerusalem on a set day, under the penalty of being excommunicated, and forfeiture of all they had. As soon as they were assembled, he upbraided them in the severest terms for their crimes, so strongly forbidden by the Mosaic law; after which he obliged them to take a solemn oath, that as many as had been guilty of it, should put away both their strange wives, and the children they had by them. But as the thorough cognizance of the matter was like to take up some considerable time, and the court of the temple was still uncovered, and exposed to the rains that fell then abundantly, he appointed commissioners to make strict search into every family, and to oblige all delinquents to comply with the covenant which Ezra had exacted from them. This scrutiny was accordingly begun
- b on the first day of the tenth month, and ended on the same day of the first month, when the number of delinquents was found to amount to a hundred and fourteen, some of whom had had children by those strange wives.

His next great work in pursuance to his commission, was to reform the whole state of the Jewish church, by restoring its discipline and rites, according to its ancient pattern, under the former prophets. In order to which, his first care was to collect and set forth a correct edition of the sacred books, and then to reduce the observance of the Mosaic law to that standard. This circumstance we find neither expressly mentioned in the sacred historians, nor in Josephus; but we have it from the Talmudists, Collects the sacred books. and other ancient Jews, who add a great many others, which not carrying the same probability with this, we shall for that reason give an epitome of in the margin (X). But as for this of his collecting and revising the sacred books, making some small additions to them, and fixing the canon of the Old Testament to twenty-two books, as they are now received by the Jews, and protestant christians; we have many reasons to confirm it. He was excellently well versed in them; his extensive authority enabled him to gather up all the best copies that could be met with, either at Jerusalem, or among the dispersed Jews; he was himself inspired, and had the assistance of two or three prophets (Y) in the work. The then confused state of the

(X) They tell us, 1st, that he was assisted in it by the grand synagogue or sanhedrin, which they pretend to have been originally instituted by Moses, in the seventy elders, and to have been since increased to a hundred and twenty; we have already confuted the greatest part of this assertion in a former volume, to which we refer the reader.

2^{dly}, In this synagogue they place among the principals of them the prophet Daniel, and his three friends, Shadrach, Mesbuch, and Abednego, whom they pretend to have been still alive, and to have returned from the captivity, though neither he, Ezra or Nehemiah, mention any thing about any of them.

Lastly, and to mention no more, They place at the tail of this synagogue Simon the just, between whom and the time in which we supposed Daniel to have died there elapsed near two hundred and fifty years. The method they take to skip over this difficulty is equally absurd, and only exposes their ignorance of chronology; and this makes the judicious dean above quoted rightly suppose, that this pretended assembly of a hundred and twenty was only a succession of men, who put every one a helping hand to complete what Ezra had set on foot; and that Simon the just, who is the last there named, and was really so in point of time, was the person who gave the finishing stroke to that great work (4); for that it was not so far completed in Ezra's time as to have had no addition or amendment made to it afterwards, is scarce credible.

1st, Because we find in Nehemiah * the genealogy of Jeshua the high-priest is carried down to Jadua, and mention made of Darius the Persian, or Codomanus, who were recent by at least a hundred years; and in the third chapter of the first book of the Chronicles, Zerubbabel's genealogy is carried down so far as must necessarily reach to the time of Alexander the Great.

2^{dly}, Among the various readings noted in the margin of the sacred books which are attributed to Ezra, and are known by the names of Keri and Kerib, we find some in those of Ezra and Nehemiah, which cannot be supposed to have been put in by them, but by some of their successors in the work.

3^{dly}, We may add, that Nehemiah and the Chronicles fall very short of that correctness of style and method that we find in the other books of the Old Testament, and for the reasons above alledged, were hardly admitted into the canon till about the time of Simon the just above-mentioned.

(Y) These were Haggai, Zachariah, and Malachi, to which the Jews add, as we hinted in the last note, Daniel, and his three companions. As for Malachi, they pretend that he was the same with Ezra; that this last was his proper name, and מלאכי Malachi, which signifies my angel or messenger, to have been that of his office, as being the person or prophet sent by God to restore the Jewish church to its pristine splendor and standard.

St. Jerom and some other ancient writers have maintained the same notion (5): sure it is, that Malachi is rather a common than a proper name, and that in Ezra's time, prophets were called by that name (6); and accordingly, several ancient fathers quoted Malachi under the title of the angel or messenger of God (7).

What seems to confirm that he was an assistant to, if not the same with Ezra is his reproving the people for marrying strange wives (8), for their oppression of their poor brethren (9), and several other abuses which were then rectified by Ezra and Nehemiah.

Jews required such a collection and revival of the sacred writings, and some such thing we find done soon after Nehemiab's arrival in Judæa, when Ezra brought forth the sacred volume, and read and expounded it to all the people from morning till noon, during the whole seven days of the feast of tabernacles ^a. Lastly, the whole current of Talmudist writers, and all the ancient and modern Jews, (except the Samaritans, who reject all but the pentateuch, as shall be seen in due time; and Josephus, who perhaps did not think proper to tell the world that the sacred writings stood in need of such a revival and amendment) all the rest ascribe this work to Ezra, as president of the sanhedrin, and chief director and overseer of the whole, in which they have been followed by no small number of ancient fathers ^b, and by far the greatest part of modern writers. We may further add, that there is no other way of justifying that great and zealous man, for leaving the city and outworks of the temple in that desolate state in which Nehemiab found them at his coming ^c, considering that he met with no other obstacles, that we read of, from the Samaritans, but all possible encouragement from the Persian court; but the supposition, that he thought it of greater moment to bestow his time and care in this new and correct edition of the sacred code, than to busy himself in repairing the outworks of the city and temple. It is in the time of this revival that he is supposed to have exchanged the old Hebrew character, for the more beautiful and commodious Chaldee now in use, and to have invented the Massorah (Z), vowel, and other points, concerning which we have given a full account in a former volume [†].

(Z) By the term Massorah or Massoreth, which signifies tradition, is meant the unwritten rule or canon by which the reading and writing of the sacred books was fixed. We have already seen elsewhere, that the Jews affirm it to have been given by God himself to Moses, who delivered it to Joshua, Aaron, &c. by whom it was transmitted by oral tradition, through a long succession of holy and inspired men down quite to Rabbi Judah, surnamed Hakkadosh, or the holy, who wrote it in the book which they call the Mishna; all which we have formerly confuted [†] as a series of Rabbinic fictions.

Others, with more probability, attribute it to this Ezra, who in the comparing of the several copies, out of which he was to compile his new authentic one, found himself under a necessity of correcting several errors which had crept in, through the ignorance and carelessness of the transcribers, and observing likewise here and there a different reading, which might be well enough preserved, he put the one, perhaps that which he thought the best, in the text; and this the Jews call Keri; the other he put in the margin, to intimate that it was otherwise written in some copies; and those marginals were called Cetib. It were however absurd to suppose that they were all inserted by him, since, as we hinted in a former note, we find some of them, not only in the book that goes by his name, and is justly attributed to him, but in some of a later date; besides many of those marginals are really trifling, and some of them far beneath the dignity of such an author. Those who understand the Hebrew tongue may see an instance of this in the places quoted in the margin (11).

As for the vowel points, which are said to have been invented by him, in order to fix the true sense of words, we have heretofore shewn them to be of much more modern date [‡]. But as to the grammatical ones, especially the athnach and sillue, or soph-pasuk, so called, because this last concluded every period, called by the Jews passuk, it is most likely, they were devised either by or very soon after him; for the Hebrew being almost forgotten during their captivity, and the Chaldee being become the current tongue, there was a necessity that those parastas or portions of scripture that were read in the temple and other synagogues, should be expounded to them by proper interpreters; and this the Talmudists (12) tell us was done verse by verse in the law, which gave occasion to the invention of those points, in order to direct the readers when to stop; but when they were afterwards forbid by Antiochus Epiphanes to read the law (13), and had substituted the lecture of the prophets instead of it; the sense in these generally running a greater length, they were obliged to read and expound three whole verses at a time.

However, when the Maccabees had by recovering their liberty restored the ancient reading of the law, they continued still reading also the prophets, and expounded the former verse by verse, and the latter every third verse; in process of time they added likewise the other books called by them כְּתוּבֵי חַיִּים Cetubim, or hagiographa; and this probably gave rise to the distinction of legal, prophetic, and hagiographical books, often mentioned in the gospel (14), and by Josephus (15).

How these periods or verses were marked in their books, is not easy to guess. If the Jews were then as superstitious as they have proved since, it is certain, they could never suffer them to be inserted in any shape into the text, which they look upon as polluted by every adventitious point or dot, though ever so accidental. It is indeed a question whether they were so scrupulous in ancient times; but then, if Ezra, or any of his successors, ever admitted those stops, lines, points, or in any other form, it will be a wonder how they came afterwards to be expunged; for it is plain there are none such admitted in their synagogues.

But the difficulty may be easily removed, by supposing that they only left a blank space between period

- a ANOTHER and very useful improvement which he and his inspired associates are Corrects them. generally, and with great probity, believed to have made to this new edition of the sacred books, is the interspersing here and there an explanatory clause by way of parenthesis, and making such other additions to the text, as were necessary to explain, illustrate, or confirm it. Of this nature some suppose the account of Moses's death, and the excellent character given to that great lawgiver in the last chapter of Deuteronomy, to have been; but it seems to us more probable, that this was inserted much earlier, namely by Joshua, or some of his cotemporary writers, in order to inspire the people with a singular respect and credit both to him and his writings. However that be, we meet with a great number, that being manifestly inserted long after the facts, cannot well be ascribed to any but Ezra, or some of those prophets that assisted him in the work; thus we find in several of the historical books concerning some ancient monuments, such-like words as these added by way of testimony, which remain unto this day ^w; nay, many others of the like nature the reader may see in the margin (A). To the same end he is supposed likewise to have added some new names of places to the old ones, which were become obsolete. Thus Abraham is said to have pursued the confederate kings as far as Dan, the name which the Danites gave long afterwards to Laisb^x. The same was done to Bethel, anciently called Luz, to Hebron, whose original name was Kiriath Arba, and to many more, by the help of whose new names we come to the knowledge of the places there mentioned, which we could never have known by their old ones.
- b THE last work of this great man was the restoring the worship of the temple according to its ancient form before the captivity; to revise and amend the Jewish liturgy, and to add particular prayers and thanksgivings proper for the festivals that were super-added after their return from the captivity; such as the dedication of the new temple^y, of Purim^z, and the like; and as the psalms entered into almost every part of their worship, and were to be sung alternately (B), as we have seen in a former volume, it is not to be doubted, but he took the same pains in collecting the whole book, and giving it the same revival which he had to the rest. Whether he digested them in the same order we have them now in, as is generally believed by Jews and Christians, and whether he was the author of those which are manifestly composed during the captivity^a, and after their return from it^b, such as we take those which are styled period and period; or, as Maimon imagines (16), that they finished every verse or period with a break, and began the next line with a new verse. But as they found these breaks to run to too great a length, in many places, and caused their books, those we mean, which they had for their private use, to swell to too great a bulk, they invented the two grammatical points, which are now in use, and which the reader may find in all their pointed books.

But this was not the sole use of these grammatical points. Those who are acquainted with that tongue need not be told how necessary they are in fixing the sense in many places, nor how it may be, and is often rendered obscure, unintelligible, or even contrary by the misplacing of them. We have formerly given a notable instance of it , from which the reader may guess of the rest; and shall dwell no longer upon it.

(A) Thus it is said in Genesis (17), that the Canaanites did then dwell in the land; which words could not be inserted till they had actually been extirpated out of it; and in another place of the same book (18), it is said, these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king in Israel, which last words must of necessity have been inserted long after Moses's time. The large iron bed of Og king of Bashan, said in Deuteronomy to have been still to be seen in the metropolis of the Ammonites (19), plainly intimates, that that prince had been killed long before this last clause was added. Lastly, and to mention no more, the twenty-fifth chapter of the Proverbs, which begins with these words, The proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out, plainly shew: the words were added some considerable time after this last named king, who was twelve generations off Solomon.

(B) That is, not by hemisties, as Meliorinus and some others seem to have imagined, but by whole verses, as they are now sung in our cathedrals; for, first, some of those verses there are, which, as a learned prelate has lately observed against him (20), manifestly consist of three members, and so are incompatible with the method of singing by hemisties.

But what seems to us more decisive is, that in some other acrostics (21), whose verses are consequently determined; the letter Y was not being admitted to begin the sixth verse, but being thrust in the middle of the fifth, just after the astnach, they substituted a verse after the last alphabetical one, which begins in them with the letter D, which can hardly be supposed to have been done, but to make the number of verses even, that the same side of the choir might not begin and end the same psalm; which addition would have been needless, had they been sung by hemisties.

gradual to have been (C); and lastly, whether he lived to finish all these things, a or left them to be completed by his successors, we will not pretend to determine. One thing the second book of Maccabees informs us, that Nebemias founded a library at Jerusalem, in which he deposited the acts of the kings, of the prophets, and of David c, which seems to intimate, as if the revision of them had been completed before that time.

It is no less uncertain whether this revision of the sacred books reached so far as the restoring the poetical parts to their ancient metre, or whether they contented themselves with such a punctuation and division of verses as would best fit them for the service of the temple. The generality of writers is for the latter; but there is one reason which seems to us very strong for the former, namely, that those psalms b which were composed after the captivity appear to us to run much in the same cadence with those which had been written before it, and many of them, whatever some difficult critics may fancy to the contrary, seem to be in no case inferior to them; which seems a plain intimation, either that the rules of Hebrew poetry were not lost at Babylon, or that they were recovered after their return, though they have been in vain sought for ever since the total dispersion of that nation, as we have fully shewn in the place last quoted out of the first volume of this history. However, since that time the reverend prelate above quoted has favoured the learned world with his metrical edition of the psalms, by which he has at least convinced us, that the Hebrew metre c is not so irrecoverably lost as we then imagined. It is true, we are far from thinking that he has actually discovered it; we shall hereafter give our reasons for it in the margin; but this we are bound to say in justice to his extensive learning, the indefatigable pains he has taken in that work, and the irrefragable arguments with which he has exploded the greatest part of the Mafforetic trash, which has been hitherto an insurmountable impediment to such a discovery, to say nothing of the many sagacious rules, and judicious criticisms, which the reader will find in that edition; that if his lordship has not quite paved the way to it, he has at least blown up those discouraging obstacles that obstructed it; so that we may now hope, that by the help of this elaborate piece, those who have both time and genius for such an enterprise, will be now encouraged to follow so noble an example, from the present prospect of d success, which they must have despaired of without it. Having said thus much in justice to that excellent piece, and its learned author, we shall now, with his lordship's good leave, and with that honest freedom which the dignity the subject demands of us, offer our reasons why we think that his new found metre comes infinitely short of what it appears to us to have originally been, and consequently, that the greatest part of the alterations and corrections made for the sake of it, and which are to be found in every page, are so many deviations from the original. And since we find that many of our readers expect we should give our opinion of this learned performance, we doubt not, but if we clear the sacred text from the corruptions which our learned prelate thinks he had corrected in it; and the Hebrew poetry from being such a low, e

(C) Concerning the title of these, which are fifteen in number, beginning at the hundred and twentieth, various have been the conjectures of the learned; its original import is a song of degrees or steps, which some interpreters mistaking, have rendered a song of excellences, or a most excellent song (22). The Chaldee paraphrast turns it, a song of the steps of the abyss, alluding to an old Jewish tradition; that when they came to lay the foundations of the second temple, such a stream of water gushed out, as rose fifteen cubits, and would in all probability have overflowed the country, had it not been quashed by virtue of the ineffable name of God, written upon the fifteen steps of the temple.

Hence interpreters have imagined, that these psalms had their names from the fifteen steps on which they were sung; but in what part of the temple, whether within or without, they can by no means agree.

Others took the hint from thence, that they were sung on some high desk, or raised place, to which the singers went by steps; but where is there any foundation for this?

But if we consider that the whole tenor of those psalms consists chiefly either in fervent prayers for their return from their captivity, or thanksgiving for having obtained it; and that the terms, ascend, and to ascend, are frequently used to express their return into their own land (23); as it was indeed a high hilly ground, is it not more natural to suppose those psalms to have been composed some a little before, and some presently after, and all upon the subject of this happy אֲלֹהֵינוּ ascend or return from Babylon to Jerusalem (24)? So Shir Hammealoth will properly signify the song of the return, or of those that returned.

(D) In speaking of the sacred Hebrew poetry in a former volume *, we ventured to affirm, that it was unreasonable to suppose, that an art, which, with respect to its noblest part, the strength of expression, loftiness of thought, beauty of metaphors, and imagery, was almost at its height in Moses's time; and had been so excellently well cultivated during so many centuries after, should yet be so uncouth and imperfect with respect to the metre, as Le Clerc and some other critics have made it; the latter being but a mere jingle, and within the compass of a much more ordinary genius. And this argument we think will hold much stronger against that even heavy and inelegant bitony, which our learned prelate has given us for it; and especially,

2dly, If we take in another part of his lordship's affirmation, namely, that it admitted of no distinction of long and short syllables, but used them all indifferently, as the nature of the verse, which is there affirmed to consist of no other variety than trochaic and iambic, required. For this once allowed, we may rarely say with the poet, that Nil non eris verus, and that there is no period in the Old Testament from Genesis to Malachi, that may not be thus versified, not to say, any other book in any other language; for proof of which, if the reader will but be at the small pains we have been induced to take, he may with ease reduce the whole common prayer book, either English, Latin, or Greek, into the same kind of verse, and without those frequent alterations, which his lordship is forced to make in the Hebrew text.

We may add, that quantity is in many cases so necessary and obvious to fix the sense of what is said or sung, that it is absolutely impossible the sacred poets should have been thus totally negligent of it.

But, thirdly, That neither poets nor musicians from Moses to David should have stumbled upon a variety of metres, answerable to the variety of subjects treated of in the psalms; but that the penitential ones, than which nothing can be more grave or solemn, as to the expression, should run on in the same merry pace with the eucharistical, ecumenical, epithalamical, and others, of a more chearful nature; or that David, bewailing and begging pardon for his secret sins, should express himself in the same leaping anacreontic strain, as when he speaks of the mountains skipping like rams, and the little hills like young sheep (25), credas quicumque vult.

Lastly, If the book of psalms, a book so highly esteemed, and in such constant use among all the Jews, can be once supposed to have been so mutilated, as to stand in need, not only of all that vast quantity of corrections which are here introduced for the sake of that metre, but of a great many more, which that learned prelate owns he could not restore; it is to be feared, whatever his lordship may think to the contrary, its authority will soon dwindle into nothing, especially if that be admitted, which his lordship affirms in several places of that work, that a great number of those corruptions have been introduced into the text, not by the inadvertency and ignorance of transcribers, but by the superstitious or even malicious intent of the Jews themselves. But such a severe charge against a people, who, for ought appears to the contrary, have rather ran into the other extreme, ought to have been backed by some stronger proofs, than the bare structure of this new-found metre, which is at best built upon a tottering foundation, and in many cases upon a wrong one, as will, we hope, appear by what follows.

These were some of the main reasons that induced us to inquire further into the grounds of this new metre; and here we own, that his lordship could not have taken upon a better way to come at his intended discovery, than that of framing his rules from the acrostic psalms, whose verses being confined within their alphabetical limits, take away at once all occasion of expatiating. But the misfortune was, that he made choice of so short a one for his ground and pattern, which consisting but of ten verses, and by its structure appearing to have been designed, like some others of the like nature, to be committed to memory for frequent use, could not afford that variety of measure, &c. which is to be found in acrostics of a greater length, such as the 25th, 34th, 37th, and especially the 119th.

This last his lordship justly observes, comes indeed vastly short of the poetic elegance of the rest, with respect to the diction; but as to the metre, it affords such a beautiful variety of it, that it seems to contain an epitome of the whole Hebrew metre; and we doubt not, but if his lordship had bestowed the same pains in framing his rules from it, he might not only have given us a more noble idea of the sacred poetry, but likewise saved himself the endless trouble of distorting the text, to make it square with his own. All which put together, gave us just cause to think that his fondness for this new discovery had made him overlook several great beauties and excellencies in the Hebrew metre, which a closer and less partial examination might easily bring to light.

We had not gone far in this inquiry, before some of his metrical emendations gave us a manifest proof of it, and set us upon a much better scent. We observed, that his lordship was often forced for the sake of the verse to curtail a trisyllable into a bisyllable, or to stretch the latter into the former; but more particularly the names of God, Jah, Jahvoh, and Elohim, by exchanging them ad libitum, and contrary to the text, according as the verse required one, two, or three syllables, even as far as eighteen times in one psalm (26).

This, we observed, was constantly done in verses whose hemistichs ran either in the same number of syllables, except only in these names of God, as in the following; or in parallel verses of different psalms; in the one of which the word Jahvoh, and the other Elohim, and sometimes Adonai, did occur (28), ceteris paribus. This made us apprehend at first, that if there was really any such metre in the psalms, his lordship was mistaken in reading the word יְהוָה Jahvoh, which ought to have been a trisyllable, in order to answer to Elohim and Adonai.

(27) יְהוָה יְהוָה
יְהוָה יְהוָה בְּיָמֵינוּ
בְּיָמֵינוּ

But finding upon further examination that Elohim was in several places set to answer to other words, which were certainly bisyllable, as in the following (29),

יְהוָה הַמִּימִם
הַמִּימִם אֱלֹהִים
אֱלֹהִים וְהָאֱלֹהִים

We return to Ezra, who having been succeeded by Nebemiah, after he had governed ^a the Jewish church and nation thirteen years, assisted him in some parts of his office some few years, after which we hear no more of him. Josephus tells us ^d, that he died and was buried at Jerusalem; but the rest of the Jews affirm, that he returned into Persia, and died there in the hundred and twentieth year of his age. They bear so great a veneration for him, that they look upon him as a second Moses, a restorer of the sacred books and Mafforah, and, in a word, one every way worthy to have been their law-giver, had not that honour been bestowed on Moses ^e. They join the books of Ezra and Nebemiah into one, and make him the author of it: and he was certainly so of the first, since he speaks of nothing in it, but what was done in his time, and under his eye, and almost every-where speaks of himself in the first person; ^b but if he wrote the second, some additions must have been made to it since his death; but the difference of style seems to prove it of another hand, as well as that of the two books of Chronicles, which it is not however improbable, he might have had the revision of; as for the other two books falsely attributed to him, and known by

What could be a stronger proof than this, that Elohim consisting of two shorts and a long, was equivalent to the two long ones in Gullam, and consequently that the Hebrew metre admitted not only of long and short syllables, two of the last of which were equal to one of the former; but also, that it consisted of trisyllables, bisyllables, and monosyllables, or what the prosodists call cesures? Such as are in the Latin pentameters, and in the Hebrew iambs. We have not room in a note to multiply examples; the reader may by comparing the following ones, which are exactly according to the text, with those of our learned author, as he has been forced to distort them from it, to reduce them to his metre, easily guess, to what a vast number of needless emendations this one single error of the Hebrew poetry consisting only of bisyllables, without distinction of quantity (30), has given birth to, which might otherwise have been happily avoided.

Those that are conversant with the Hebrew tongue, and sacred poets, will easily feel the advantage of admitting this variety of feet, not only with regard to its superior elegance to a dull constant bitony, but also towards the further discovery of the Hebrew metre in verses of unequal hemisties; some of which run to such lengths above others, even in those acrostics abovementioned, that they contain often double, and sometimes treble the number of syllables.

This indeed our author looks upon as such a disgrace to the Hebrew poetry, that, right or wrong, he endeavours to avoid it every-where, as much as possible; sometimes by the addition of one or more words, at other times by striking them out (34), by elisions, paragogics, and sometimes by splitting a long word between two hemisties, or sometimes by splitting an hemistie into two, contrary to the constant structure of the psalm (35); and yet if we were to frame a judgment from the three last quoted psalms, xxxvii. cxix. and cxxxvi. one would be apt to think that the sacred poets thought these transitions from a long to a very short hemistie, an ornament; and such it is thought by all, in odes, epitaphs, and such-like, which seem therefore to us to come nearest to the Hebrew genius and metre, not only of the psalms, but of the other poetic pieces of the Old Testament †.

Now this kind being so opposite to the trochaic and iambic, which his lordship had pitched upon for his standard, we need not wonder that he has succeeded no better in his endeavours to bring it to it, since that could not be done but by constant stretching, dislocating, amputation, and other such-like violent methods, which his lordship among many other learned men, have justly objected against Le Clerc, and others, who have attempted this discovery.

It is not the design of this note to recover the ancient Hebrew poetry, a task for which we have neither time nor abilities; but to rescue it from that contempt into which both it and the Hebrew text must unavoidably fall, if it should once be supposed, that the former consisted only in a dull, sleepy, and uncertain bipedality, and that the latter has been so corrupted and mutilated, partly by Jewish superstition and malice, and partly by the ignorance and inadvertency of transcribers. And therefore, though what has been said seem to us sufficient to vindicate it in both cases, yet, as the last is a matter of such great moment, we shall take the liberty to animadvert upon some few more of his lordship's metrical emendations, that the reader may see how little reason he had to say, Ex metro liquido apparet; frustra ergo sunt omnes hic interpretas (36). We shall begin with the fiftieth psalm, out of the first verse of which he has struck the two names of God, El and Elohim into the title, upon no other authority than the last-mentioned. Could his lordship indeed have backed it with one single instance of a psalm, intitled, Mizmor el Elohim, or shewn that there was any absurdity or inelegancy in the expression, El, Elohim, Jahvoh, or Jehovah, the the God of gods, or the Mighty God; such a change might have past for an amendment; but to rectify so noble an expression for the sake of a meter, which is at best as yet but in embryo, is a criticism which few of his readers will digest.

But were it really for the sake of the metre that his lordship rejects this triplicate name of God, how easily might it have been remedied by lengthening the verse without any violence to the text! As,

El Elohim Jahvoh dibber vajira, Eretz mimisrah shemesh had meboo

or by any other way, rather than stripping the original of so lofty an expression. But if his lordship, or the reader, is by this time reconciled to that variety of metre we have endeavoured to establish above, the whole verse may be still made to run more elegantly, and conformably to the rest of the psalm, thus:

*El elo-him jah-voh dib her Vajira eretz mimiz rah
S'émesh vé had meboo*

But his lordship seems to be fond of spying out difficulties in the original, that he may have an opportunity of exercising his critical talent. We shall give three pregnant instances of it; the first is in the eighth and ninth verses of the fortieth psalm; this place, obscure and intricate as his lordship calls it, after some additional words, and a new disposition of the original ones, he leaves much more dark and unintelligible, and less elegant and grammatical than he found it, as the reader may see by comparing it with the text.

Now all this trouble might have been saved, and the text not only cleared, but exactly adjusted to the place, where the epistle to the Hebrews quotes it (37) by the single addition of the letter צ caph before the word בְּמִגִּלָּת bimgillath, and which may easily be supposed to have been omitted by reason of its similitude to the צֶדֶק tsedek, or even by the bare changing the one for the other, and reducing cemgillath instead of bemgillath; and then the verses will run thus, and in the bishop's own meter,

then said I to I come (kevim-gilath Sepher Catub (as in the volume of the book it is written halai) lahioth rezo-neka of me) to do thy will Elo-harkha-phasti
O my God, I am well pleased with it
Vetho-rathca betoc Mehai
And thy law is within my heart.*

The altering the points in the verb kaphazti, and making it the substantive khephzati, will render it still more elegant; and the sense will be, O my God, and my delight; or, O God, thou art my delight, and thy law is within my heart.

The next is in the sixty-eighth psalm, verse 14; where the author not being able to light upon a better sense than that which the vulgate and our version gives it, Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove, &c. has been forced to insert the words sehu and ce, and to double that of Jonah with the addition of the צ in the first. Now all this might have been saved, and the sense made not only much plainer, but more elegant, by reading נִפְּחָה instead of נִפְּחָה, which is but a small alteration in comparison of his; and then the sense will be plainly this; Though ye have lain among the pots, or rather, according to the parallel in Genesis xix. 19. Though ye sink between two barthen, ye shall the dove (emblem of innocence) escape with her wings covered with silver, and her feet with the purest gold.

The last is in psalm cxxxviii. v. 2. the latter part of which running thus in the text, which not being altogether so intelligible, his lordship rectifies by adding the word Shem before Shemca, and casting out the last word, as absurdly added, and without sense, and for a proof of it sends us to the parallel of St. Paul (37).

Ki bigdalt hal col Shemca imratheca;

I hope his lordship will not think imratheca, thy word, to have been here maliciously added by the Jews, since, if we understand the apostle right, he speaks there of Christ the word, the logos made flesh, and crucified, and for which God has given him a name above every name. If therefore, instead of striking it out, his lordship had only expunged the pronoun י after Shem without any farther alteration, the sense would have much better tallied with St. Paul's quotation thus: For thou hast magnified thy word above every name. His lordship could not be ignorant what is universally understood by the Hebrew Imrah, the Chaldee Mumre, the Greek Logos, and the Latin Verbum, when applied to that divine Person.

It is true, if we admit the original word imratheca, the verse will be one syllable too long for the foregoing; a misfortune which often happens in the text, but which his lordship is never at a loss to obviate, either by an elision or a paragoge, though for our part we should rather chuse to remedy it by the rule heretofore given of making two short syllables equal to a long one.

Much of the same nature is the correction of Psalm lxxiv. v. 3. where his lordship strikes out of the verse the words lemasshuath netzach, perpetual desolations, as absurd and contrary to the context (in which the psalmist begs of God to put an end to them) and fills up the chasm with the word Calleb, which he fetches out of the eleventh verse, where he pretends it to be redundant.

His lordship, we believe, is the first that thinks it nonsense for a man to pray to God to put an end to his perpetual, that is, constant, and hitherto uninterrupted misfortunes; besides the word נצח netzach, it is well known, doth not always imply the duration, but often strength, greatness, violence and insurmountableness of a thing; and therefore not only very applicable to the then dreadful desolations of the sanctuary, but also very fit to be humbly represented to that God whose hand alone could remedy them.

But there is still another and much more natural way of clearing the original, than that of his lordship's, by supposing the verb to have been originally נצח netzach, fly, which the transcribers not understanding, changed it for the other, which was more known to them. The expression of lift up thy feet, which alludes to a bird just going to take flight, confirms this sense, which will run thus, lift up thy feet, and fly to those dreadful devastations which thy enemies perpetually commit in thy holy place.

But this not being perceived by the transcribers, in order to make their netzach run smooth with the rest, they changed the order of the words, which probably ran thus:

Netzah lecol Malsuoth
Herah oieb bakkodesh.*

As for the word נצח, which his lordship fetches from the eleventh verse, we think it fully as well where it is, and where it is properly the participle pahtul of the verb נצח, to shut or inclose, the ת elided by reason of the feminine, the hand, there said to be shut up in the bosom. See a parallel in Psalm lxxxvii. v. 9.

From

by the names of the first and second books of *Esdra*s, they are justly rejected; a however, we shall subjoin a short account of each in the margin (E).

Nebemiah

From these few examples the reader may see the ill consequence of two great an attachment to a favourite system: but the mischief has not stop here; and the notion, that the text was so corrupt, that nothing but these violent means could possibly recover it, has spread itself to other places, where the metre did not want those emendations. Thus his lordship tells us, in his notes on Psalm cvii. v. 25 and 29, that the words jahmed and jakem had manifestly changed places. We had indeed long before suspected some error in the last verb, but never dreamt of this way of rectifying it. However, it appeared so plausible to us at the first reading, that we readily jumped over the difficulty of accounting how two such words, that stood at the distance of four verses, or eight hemistiches, asunder, should, contrary to the plain sense of the text, be jumbled into each other's place; and we transposed them according to his correction in our manuscript psalter.

But we had not often read over the expression jahmed ruakh segarah lidmamah, before we observed a manifest absurdity in it, since that verb in this conjugation doth not signify to make to stand still, but to cause to stand, to act; and could not consequently belong to the latter, but to the former of the verses, where it was raised to cause the storm there spoken of; and we accordingly replaced it where it ought to be.

The difficulty then was how to rectify the word jakem, which, as it is there written, must be owned to be nonsense, unless we take it in the same figurative meaning, which it is known to have in 1 Sam. iv. 15. and 1 Kings xiv. 4. and elsewhere. But here the thirty-third and thirty-fifth verses of the same psalm furnished us with a much more plausible salvo than his lordship's improbable transposition, it being much more likely that a transcriber should mistake or overlook one letter for another, than that he should thus transpose two distant words against all sense; and thus we writ יָשִׁעַם jasheem, to turn, instead of יָכֵם jakem, to raise, Jasheem Seharah Lidmamah turneth the tempest into a calm, will then answer to Jasheem Neharoth l'Midbar, verse 33, he turneth the rivers into a dry wilderness, and Jasheem Midbar l'agam Majim, verse 33, a dry wilderness into a standing water.

If our readers however should mistake this verb, either on account of its occurring three times within so small a distance from each other, or because it is not elegant enough to answer the context, he may find some more noble ones in the verbs יָסַד, to break, יָקַד, to blunt, יָקַד, to tire, whose last letters being so near like the י, might easily be mistaken for it, the verb יָסַד being more familiar to them, than the others, which occur but seldom.

But after all, we very much question, whether any other change need to be made than the bare transposition of the particle ל from demamah to seharah, and so יָסַד קְסֵרָה רִמְמָה will properly signify, He makes the calm to succeed the storm, an expression no ways irregular or inelegant. The reader however may see by this one instance, how many easier ways that text might be rectified, than that which the learned author has pitched upon.

We shall end this note with one animadversion more on that learned prelate's edition, by which the reader will plainly see that his lordship is not always so happy as to take the best sense of the psalmist. We observed in a former volume , that some of the figures in that sacred book are so high and compound, that they were not easily perceived by every reader.

Our learned bishop's singular opinion of the rudeness of the Hebrew poetry, hath made him not only overlook many of them, but even quarrel with some, which, had he been otherwise prejudiced, might have challenged his admiration. One of them, for instance, is in Psalm lxxii. v. 16. This noble psalm is intitled to Solomon; but what is contained in it, is generally understood to regard the reign of the Messiah: but be that reign whose it will, here is foretold, among other great blessings, such an uncommon plenty, that Pissash bar, a little handful of corn, sown on the tops of the mountains, naturally the most barren, should outvie the fertile Libanus for increase. One would wonder how a person of his profound judgment could be dissatisfied with so elegant a phrase, and yet he tells us in his note, that unless the word pissash be allowed here to have a contrary sense, that is, to signify a great abundance, he shall suspect it to have crept in instead of some word of the like import; which would be in fact losing all the beauty of the expression, as much as if his lordship had said, that the fertile vallies ought to be inserted instead of the barren mountain tops; for where would be the wonder, that a great heap of corn, or a fertile ground, should bring forth a plentiful crop?

Of the same nature is that noble expression of the psalmist †, where he compares himself to bammesim khopsi, to a corpse secluded even from among the dead, alluding to the Jewish way of burying; for as the graves of the dead polluted the living, who came near them, so those who died a violent death, or under the anathema, were to have a grave separate from the rest, lest they should pollute even their fellow dead; and that this is the allusion here intended, is plain by the verses immediately following, and implied in the word khalalim, which should properly be rendered, not wounded, but profane, abominable, and which, mijadeca nigzaru, are cut off from thy hand, plainly shews ††; but his lordship having overlooked this beautiful figure, has struck off the word bammesim, as spoiling the sense as well as the verse; how rightly, let the reader judge.

Thus much we thought incumbent upon us to say of that learned and elaborate work, which, if it has not answered the end which its noble author proposed, may yet be read, as it was by us, with great pleasure and profit, not only on account of numberless judicious criticisms and observations which the reader will find in it, but as it will administer the greatest helps that ever were as yet thought on by any of the learned towards the recovering of the ancient Hebrew poetry. As to the rest, we dare believe, it will be no small pleasure to that learned and pious prelate, to find the discovery of his mistakes turn so much to the credit and vindication of the sacred text, and of its inspired penmen.

(E) The first book of *Esdra*s is no other than the first book of Ezra, with a variety of fabulous circumstances, particularly that of the three young men of Darius's guard, who for their exquisite wisdom in answering his questions, are there pretended to have obtained, among other marks of his favour, the liberty of returning to Jerusalem, and of rebuilding the temple (29). The Greek church is the only one that holds it among the canonical books.

The second book is acknowledged by neither Jews nor Christians, being a work which carries the manifest marks of imposture. It is falsely pretended to have been written by Ezra himself, though filled partly with rabbinic fables, such as the account of the six days creation, particularly of Behemoth and Leviathan, two monstrous creatures, designed for a feast to the elect, after the resurrection (30), and partly

- a Nebemiah, cup-bearer to the king of Persia, a Jew (F) of great learning and piety, had heard by some of his nation lately come from Jerusalem, of the ruinous condition which that city still stood in, notwithstanding the favours which that monarch had heaped on the returned Jews; being therefore backed by the queen, who is expressly said to have been at the table, when he made his petition to him^f, he obtained a commission from him to succeed Ezra in the government of Judæa, with full power to rebuild and adorn both city and temple, and with fresh orders to Sanballat, and others of his officers on this side Euphrates, to furnish him with all necessary materials out of the king's treasury. Nebemiah having gathered a fresh supply of men and women to return with him into Judæa, departed under an escort, which the king had granted, and arrived at Jerusalem, where he kept himself in private three days, at the end of which, he went in the night, accompanied with a few of his men, to take a full view of the city and walls, which he found to answer exactly the report that had been made to him of it at Sbushan. On the morrow he sent for the heads of the people, and in the great assembly opened his commission, which he told them he would immediately put in force, and set about the finishing of the wall; he divided the work between a number of great families, each of which undertook a part of a stated extent, and was to build it at their own charges; and the new governor plied them so close, that in fifty-two days they had all compleated their task, notwithstanding the many discouragements which he met with both from within, and from without^g.
- c For while the work was going on, they were forced to bear with many a bitter sarcasm from Sanballat, a Haronite (G), governor of Samaria, and some others of his officers; but this was nothing to some of their underhand plots to obstruct it; for they went so far as to hire some treacherous Jews to dishearten both the governor and people, with the specious pretence that they were sent from God to put a stop to the enterprize. Nebemiah soon found out the cheat, but foreseeing that his enemies would not fail to use force, if their subdolous practices failed, ordered the people to arm themselves even while they were at work, placed strong guards to defend them, and trumpeters at convenient distances from each other, that at what quarter soever they should chance to be attacked, the rest upon hearing the alarm, might come immediately to their assistance. But the greatest obstacle of all was, that the poorer sort, partly with some gospel notions, corrupted and fitted to the author's taste. Of this nature are the nearness of the day of judgment, the appearance of the Son of God to him, and many more not worth repeating.

Mohammed has also stuffed his Koran with some monstrous fables; he not only owns him to have recovered the sacred books, which had been in a great measure lost, but affirms that he wrote them with five pens at once. He adds, that this miracle not convincing the incredulous Jews that he had rightly performed the task, one of the company told the rest, that one of his ancestors had formerly hid a fair copy of them in the cleft of a rock; which being fetched and compared with this new one of Ezra, they found such an exact agreement between them, as convinced them that he had been supernaturally assisted in it; some other fables he adds, which the reader may find in D' Herbelot (31).

The eastern christians believe, that Ezra having swallowed down some of the mud of the well, wherein the sacred fire had been hid before the captivity, was immediately inspired, and enabled to write all the sacred books afresh (32). This seems to be partly taken out of the second book of Esdra, where that fabulous author tells us, that having begged of God to direct him how to recover those lost volumes, God gave him to drink of a liquor of a fiery colour; by the help of which he was enabled to dictate them to five scribes at the same time, who were forty days a writing two hundred and four volumes (33).

(F) The text calls him barely the son of Hachabiah (34), without informing us of what tribe he was. Some therefore from a passage in the Maccabees (35), where he is said to have offered sacrifices, and from his being reckoned at the head of the priests that signed the new covenant with God (36), have affirmed him to have been of the family of Aaron.

But as there is nothing conclusive in all this, and seems expressly contradicted by his saying in another place, that he was not a fit person to shelter himself in the temple (37); the far greater part suppose him to have been of the royal family of Judah (38); and this is so much the more probable, because we find none but such promoted to those high stations about the king's person; but never read of a priest that was so, till a long time after, and upon a quite different account, as the sequel will shew.

(G) Probably so called, because he was a native of Haronaim, a city of Moab; their other two principal enemies were Tobias the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian; all consequently ill-affected to the Jews, but now doubly so, since they were likely to be dispossessed by them of many a good estate, which they had seized on during their captivity.

who were to bear the greater share of the labour, had been so impoverished by continual extortions from the rich, even long before his arrival, that they had already been forced to mortgage their lands, sell their sons and daughters, and submit to so many other hardships, that they were quite disabled from pursuing it. Nebemiah, who expected nothing less than to hear of such horrid cruelties being committed by the Jewish rulers, upbraided them in the severest terms; and partly by persuasions, and partly by his own authority, obliged them to restore all their ill-gotten wealth to the poor owners, and at the same time took care that they should be supplied with all necessary sustenance while they continued in the work ^b; by these means he defeated the measures of the Samaritans. As soon as the wall was finished, he caused the dedication of it to be celebrated with the usual solemnities by the priests and levites (H) ¹, and ^b left the government of the city to his two brothers, Hanani and Hananiab ^k, whilst himself returned, as is reasonably supposed, into Persia (I), to obtain a new commission, the old one extending no farther than the rebuilding the city wall, which was now actually done.

The city peopled.

HITHERTO Jerusalem, large and spacious as it was, remained still but thinly peopled, the far greater part having settled themselves in the countries round about; and whenever any business called them into the city, they seldom failed returning at night to their habitations. This Nebemiah had indeed forbidden while the wall was a building; but after it was finished, they returned to their usual course. This therefore obliged him to provide for its safety, by causing a greater number of people to come and settle in it. He persuaded at first the nobler and richer to build them houses there, which they the more gladly complied with, because their country seats were very much infested with thieves and banditti, who made frequent excursions against them. After this they took in all that willingly offered themselves to come and settle there; but these not proving sufficient, he was obliged to take every tenth family by lot; so that by this time the city being well built, peopled, guarded, and fortified, it began to resume something of its former lustre ^c; and Herodotus, who saw it soon after this time, compares it to Sardis, the metropolis of Asia Minor ^m (K).

The law publicly read and expounded.

WHILST Nebemiah was thus employed in peopling and fortifying the city, adorning the temple, and rectifying of the genealogies both of priests and people (L), ^d Ezra, who had by that time finished his collection of the sacred books, was preparing himself, and some other learned priests, to make a solemn lecture of them to the whole nation on the next approaching festival, which was that of the trumpets, ushering in the new year. To this end a capacious scaffold or desk was raised in one of the largest streets of the city, that the people who came from all parts of the land to the feast might conveniently hear it. Ezra was seated in the midst with the sacred volume before him, and on each side stood six priests, well versed in the Hebrew and Chaldee,

(H) This noble ceremony, which is described in the chapter above quoted, consisted in the purification of the priests and people, that they might partake of the sacrifices that were to be offered on that solemnity. After this they assembled themselves at one of the gates, whence dividing themselves into two bands, the one of them took to the right, and the other to the left, and marched in a solemn procession round the wall, till they met each other at the temple; they were followed by the priests blowing their trumpets, and with other singers and musicians.

As soon as they were come to the temple the two choirs placed themselves opposite to each other; and while they were singing some psalms proper to the occasion, the priests offered a great number of sacrifices, especially of oxen, after which they spent the remainder of the day in feasting and mirth.

(I) This is indeed the most probable of the two, as the learned Prideaux observes (39); for as his commission was only to repair the wall of the city, the only thing he had begged of the king, it is likely he went to have it enlarged, before he undertook any thing new; besides, it is not very likely, that he would have committed the government of the city to any one, whilst himself was there present.

His great interest at the Persian court might then give such a dispatch to his business, and his return to Jerusalem might be so sudden, that he did not think it material to mention it in history.

(K) Herodotus calls it Cadysis; but whoever reads what the learned Prideaux has said on that subject (40), will easily think with him that it could be no other than Jerusalem.

(L) This had been done once before soon after the return, as we have heretofore hinted; but not so clearly, but that there were still many families of priests, levites, and of the people who could not make out their claim to their tribes, and were then suspended. It is therefore likely, that some of them were since enabled to make out their title, and were then inserted in this new register, together with those who came up with Nebemiah. Several of the old families that came up upon the first edict, might be by this time extinct; all which is probably the cause of the difference we find in the genealogies of the books of Ezra and Nebemiah.

a who did interpret in the latter what he read in the former ; and this was done, as we observed before, verse by verse, and was continued from morning till mid-day. Nehemiah then reminding them of the joyful festival they were then celebrating, dismissed them for that day, charging them to spend the remainder of it in feasting and mirth, and to make their poor brethren partake of their joy. This caution was so much the more necessary, because he observed that the people shed abundance of tears at the hearing of the law, which he interpreted to proceed from such a remorse of their past deviations from it, as was likely to damp the mirth of that solemnity ". As the people shewed a more than common desire to have this lecture and exposition continued to them, Ezra complied with their request, until he and his assistants had gone through the whole pentateuch. The grand festival of tabernacles being likewise near at hand, it opportunely happened, that that part of Leviticus in which it is enjoined, was read some days before ; by which they were made sensible, how short they had been till then of its due observation, so that the next they kept, was observed with greater strictness and solemnity than it had been since the time of Joshua (M) °.

BUT this was not all the advantage which Nehemiah reaped from this lecture of the law to such a great concourse of people ; there appeared such a lively concern in them whenever any point of the law was read, of which they knew themselves transgressors, that he made use of that happy disposition to extort from them a general confession of all their sins, and a solemn promise and vow to rectify all that was amiss for the future ; and this was accordingly complied with by all the people, especially with respect to the four following heads ; namely, not to make any intermarriages with the Gentiles, and to disannul the old ones (N) : 2. The observation of sabbaths, sabbatic years, and those divine commands which related to them, such as letting their land rest, release of servants, and the like : 3. The punctual payment of their yearly tribute to the temple, both for the repairs and the maintenance of the divine services in it ; and 4. The exact payment of their tithes, first-fruits, vows, &c. to the priests and levites P. The solemnity concluded with a generous collection, which he caused to be made among them for the service of the temple ; in which, to shew a noble example to the rest, he gave himself a thousand drachms of gold, fifty dishes, and five hundred and thirty-two priestly vestments. Josephus adds, that he built several houses for the priests in order to oblige them to reside at Jerusalem q. Sure it is, that whether his place of cupbearer had raised his fortune to such a height, which is not improbable, or whether he had a considerable patrimony, to enable him, he did many generous and public-spirited things in Judaea ; among which that of maintaining a noble table, and splendid equipage, at his own cost, without exacting the tribute assigned for the maintenance of a governor, was none of the least. Having thus with great credit and honour compleated the tenor of his commission, he returned into Persia, according to his promise to the king r, after having enjoyed the government of Judaea twelve years.

(M) It is supposed to have been at this solemnity that the notable discovery happened of the sacred fire related in the book of Massabees (41), and which we have hinted in a former volume. The Jews affirm, that Jeremiah, or some other prophet, had caused it to be hid in a dry well a little before the taking of Jerusalem (42) ; the memory of it having been still preserved to that time, Nehemiah caused it to be fetched out for the divine service.

But when they came to uncover the well, they found no fire there, but only a thick mud, which being brought however, and poured upon the wood of the altar, and victims that were laid on it, all on the sudden the sun, which had hitherto been overcast, began to shine upon it, set the wood on fire, and consumed the burnt-offerings. Nehemiah caused the rest of the mud to be fetched, and poured upon some large stones, which were immediately covered with flames, but these were presently absorbed by those that flew from the altar thither.

This wonderful accident being afterwards related to the king of Persia, he ordered the place where the fire had been kept to be surrounded, and to be looked upon as sacred and inviolable. It raised still more his esteem of the Jewish nation and religion, and his respect shewed itself in the considerable presents which he made to the priests and temple. In memory of this wonderful discovery, the Jews instituted a feast, which they called the feast of the new fire.

(N) Either those which they had contracted since the general repudiation which had been made under Ezra, or perhaps had been contracted before it, but the offenders had refused or neglected to perform that covenant ; for sure it is, that as soon as this feast was over, they set about this work afresh, and obliged as many of those offenders as were found to have strange wives (43) to repudiate them.

The temple
profaned.

DURING his absence, which lasted but five years, it is almost incredible, what a abuses were crept into the Jewish church and commonwealth; so soon were that perverse nation liable to forget their most solemn vows, and the miseries which their breach of them constantly brought upon them. Eliaſib, whether the then high-priest, or some other of the same name, who was overseer of the temple chambers, had married his grandson to the daughter of Sanballat the professed enemy of the Jews (O), and had had so much base complaisance for him, as to allow his friend Tobiab the Ammonite, another sworn enemy, a large apartment in that sacred place, from which even the Israelites, who were not of the tribe of Levi, were excluded. To this end, he caused those chambers, wherein the tythes of corn, wine, and oyl, meat-offerings, &c. used to be reposit, to be emptied for his accommodation. This mischief was followed by another, and the priests seeing the temple profaned by that stranger, their apartments given to his retinue, and gutted of that which was laid up for their maintenance, forsook the place, and went to live elsewhere, where they could; and this caused an intermission of the divine worship. It is not improbable, that Nebemias, who even at that distance he was then from Jerusalem, kept still a watchful eye over it, was soon informed of these abuses; so that having procured a fresh commission from Artaxerxes, he returned to Jerusalem at the end of five years from his departure. A less authority than his, or a man of less zeal, could hardly have ventured to reform an abuse, in which some of the greatest persons were concerned; but the base cowardise of the priest, and the impudence of the Ammonite, were too flagrant and impious to be suffered by a man of his character. As soon therefore as he was come to Jerusalem, and had been a witness of the fact, he expelled the gentile stranger out of his apartment, caused all his furniture to be thrown out, the place to be purified, and the priests and holy things to be reimplaced as formerly.

ANOTHER shameful abuse, which had crept in during his absence, was an almost total disregard of the sabbath; they threshed their corn, pressed their wine and oil, bought and sold from the Tyrians and other strangers, who affected to bring their mercantile wares into that city on that day, rather than on any other of the week; and were basely suffered to do so by those magistrates, whose business it was to have hindered it. To prevent this practice for the future, Nebemias having reprov'd those magistrates in the severest terms, ordered the gates of the city to be shut every Friday night about sun-set, and not to be opened again till the sabbath was quite over; by which means those strangers having been disappointed twice or thrice, and been threatened from the walls with some further punishment, desisted from coming any more on that day. What aggravated the folly and baseness of the Jews is, that they had among them three considerable prophets, who rebuked them severely for their crimes, and warned them of the dreadful punishments which their shameful neglect of God's laws would bring upon them.

restored.

THESE were Zechariah, Haggai, and Malachi, of whose remarkable prophecies the reader will find a short summary in the margin (P); but what the authority of the prophet

(O) The text seems to intimate at least a double alliance between the Jews and this Ammonite, besides that mentioned above; for Tobias had married the daughter of Shecaniah the son of Arach, one of the chiefs of the Jews, and his son had married the daughter of Methullam the son of Barachiah (44), one of the chief overseers in the rebuilding of the temple (45). All which being expressly forbid by the Mosaic law, and contrary to the solemn covenant they had so lately taken against such unlawful marriages, plainly shews their insincerity, and that it was not the fear of God, but of their governors, whether judges, kings, or deputies, that kept them within bounds; no wonder then, if God did so often suffer them to fall under the heavy hand of those very enemies, and to be so severely punished by means of those very alliances which they contracted contrary to his express commands, as the sequel will shortly shew.

(P) Zechariah for the number, excellency, and preciseness of his prophecies, is emphatically termed Sol inter prophetas Minores; he was cotemporary with Ezra, Nehemiah, Haggai, and Malachi, if this last be not the same with Ezra. He began to prophesy about two months after Haggai, and with him to encourage the rebuilding of the temple, by assuring them of the divine protection and blessing on the work.

But these prophecies are inconsiderable, in comparison of those which foretel the coming of the Messiah in the plainest terms; the cruel war which Antiochus Epiphanes waged against the Jews, and God's severe judgments against that tyrant; the Jewish war with the Romans, and the death of the Messiah; the annulling of the old Mosaic covenant, and the new one substituted by and under Christ; the thirty pieces of silver; the siege of Babylon by Darius, as Jeremy and Isaiah had done long before him;

(45) Ibid. iii. 4

- a prophet could not do, that of the governor's presence soon brought about; so that besides those abuses we have already observed, he rectified a number of others, which were no less enormous; one of which was the ceasing of the divine worship through the avarice of the people, who refusing to pay the priests and levites their tithes, and other dues, had forced them to seek their living out of the temple and city. All these Nehemiah restored to their former regularity, and reformed every thing that was amiss, not probably all at once, as one might be apt to think from their being mentioned together in one chapter^c, but at several times, and as opportunity served.

ALL these enormities introduced within the short interval of his absence, being manifestly owing to their ignorance or forgetfulness of the Mosaic law, did soon point out to him, that the only way to remedy them, was to enforce the frequent lecture and exposition of it, not only in Jerusalem, but also in all other cities and places of Judaea, as it had been formerly done with good success by some of the pious kings of Judah. These lectures were probably read at first in some great street or market-place, since we read of no buildings erected for that purpose before this time (Q);

him; from which it is supposed the Jews took timely warning, and retired out of it. Lastly, he speaks gloriously of the state of the christian church; of the conversion of the gentiles to it; of the persecutions which the christians should endure; and the severe punishment of their persecutors, and other such-like events contained in the ninth and following chapters of his prophecies.

Some learned critics of our church (46) have indeed suspected the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters, which are a continued discourse or prophecy of the same events, to have been of Jeremiah, because a formal passage out of it is quoted by St. Matthew under his name (47). Some other reasons they give for this their conjecture, which the curious may read in those authors.

But the general opinion is, that the name of Jeremy has crept into that place of the evangelist, instead of that of Zechariah. How long he prophesied, and what death he died, is no-where said, the Mohammedans confound him with Zecharias the father of John the Baptist.

As for Malachi, of whom we have had occasion to speak before, the current of his prophecies runs intirely against the vile abuses that were crept into the Jewish church and state, such as mixed marriages, breach of the sabbaths and sabbatic years, oppressing the poor, defrauding the priests and levites of their tithes, and such other enormities, which were afterwards reformed by Nehemiah.

(Q) We have formerly shewn †, that before the captivity, they used to assemble themselves at the schools of the prophets on the sabbaths, new moons, and other festivals, to have the scriptures explained to them; but as to synagogues, we read nothing precise concerning them.

Those that think they had them before the captivity, do indeed object a passage out of the psalms (48), in which it is said, that the heathen had destroyed sol mohadda el, or, as our version renders it, all the synagogues of God; but the word mohed signifies properly a congregation, so that the place here mentioned, might signify no more than oratories, or what the Greeks called proseuchia (49), or any of those places where the prophets read or made lectures to them. However that be, it doth not appear, that if they had any such places for the reading and expounding of the scriptures, they were under such strict regulations, and in such numbers, as we find them after Nehemiah's time.

As to the regulations of these new synagogues,

they may be reduced to the three following heads;

1. They were to be under the inspection of certain rulers, called from thence rulers of the synagogue, and by the Greek Jews *archisynagogo*i. 2. They had their stated times for coming to them, viz. on the sabbaths, and other feast and fast days, and on Mondays and Thursdays; they had also their stated hours for each day. 3. They had proper ministers appointed, some to read and expound the current section out of the sacred books, others to read the liturgy, others to sing, &c. and these, provided they were in every respect else qualified for those offices, might be chosen out of any tribe; only they took care to have always one or more of the priestly order to preside, and take care that the service was performed with due order and decency.

The person who was appointed to read the liturgy, was called sheliach zibber, that is, the angel or messenger of the congregation, because he offered up the prayers of the people to God, or was the mouth or representative of the congregation to Godward; and as a messenger from God to men was called an angel of God, so one from men to God was styled an angel of the people; in this sense the christian bishops were called the angels of the churches; this person was always one of the rulers of the synagogue; he was also called khakam, or wise, learned, as were also the other rulers, and presided in their assemblies, and some in their courts of judicature.

Next to him was the khazan, who either read or looked over those who offered themselves to read the sections of the day, and corrected them when they read wrong; this officer had the sacred books, and other utensils, under his care, and had a scriamas or servant under him who had the keys, and overseeing of the synagogue; but the khazan's chief business was to expound the portions of scripture that were read on that day, or to appoint or permit any other to do it for him, or to preach a sermon on some proper subject.

Thus, when Christ was entered into the synagogue, we read that the book of Isaiah was presented to him, which he read, and expounded to the congregation (50); the like was also done by the apostles (1). This khazan was likewise the person who gave out and began those psalms and hymns that used to be sung by the whole congregation.

2. As to the number of these synagogues, they must have far exceeded those before the captivity, if any such then were; since Maimon tells us, the rule but as they quickly found the inconvenience of it in cold and rainy weather, it is a not without good reason supposed, that this obliged them to build some convenient places to assemble in, which have been since known by the name of synagogues and schools. For the same purpose the Chaldee paraphrases, known by the name of targums, were also introduced much about the same time, to facilitate the knowledge of the Mosaic law, and of the other sacred volumes, among those who were unacquainted with the original; but as these were not finished till a considerable time after Nehemiah's death, we shall take a more proper time to speak of them. Thus far had this great man carried on the reformation of the Jewish church and state. As for the unworthy son of Joiada, whom Josephus calls Manasseh, instead of complying with the governor's orders of parting with his strange wife, he retired with her to Samaria to his father-in-law, and drew a great many other rebellious Jews after him, who had been guilty either of the same, or any of those enormous crimes, which were then reforming at Jerusalem, and went and settled themselves under the protection of Sanballat the Samaritan governor (R).

How long Nehemiah lived after he had made this reformation, whether he continued in his place of governor, and whether he died in Judaea, or in Persia, neither the text nor Josephus inform us; only the latter says, that he died in an advanced age^a; and indeed even at the time where his book ends, he must have been at least seventy years of age. In his days, and about the eleventh year of Darius Nothus, died the high-priest Eliashib, after he had enjoyed the pontifical dignity forty years; he was succeeded by his son Joiada, called by Josephus Judas^w, the unworthy father of that Manasses whom Nehemiah had forced to retire into Samaria for the sake of his beloved wife (S). Whilst that governor lived, he supported his character by the rule was, that where-ever there were ten Bathlim, or Israelites of full age, there was to be a synagogue (2); and these were so multiplied in our Saviour's time, that the city of Tiberias had no less than twelve, and in Jerusalem the Jews affirm them to have amounted to four hundred and eighty (3); if these last are not somewhat enlarged, as Lightfoot suspects, who thinks that these ten Bathlim were the elders and ministers of that synagogue (4). 'Tis plain however, that they were in great number, not only in Jerusalem and Palestine, but also in all other places of their dispersion. And even in that metropolis, we find the Alexandrines, Cilicians, Cyrenians, Asiaties, Libertines, who had their own separate synagogues (5); from which we may infer, that there were many others which belonged to Jews of other nations; and the Jews tell us, that every handicraft had also their separate ones (6); but this we will not vouch for.

We should stretch this note too far, were we to give an account of the liturgy, ceremonies, and other particulars relating to those synagogues; the reader may see them in the authors quoted in this note; and especially in dean Prideaux, who has collected all that is worth knowing concerning them, and to whom we refer those who want a fuller account of them (7).

(R) The long interval between the Sanballat, who obstructed Exra in the rebuilding of the temple, and this, whose daughter was married to Manasses, has made some writers split him into two; the one called by Exra the Horonite, and not mentioned by Josephus; and this, whom the latter calleth a Cuthaan, who went over to Alexander, especially because he is there affirmed to have come over to his father-in-law in the reign of Darius Codomannus †.

This is indeed too glaring an anachronism to be admitted; for whoever compares the time in which Nehemiah returned from Jerusalem into Persia, viz. in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes, or before Christ four hundred and forty-two, and the reign of Darius Codomannus, An. 336, must see that he could never have reached to this last; so that either we must admit two Sanballats, and two sons-in-law of the priestly race, or suppose that Josephus has misplaced him in the reign of Darius Codomannus instead of Darius Nothus, and in the high-priesthood of Jaddua instead of that of Joiada, where the text places him (8).

This is what the learned Prideaux (9) has taken a great deal of pains to prove; we shall refer the reader to him, because the argument would carry us too far. We shall only observe by the by, that upon his supposition, the Manasses, whom the same Josephus makes to succeed his nephew Eleazar (10), will not be the Manasses, who married Sanballat's daughter, and was expelled by Nehemiah (11).

As for Sanballat being called Cuthaan by Josephus, and Horonite by Exra, the latter we have shewn to have been given him from Horonaim the place of his birth, and that of Cuthaan was a name of reproach, by which not only that historian, but all the Jews called the Samaritans.

(S) Josephus adds (12), that Sanballat, to compensate him for the loss of his right to the Jewish priesthood, which his birth intitled him to, promised to make him high-priest of Samaria, and to bestow on him the highest place in the whole province. In order to which, he would cause a temple to be built on mount Garizim like unto that of Jerusalem, of which he should have the high-priesthood.

Accordingly, as our author goes on, that governor having gone over from the Persians to Alexander

- a the most exemplary zeal for religion, justice, and the good of his nation ; and the dignity of his office by a magnificent hospitality. The usual provision of his table was an ox, six fat sheep, with fowl, fish, wine, and other things in proportion ; at which he entertained, besides an hundred and fifty of the head rulers, who eat constantly with him, all the strangers of any distinction, who came from other countries to Jerusalem ; all which he supported at his own private charge, and without receiving any of the allowance which was usually paid to the governors of that province, which had preceded him. After his death, the face of that government was wholly changed. We hear no more of any governors of Judæa, but the country seems to have been joined and subject to the prefecture of Syria, from which the
- b high-priests received their authority, as shall be seen in the next section. All that need be added to this is, that dean Prideaux concludes the seven first weeks of the seventy of Daniel's prophesy with this last reformation of Nebemiab abovementioned, which was finished, according to him, in the fifteenth year of Darius Notbus. The reader may see his proofs for it in that learned author ^a.

der the Great, obtained of him, as a reward for his services, leave to build that temple, and made his son-in-law high-priest of it, so that all the apostate Jews repaired to it ; which still more increased the hatred of those of Judæa, who from that time looked upon them as schismatics.

This story carries as flagrant an anachronism (unless we suppose two Samballats) as that we spoke of in the last note ; that author tells us farther, that Manasser succeeding afterwards to the high-priesthood of Jerusalem, in right of his great uncle (or, as others read it, nephew) came and took possession of it ; but he doth not inform us how or whether he renounced his schism, nor how he was received by those of Judæa (13). We shall give a further account of the building of this Samaritan temple in the next section.

SECTION II.

The state of the Jews under the high-priests and Maccabees.

- a HITHERTO we have had Ezra and Nebemiab for our guides ; after them we have no canonical books concerning the Jewish nation, so that we shall be forced to fetch all our intelligence from those of the Maccabees, and to fill up all the chasms out of Josephus ; for as for profane authors, they were so little acquainted with the Jews, that we have little or nothing from them, but what falls in occasionally with other parts of their history. Judæa being now become more strictly a province of Syria, and under the prefecture of it, the governors committed the administration of the Jewish state to their high-priests, so that from this time we may ascribe the greatest part of those misfortunes that befel their nation to a set of men, who aspired to that high dignity more through ambition and avarice, than any real
- b zeal for their religion, or the welfare of their country. This epocha begins with a signal instance of it, which is the more remarkable, because we have it from Josephus ^a, who is not often apt to turn accuser of his brethren.

- Jobanan* succeeded his father Joiada in the high-priesthood ^b about the thirty-fourth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon. Bagoes was then governor of Syria and Phanicia, and had contracted an intimate friendship with Jeshua the brother of the pontiff, and had promised him a grant of the high-priesthood, some few years after Jobanan's investiture. Jeshua, whom our historian calls Jesus, came immediately to Jerusalem, and acquainted his brother with it ; their interview was in the inner court of the temple, where the dispute arose to such a height, that Jobanan, in
- c striving to throw him out of that holy place, gave him a mortal wound. Bagoes being informed of it, repaired immediately to the place, and upbraided the Jews in the severest terms for thus making a shambles of the temple of their God ; he next offered to enter into that holy place, but being obstructed by the priests, he asked them angrily, whether they thought his living body more impure than the dead carcase which did lie there ; and without staying for an answer, he forcibly entered in ; and being fully informed of the fact, he imposed a heavy mulct upon the temple (A), which was not taken off, till the death of Artaxerxes, which happened about seven years after, had changed the face of affairs. However, they were not altogether free from troubles in the reign of his successor ; for Ochus having conquered the greatest part of Phœnicia, as we have seen in a former volume †, marched directly towards Judæa, besieged and took Jericho, and carried off a great number of Jews captives, part of which he sent into Egypt, and part into Hyrkania, along the Caspian sea c. Whether they had engaged with the Phœnicians against that prince, or by what other way they had disoblged him, our authors do not tell us, nor whether his resentment stopped here, or was felt in any other part of Judæa. About ten years after, that is, in the eighteenth year of that monarch's reign, died Johanan their high-priest in the thirty-second year of his high-priesthood, and was succeeded by his son Jaddua ; and three years after Ochus was poisoned by Bagoas, who set up his youngest son Arfaces on the Persian throne, who was soon after succeeded by Darius III. *

In the fourth year of this prince's reign, the Jews gave him such an instance of their loyalty, as plainly shewed they had not forgot what they had suffered from Ochus for siding with his enemies. Alexander the Great having resolved upon the siege of Tyre, and being informed that the Tyrians, a nation wholly given to trade, received all their provisions from Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee, sent to Jaddua the then high-priest, to demand that supply of them, which they were wont to pay to the Persians. Jaddua modestly excused himself from complying with his demand, alledging that his oath of fidelity to Darius did not permit him to transfer that tribute to an enemy. Alexander, provoked at this refusal, had no sooner completed the siege of Tyre, than he marched strait to Jerusalem, resolved to punish the Jews with as great severity as he had done the Tyrians. He was advancing with full speed towards their metropolis, when the high-priest, and the rest of the people, sensible of their imminent danger, had recourse to God, and by their prayers, sacrifices, and other acts of humiliation, obtained a gracious promise from him, that he would protect his temple and people from the approaching calamity. It was communicated to Jaddua in a dream, in which he was commanded to go and meet the threatening conqueror, in his pontifical robes, at the head of all his priests, in their proper habits, and attended with the rest of the people dressed in white garments. Jaddua obeyed on the next morning, and having caused the gates of the city to be opened, marched in solemn procession at the head of his attendance, to an eminence called Sapha, or rather Tzaphab, because it commanded the prospect of the whole city and temple. d

As soon as the venerable prelate was got near enough for Alexander to view the magnificence of his dress, especially the sacred name of God engraven on the front of his mitre, he was seized with such an awful respect, that, to the great surprize of his retinue, who were already glutting their eyes with the prospect of a rich plunder, and a dreadful slaughter, the monarch advanced towards him, and with a religious kind of veneration bowed to him, embraced him, and paid an adoration to the sacred inscription on his forehead. Whilst the Syrians, Phœnicians, and others that were present, stood amazed at the sight, Parmenio, with his usual familiarity, ventured to ask him the reason of his unexpected behaviour, and was answered by the king, that this respect, which was not paid to the priest, but to his God, was an acknowledgment for a vision of the like nature, which he had favoured him with e

(A) This fine, which our historian says, was fifty drachms, to be paid out of the sacred treasury for every lamb that was offered in the temple, can hardly be thought considerable enough to extort such a complaint from him, if it was only confined to those two lambs that were offered in the daily sacrifice. For fifty drachms amounting but to a little above thirty-one shillings of our money, seven hundred and thirty lambs, the number offered every year, would amount but to eleven hundred and forty pounds twelve shillings.

Some therefore have thought there was an error in Josephus, and that the fine was five hundred instead of fifty drachms, though all the copies have it fifty ; but even this would be still too inconsiderable, considering how he inveighs against it as a great oppression ; besides, those governors were seldom so moderate in their fines, especially where the crime was so enormous.

We may therefore more reasonably suppose, that it was to be levied on all the lambs, not only of the daily sacrifices, but on those of all the other festivals, which amounted to a much greater number, as the reader may see by what has been said in a former volume, and on all those that were offered by private persons, whether by way of free-will offering, or upon any other cases, wherein the law required it †.

- a at Dio, in which he promised to him the conquest of Persia, and encouraged him in this expedition by a person with much the same aspect, and the same venerable dress with the pontiff now before him. He then gave orders to march on to Jerusalem, and was attended thither by the high-priest and his retinue, and conducted to the temple, where he caused a great number of victims to be offered to the God of the Jews. Here the priests shewed him the book of Daniel, wherein it was foretold, that a Greek should in time conquer the Persian empire; and Alexander understanding it of himself, went away highly satisfied with what he had seen and heard. On the next day he called the Jews together, and asked them what request they had to make to him, and was answered by the high-priest, that they only begged of him, the liberty
- b of living according to their laws, to have the free exercise of their religion, and to be exempt from tribute every sabbatic or seventh year, seeing they were forbidden by their law to sow or reap in those years. The same favour they likewise begged of him in the behalf of their brethren, who dwelt in Babylon and Media; all which being readily granted by the conqueror, he offered the Jews to receive into his army all that were willing to list under his standards, and to grant them the free exercise of their religion, which drew a great number of them into his service ^d.

THE Samaritans on the other hand, less scrupulous about their oath of fidelity, had shewed themselves more complying to that monarch's demands; and besides other supplies, had sent him eight thousand men to assist him at the siege of Tyre. As

- c soon therefore as they were informed of the king's disposition towards the Jews, they began to entertain some hopes that this was a proper time to apply to him for some such-like grants for themselves, to which their late services, they thought, did better intitle them, than the Jews disobedience to his orders. Besides, they were always ready to claim kindred with them, whenever matters went well on their side; but as ready to drop, or even renounce it, whenever they saw them in any danger or disgrace. Scarce therefore was the king got out of Jerusalem, before they came in
- d great pomp to invite him to honour their city and temple (B). Alexander did seemingly give them a gracious reception, but put off the desired visit till his return from Egypt. They then petitioned that they might, like their brethren of Judaea, be exempted from the tribute of every seventh year, since, like them, they neither sowed nor reaped in those years. They were thereupon asked, what country they were of? and upon their answering that they were Hebrews, but called Sichemites by the Sidonians, the question was put peremptorily to them, whether they were Jews? But

(B) Josephus expressly mentioning this temple, doth plainly shew, that it was built long before Alexander; and not, as he elsewhere tells us, by leave of that monarch obtained by Sanballat, whilst he was with him at the siege of Tyre; for that siege lasted but seven months; and supposing that he had stopt another two months at the siege of Gaza, as the same author pretends, yet all this put together would scarce have sufficed to lay the foundations of such a great building, much less for the finishing it.

But, as the learned Usher observes, it is not likely that he should take Gaza in his way from Tyre to Jerusalem, because this last did lie at some days journey's distance on this side Gaza, so that in that case he must be supposed to have past it by, and then returned to it again with his army; and who can believe that he would penetrate so far into Judaea, and leave Jerusalem untaken, especially when he breathed nothing but revenge against that metropolis (14)?

Add to this, that all other writers of Alexander's wars tell us, that he went directly into Egypt after the taking of Gaza. However, granting he spent those two months in that siege, what are nine months towards rearing such a building? For this and some other reasons, there have not been wanting those who have looked upon this contest between the Jews and Samaritans, as an invention of the Jewish historian, trumped up to give a kind of preference to his own nation.

But this is perhaps saying too much; however a temple there was built upon mount Garizzim, which it finished in Alexander's time, must have been begun long before his coming into Judaea, let the Samaritans have their permission from which soever of the Persian monarchs; though, if we were to venture our conjecture, might it not have been obtained from Ochus, and about the time when the Jews had incurred his displeasure, either for siding with the Phœnicians, or for some other misdemeanor; and might not the Samaritans, who watched all opportunities to get the better of them, have so far ingratiated themselves into that exasperated prince's favour, by renouncing, as usual, all kindred with them, as to obtain a grant to build a temple for themselves?

This once supposed, there will be time enough for that work to be finished by or even before Alexander's time, and the Sanballat of Nehemiah may have probably have lived to have laid the foundation of it. This will likewise in some measure account for Josephus's anachronism, which may be no other than a wilful oversight, it being a less disgrace to his nation to represent this grant as obtained, not for any misbehaviour of theirs, but for the services done by the Samaritans.

they, afraid perhaps to answer in the affirmative in a place where they could be so easily confuted, did then disown the title; and the king, who had not leisure then to inquire further about it, dismissed them with a promise that he would examine their claim after his return. He did so accordingly, and granted them the same exemption as he had the Jews; for those Samaritans who had assisted him at the siege of Tyre, having likewise signalized themselves in Egypt, which that prince conquered with a surprizing quickness; it is not improbable, this immunity was granted to them as a reward for their services. In the mean time the temple at mount Garizzim proved the source of continual evils to the Jews, and the constant asylum of their apostate brethren, who never failed to go over to the Samaritans, as soon as they found themselves in danger of punishment for any enormous crimes^a.

Alexander at the same time was no less kind to the Jews, a great number of whom, at his return into Alexandria, he settled there among other nations, and endowed with many privileges and immunities, allowing them the free exercise of their religion, and admitting them to the same franchises and liberties with his own Macedonians^b. But what gave them the greatest advantage over their Samaritan rivals, was an insurrection made in their capital against his favourite Andromachus, whom he had made governor of Syria and Palestine. The Samaritans upon some discontent against him, run in a tumultuous manner to his palace, set it on fire, and burnt him in it; which so exasperated that monarch, that he caused all that had had a hand in that atrocious deed to be put to death, and the rest to be driven out of the city, which he repeopled with his own Macedonians, and granted the rest of the territories to the Jews^c. From this time, those that survived the slaughter having settled themselves at Shechem, that city became the metropolis of the Samaritan sect^b. As for those eight thousand, who had served under him, he sent and settled them in Thebais, the remotest part of Egypt, to prevent their raising any fresh insurrection among their countrymen. As for the Jews, they continued still in his favour both in Palestine and out of it, only those that were in his army, were like to have forfeited it by their stiff refusal to assist at the rebuilding of the temple of Belus, which that monarch had began. They urged in vain, that their law, of which they were promised the free exercise, forbade them to have a hand in such an idolatrous work; they were made^d to undergo some severe punishments, but to his surprise, they bore them with such invincible constancy, that being more overcome by it than by their other pleas, he discharged them from his service, and sent them into their own countryⁱ; and he himself dying soon after, left his empire in the confused state we have seen in a former volume^{*}. Four years after him died also Jaddua the Jewish high-priest in the twentieth year of his pontificate, and was succeeded by his son Onias, who enjoyed that dignity about one-and-twenty years.

WITH Alexander died the prosperous state of the Jews, and their country being situate between Syria and Egypt, became subject to all the revolutions and wars, which his ambitious successors waged against each other; being successively invaded and captivated by the Syrians and Egyptians, and constantly oppressed under either government. At first it was, as we have seen elsewhere, given, together with Syria and Phœnicia, to Leomedon the Mitylenian, one of Alexander's generals^k, and confirmed to him by a second partition treaty; but he being soon after stripped of the other two by Ptolemy, Judæa was the only one which stood firm to him from a sense of their oath of allegiance; so that the Egyptian king was forced to invade it with a powerful army, and accordingly did lay close siege to Jerusalem. The place being^e strongly fortified by art and nature, might have found him work enough, had not a superstitious fear of breaking the sabbath prevented the besieged making any defence on that day; which being understood by the king, he caused it to be stormed on the sabbath, and took the city accordingly without any opposition^f (C). This did not however

(C) This is the account we have from the authors quoted above; and we shall meet in the sequel with some other instances of the Jews chusing to be all massacred, rather than fight or fly on the sabbath; but Josephus, loth to expose this weakness of theirs, has given this transaction another turn, and pretends that Ptolemy having been peaceably admitted into the city, under pretence of offering some sacrifices

- a however prevent his treating them with great severity; he carried near a hundred thousand of them captives into Egypt, but reflecting soon after on their known loyalty to their former conquerors, and the sacred regard they paid to their oaths, and being by the taking of Jerusalem become master of Judæa and Samarita, he committed the keeping of several considerable garisons both here and in Egypt to them; and having made them swear allegiance to him, and to his heirs and successors, he endowed them with the same privileges they had enjoyed under the Macedonians. Of those whom he carried away into Egypt, he chose about thirty thousand of the stoutest to fill his garisons, the rest he sent, some to assist them with provisions, others into Libya and Cyrene (D), which he had lately subdued ^m. Aprian adds, b that he demolished the walls of Jerusalem before he returned home ⁿ. However, he shewed such kindness to those Jews that came to settle in Egypt, that great numbers of them being attracted, partly by the fertility of the country, and partly by the great privileges they enjoyed, flocked thither from other parts ^o.

- By this time the Samaritans, who daily increased in number, strength, and wealth, by the continual concourse of apostate Jews, made Shechem their metropolis, enlarged and beautified it, and, as we hinted before, made it the head of their schismatic sect; and as they were neither so scrupulous about their oaths of allegiance, nor so tenacious of the precepts of the Mosaic law, as their rivals of Judæa were, they seldom made any scruple to side with the strongest, and, if occasion c required, to comply with the will of their princes, even in things which were absolutely forbidden by their law. This policy, which they never lost sight of, as the sequel will soon shew, not only freed them from the many persecutions which the Jews underwent, but made them fare much better under every government than they, so that from this time, not only those who fled from punishment from Judæa, but a much greater number came over to them to avoid, either persecution on account of their law, or the tyranny and oppression of their governors. As therefore this sect d became so numerous and powerful, as to make a considerable figure in the Jewish history, our readers will doubtless expect to be informed how far their religion agreed or differed from that of the Jews; and by what strange arguments they have, ever since their separation, endeavoured to prove their claim of precedence to, and to retort the imputation of schism upon them, since we have already seen that they were originally a mixture of Cutbeans, and other foreign nations, sent thither by the Assyrian kings instead of the ten tribes carried away captive by them, and now become a more mixed and mongrel nation by the constant resort and incorporation of all the renegade Jews. This digression, if it be really such, is so much the more necessary here, because it will be impossible without it to dive into those perpetual jars and disputes that have been ever since, and are still carried on between those two nations with the utmost irreconcilable hatred. However, that we may contract as much as possible, we shall only give here what is most material concerning their tenets, e and throw all their fabulous authorities and pretences, as well as those of the Jews against them in the margin (E). The following articles therefore are a short summary of their faith in common with, and in opposition to, that of the Jews.

There is indeed nothing in that prince's character, but what shews him to have been capable enough of such perfidy; but it is not so probable, that the Jews, so strongly attached to his enemy, could be weak enough to admit him into their city, especially with an escort sufficient to subdue it; besides, it is plain, that he treated them, not like friends that had given him an amicable entrance, but like a victor that subdued them by force of arms.

(D) From the latter of these were descended the Cyrenean Jews, among whom was Jasan, author of the history of the Maccabees in five books now lost, but of which the second book of the Maccabees is an epitome (15); of the same country were those Cyrenean Jews mentioned by St. Luke (16), and that Simon who helped to bear the cross of Christ (17).

This Jewish colony grew in time so numerous, as to have a thousand of them put to death for one mutiny in Vespasian's time; and yet in a succeeding reign, they proved strong enough to master the whole province, and, as Xiphilinus tells us, in the life of Trajan, to massacre two hundred thousand inhabitants of other nations.

(E) We shall begin with the account which the Samaritans give of their origin, in opposition to that which we have from the sacred books, concerning them: 1st. They boast themselves descended from Joseph by Ephraim; they pretend, that when Joshua entered into the promised land, he caused a temple to be built upon mount Garizzim, and appointed Rux of the seed of Aaron to officiate as high-priest, from whom they boast to have an exact genealogy, and uninterrupted succession, down to this very time. They neither own Jeroboam's schism

1st, They believe in one God, and in his servant Moses, and that Garizzim is the only place of God's worship. The Jews, say they, follow other teachers, other precepts, taken from their other books, traditions, and expositions: we stick close to the five books of Moses, and reject all other writings, all other authority and interpretation, and guide our faith and practice solely by the precepts of our law-giver. Accordingly they never admitted any other books but the pentateuch (F).

2dly, They always circumcise their males on the eighth day, never deferring it upon any account, as the Jews do, some of them till the hour of death (G).

3dly, They never allow themselves to have two wives, or to marry their neices; but the Jews do both.

schism (18), nor the transmigration of the ten tribes (19), but give the following account of their going out, and returning into the land.

The kings of Jerusalem and Syria, say they, having revolted against Babthnezzar (so they call Nebuchadnezzar) he came and took Jerusalem, and went from thence to the Shechemites, whom he ordered to leave that country in seven days under pain of being all massacred, which they did accordingly. The strangers whom he settled in Judea and Shechem soon after, could not live there, because the fairest fruits of the land were tainted with a mortal poison; the king of Babylon having thereupon consulted some of the ancient inhabitants, was answered, that the only remedy to that evil, was to send the Hebrews thither again; which that prince having agreed to, a place of rendezvous was appointed for the Jews and Shechemites, to return together each into his own land.

Here a dispute arose between them, whether they should go and rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, or that of Garizzim. Zerubbabel was for the former, and Sanballat for the latter, and each pleaded the sanction of the pentateuch, and each pretended that the copy of his antagonist was corrupted, that of the former being expressly for Jerusalem, and the other for Garizzim.

To end the dispute, they agreed, that that copy, which withstood the fiery trial, should be the authentic one; upon which Zerubbabel having flung his own into the fire, it was immediately consumed, whereas that of the Samaritan chief came three times untouched out of the flames.

This miracle, they add, having determined the controversy in their favour, the king honoured them with rich presents, and sent Sanballat at the head of his ten tribes, to take possession of mount Garizzim, where he rebuilt the temple in dispute. This account they give us out of an old Samaritan chronicle, which they pretend to be of great antiquity and authority; but those who have examined it, tell us, that it was written in the reign of some of the christian emperors, and after Constantine (20), unless we suppose it to have been continued from time to time. However, let the chronicle bear what date it will, it is plain by the Samaritan woman's question to our Saviour (21), Our fathers worshipped on this mountain, and ye say, that Jerusalem is the place, that they claimed this authority long before; and accordingly, their pentateuch, of which we shall speak by-and-by, among other interpolations, has changed the word Ebal for that of Garizzim, where-ever those two mountains come in competition.

The Jews on their side have not been sparing of their fictions, as if they had chosen to confute their antagonists by this way, rather than by the authority of the sacred books. Josephus tells us of much such another contest that happened in Egypt, between those of his nation and the Samaritans about these two temples; and which arose to such a height, that it was like to end in a sedition, had not Ptolemy Philometor put an end to it in the following manner (22).

He ordered the contending parties to bring their cause before him, and to have it pleaded by proper persons, with this condition, that those who were cast should lose their heads. There appeared but one advocate for the Jews, viz. Andronicus the son of Messalamis; but he pleaded his cause so well against his two antagonists, whom our author names Sabbaus and Theodore, that he gained his point, and they lost their lives (23).

Another ancient author (24), whom the Jews pretend to have lived before the destruction of Jerusalem, but by his mentioning of the Saracen empire, must have wrote at least six hundred years after (25); tells us, that when Ezra and Nehemiah were rebuilding of the temple, the Samaritans came with an army of a hundred and eighty thousand men to besiege Jerusalem; but that those two chiefs having assembled three hundred priests, did pronounce the higher excommunication against them. These priests were followed by three hundred young men, who held each a copy of the Mosaic law in one hand, and a trumpet in the other, which they blew whilst the priest were excommunicating them, upon which they were immediately put to flight.

(F) In consequence of this, they reject all the prophetic and historical books, as written in favour of the Jews, and especially of the house of David; they despise the Jewish pretence of oral tradition, and all their targums and talmuds.

They value themselves for having preserved the ancient Hebrew character, and curie the new one, which was since introduced by Ezra, whom they brand with the name of impostor, and who, they pretend, substituted it to the Mosaic one for the sake of those other books which he foisted into the Jewish canon (26).

(G) Especially in countries where they are not tolerated, such as France, Portugal, Spain, &c. and where, for fear of being discovered by the scar of circumcision, they wholly neglect it, and outwardly conform with the religion of the country for the sake of trade. Some of them however, when they are grown either rich enough, or old and quailish, will come over into England, Holland, &c. to be circumcised. As for those that die without circumcision, some of their friends generally come and circumcise them in their coffin, and lay the prepice by them, after which the coffin is immediately nailed, and carried to the grave.

- a 5thly, They observe the sabbath with the greatest strictness, never meddling with their wives on that night, lighting no fires, nor stirring from their houses, unless to go to the synagogue, where they read some portion of the pentateuch, offer up their prayers to, and sing the praises of God.
- 6thly, Of all their solemn festivals, the passover is by them esteemed the chief; they likewise observe the other two of pentecost, and of tabernacles, with great exactness, and the grand fast of expiation with uncommon strictness.
- 7thly, They never offer any sacrifice but on mount Garizzim P.
- 8thly, They boast a continued succession of priests from Ruz the son of Phineas, the catalogue of which is preserved by them with utmost strictness; and their high-priest always makes his residence at Sbechem, now called Naylouse, from whence he issues out his directions to the whole sect for keeping their festivals, and whatever relates to the Mosaic observances (H). From this short scantling of their faith and practice, one would be apt to conclude, that except those points which related to their schism, they had been much stricter observers of the Mosaic law, than the Jews; but, whatever they may have proved in later times, we shall meet with such flagrant instances of the contrary in the sequel of this and the next section, as will easily convince how ready they were, upon the least danger of persecution, or severe usage from their governors, to sacrifice their religion to their interest and safety. However, even in this one point of their schism, it is manifest, they were guilty of
- c most flagrant forgery in corrupting their pentateuch in many places, in order to colour their setting up a new temple with some shew of divine authority. 'Tis true, all the variations of this book are not of the same heinous nature, some of them seem even imputable to the ignorance of the transcribers from the new Chaldee of Ezra to the old Samaritan character, such as their often mistaking of letters, in the former by reason of their similitude, as the beth for the cath, the daleth for the resh, which in the Samaritan are very unlike. Others again may be looked upon as explanatory interpolations, such as we have observed, Joshua and his successors down to Ezra and beyond, have thought necessary to add to the text. But there are certainly several notorious ones, which could not but be designedly made to support their cause against their
- d Jewish antagonists. The reader may see some few of them in the margin (I), enough, however, to convince him that this Samaritan is not the only true authentic copy, because in the old Hebrew character, and that of Ezra only a transcript of it, because in the new introduced Chaldee, as some learned men have thought, and particularly

(H) This sect is still very numerous, not only in their metropolis, but in Damascus, Gaza, Cairo, and other parts of the Ottoman empire, besides those which are dispersed into the northern parts of Europe and Asia. But so ignorant are those of Turkey, especially of cosmography, wherever they may be as to their religion, that they took the English Jews to be of their sect, and England to be only a considerable city (27), as appears by a letter they wrote to them some time since, and mentioned by the author last quoted; but if they really held those tenets which the Jews attribute to them, they must have been no less ignorant in point of their religion. Among other errors they charge them with, that of believing the godhead to be a corporeal being, would be sufficient to shew their stupidity, but Credat Judaeis.

Epiphanius, who ranks them in the catalogue of his heretics (28), tells us, that they worshipped the Tetraphims, which Rachel had stolen from her father Laban, and which they digged up from under the oak, where Jacob had buried them; but, it's likely, he took up this calumny upon some Jewish authority. He adds, that they were, like the Jews, divided into four sects (29), and gives us there the different tenets of each, but they are not worth dwelling upon.

A modern traveller informs us, that in a letter

they wrote to him (29), they acknowledged the book of Joshua; but they meant most probably their chronicle we have lately mentioned, and which they style the book of Joshua. However, a more righteous judge than the Jewish rabbies, has summed up their character in few words, when he told them that they worshipped they knew not what, and that salvation was of the Jews (30).

(I) We have already taken notice of their substituting the word Garizzim to that of Ebal in that place of Deuteronomy, where God commands the Israelites to build an altar (31); according to which corruption, they pretend that Joshua actually built the said altar on Garizzim, and that it is the same they have sacrificed upon ever since.

2dly, They have interpolated between the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth verses of the eighteenth chapter of Exodus, all that we read in the first of Deuteronomy from the ninth to the fourteenth verse inclusive; and in the tenth of Numbers are inserted the sixth, seventh, and eighth verses of the first of Deuteronomy, between the tenth and eleventh verses. All which are doubtless wilful corruptions to serve their cause. These and all the other alterations in that pentateuch, the reader may see carefully collected by the learned Hottinger (32), and in the collations made in the last volume of Walsley's polyglot.

a modern one ^a, who has given it by far the preference above the Jewish; those who are acquainted with his notions, need not be told what induced him to this unaccountable partiality.

How and when this manuscript came into the hands of the Samaritans, is hard to guess; the general opinion is, that it was brought into Samaria by the priest, whom Ezrabaddon sent to instruct the new inhabitants of that country. The book was not unknown to several ancient fathers, particularly Origen and St. Jerom, who both understood the Hebrew tongue; but they have given us no light about it. The opinion of some learned moderns ^b is, that it was brought to Samaria by Manasses, Sanballat's son-in-law lately mentioned, and that it was transcribed from that of Ezra, since we find in it all the emendations and explanations which that inspired scribe is supposed to have made to those five books; and consequently could be of no older date, much less have been brought by that Hebrew priest above-mentioned (K). However, each system has its difficulties, which are not easily solved; all that we shall add concerning this book is, that besides this copy written in their old character in the Hebrew tongue, they had another written in the vulgar language spoken among them, because like, the Jews, they had forgot the old Hebrew, and were accustomed to a mongrel mixture of Affyrian, Babylonish, and Chaldee. Besides this, they had a Greek version of it for the sake of their hellenistical brethren, as the Jews had the septuagint; and it is probable, that this was the version which is mentioned by several ancient fathers ^c, since they cannot be supposed to have understood either the original one, or the vulgar version of it. The old Hebrew copy did afterwards remain unknown to the christians during near ten centuries. Scaliger was the first modern, who got intelligence of it; after which it was brought over into Europe, and printed in the polyglots of Paris and London, the latter of which is by far the best and most correct, as well as the Latin version of it ^d; the further particulars of it we refer to the margin (L):

(K) If it be asked, how he could instruct those strangers in the worship of God, unless he had brought some such a book along with him from the place of his captivity? some answer, that he taught them no more than he knew by tradition (33); others distinguish between the whole pentateuch, and an epitome of the law contained in some of the chapters of Deuteronomy (34), which is that which they suppose he brought with him to Samaria, since both kings and priests were bound to keep a copy of it written with their own hand. Their reason for so thinking is, that if they had had the whole pentateuch, it is hardly to be supposed they would have continued so long in their idolatry. But here they forget that even this epitome contains as strong and severe prohibitions and threatenings against it, as can be found in any other part of the Mosaic books; so that it is more likely their attachment to their country gods, rather than the want of proper books to instruct them, was the cause of their so long dividing their worship between the God of Israel and their own.

A late critic has made a bold, but strange push to reconcile all these difficulties, by absurdly supposing the pentateuch to have been written on the other side Euphrates, by the priest, who was sent from thence into Samaria, for the instruction of those strangers. To this end, he, it seems, thought fit to give them a short sketch of the creation, flood, and other occurrences, that happened before the giving of the Mosaic law; and that he wrote it in the old Hebrew, because he was unacquainted with the Chaldee; and that this happening precisely at the time, when the Jewish volume of the law was found out by the high-priest, and brought to Josiah, he got a copy of it, and inserted it at the end of his own work, as very proper to bring men to the knowledge of the one true God; and, lastly, that the Jews finding nothing to object against the author, or his work, have adopted the latter as conformable to their law and history. This critic has not ventured to set his name to his book, but sent it abroad under a fictitious title (35); however, Ex angulo leonem, he was not long undiscovered or unconfuted.

Upon the whole, the general opinion is, that this pentateuch was brought by the priest sent by Ezrabaddon into Samaria, and that after the rupture of the Jews and Samaritans, the latter wilfully corrupted those places of it which made against them, and consequently that the Jewish one is by far the more authentic of the two.

(L) Scaliger having received from the Shechemites an account of this pentateuch by a letter which he published anno 1676. acquainted him among other things with this pentateuch, did in another work (36) complain that none of the learned of Europe had endeavoured to procure some copies of it, seeing it might probably be of great service in adjusting the scripture chronology. This awakened the curiosity of archbishop Usher, who, as he tells us in his letter to L. Capellus, had observed that this book had been quoted by several ancient fathers, and other writers, down to Gaza and Syncellus, and particularly by the learned Origen in his book against Celsus: From that time this great prelate spared neither pains nor cost, till he had procured five or six copies of it from Syria and Palestine, and compared them with the Jewish; and here he thought he had found out the person who had corrupted them, namely one Dosithheus,

- a We return to Judæa, which we left in the possession of the king of Egypt, but which he was, about five years after forced to abandon to Antigonus and his son, who came against him with a superior army. Ptolemy contented himself with demanding the cities of Ace, Samaria, Joppa, and Gaza, and to carry off an immense booty, as well as a great number of inhabitants, whom he settled in Alexandria, and endowed with considerable privileges and immunities, as Alexander had done before him. He was then designing to make that city the metropolis of Egypt, and was so well satisfied with the faithfulness and usefulness of the Jews, that he spared no encouragement to allure them thither; insomuch that vast numbers flocked continually to it from Judæa and Samaria, chusing to live under so generous and friendly a prince in a foreign country, rather than in their own, under the tyrannical government of Antiochus (M)^a. Thus was Judæa become the subject of the disputes of, and scene of war between Antigonus king of Upper Asia, Seleucus king of Syria, and Ptolemy king of Egypt. The partisans of this last pretended that he had not undertaken to put Asia under the government of Seleucus, but upon condition that Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia should be relinquished to him. Those of Seleucus on the contrary maintained that Ptolemy was no further concerned in the war, than to help him to conquer those provinces allotted to him; in proof whereof, they urged, that after the defeat of Antigonus, Lyfimachus and Cassander had assigned those provinces to Seleucus^w. Accordingly we find that this last enjoyed that of Judæa some while, with a tax of three hundred talents of silver, upon condition that the Jews should be governed by their own laws, and that their high-priests should be their only governors^x.

- This prince very much imitated the clemency and generosity of the Egyptian king, a character which was quite opposite to that of Antigonus, who was of such fierce nature, that he stuck at no cruelty, falsehood, or tyranny, that served his turn. This made great numbers of the Jews to fall away likewise from that tyrant to Seleucus, who gave them much the same privileges and franchises that his competitor did in Egypt. He built sixteen cities in Lesser Asia, which he, from his father, called Antioch, nine he called by his own name, and six by that of his mother Laodicea; three from his first wife Apamea, and one from Stratonice his last wife; in all these he settled such considerable colonies of the Jews, especially at Antioch in Syria, that they became almost as considerable a part of those cities, as they were at Alexandria. Hence that nation came to spread themselves over Syria and Lesser Asia, whilst Judæa became still thinner of its own inhabitants, till it was again recovered by Ptolemy; after which they came still over to him from the provinces of Antiochus, and still increased the number of those whom he found in Babylon; from all whom he received such Dofueus, mentioned by Origen against Celsus; but this discovery has not been universally received. However, it is from his copies that Walton printed that pentateuch in his polyglot, since then several other copies were procured from the same place by other learned persons in Europe (38). Those who are willing to know more of the Samaritans, and their pentateuch, may consult, besides the letters of Scaliger, Leudolph, and Usher abovementioned, the authors quoted in the margin (39).

(M) Among those Jews whom Ptolemy's kindness drew into Egypt, Josephus (40) mentions Hexechias, one of the chief priests, a man of learning and probity, and about sixty years of age, who became acquainted with Hecataeus the Abderite, a person trained up under Alexander the Great, and now in great credit at the Egyptian court. Him Hexechias did so well inform of the religion, laws and customs of the Jews, that he wrote a history of that nation down from Abraham to his time. The book is now lost; but Josephus quotes so many passages out of him in favour of the Jews, that a heathen writer, who lived in Trajan's time, did very much question either the genuineness of the book, or the sincerity of the author (41). Had he been better acquainted with them, he would never have called either in question; and it is more than probable, that Hecataeus's great opinion of them procured the nation greater favours from Ptolemy, than they might have otherwise met with.

The Jewish historian quotes another story out of the same author, to shew how far his nation was averse to the superstitions of the heathens. It is of one Mosollam a Jew, who was such an excellent marksman, that he shot a bird dead with his bow, whilst a soothsayer in their company was persuading them to observe its motion, and steer their course by that of the bird. This action having drawn some bitter invectives against our Jew, from his superstitious fellow-travellers, he only laughed at their folly, for expecting to learn their fortune from a bird, that was so palpably ignorant of its own. Whether Mosollam was more minded to display his skill in shooting, or exploding the superstition of other nations, 'tis but too plain, those of his own were generally of another mind, with respect to soothsaying, astrology, divinations, and such-like superstitious trash.

Before Christ

Soon after the recovery of Judaea by Ptolemy Soter died Simon the Jewish high-priest in the ninth year of his pontificate ¹. He had succeeded his father Onias, and had been so eminent for his sanctity and integrity, which shone in all his actions, that he was surnamed the just. He was the first pontiff of that name, and the excellent character which the author of Ecclesiasticus gives of him ², shews how highly he deserved the surname which his nation had given him. But he was no less remarkable for his other virtues, as a Jewish prince and governor, witness his repairing and fortifying the temple and the city with high and strong walls, his famous cistern covered with brass, which he caused to be made in Jerusalem, as a reservoir for water, and which ^b was of such capacious circumference, that the author compares it to a sea; but his most considerable work was the finishing the canon of the Old Testament, of which we have already spoken (N). He left a son named Onias, but he being then but an infant, Eleazar, Simon's brother, was substituted high priest in his stead. He executed this office fifteen years, but with this difference; that whereas all the high-priests before had set as presidents of the synagogue, or grand council of the Jews, Simon was succeeded in this last dignity by one Antigonus of Socbo, a man of great learning and piety ³. This man, who the Jews tell us was the master of Saddoc, the chief of the Sadducean sect, taught that our serving of God ought to be free either from slavish fear of punishment, or from selfish hope of reward; and be wholly disinterested, and ^c flow from the pure love and fear of that Supreme Being. Hence his disciple being unable to relish such a spiritual doctrine, took it into his head that his master meant no more by it, than that there were neither rewards nor punishments, nor even life after this; which notion became in time so rise among the richer sort of Jews, that they monopolised all the great places in church and state, as we shall see in due time.

Antigonus by this became the head of a new kind of synagogue, which continued from this time to that of Jebudab Hakkodesh, the compiler of the Mishna, as the old one had from Ezra to Simon the just; the difference between them was, that the old one had bestowed their time and labour in collecting, revising, and completing the ^d canon of the Old Testament; the latter was wholly employed in expounding and commenting upon it. These therefore, whom the authors of the New Testament call

(N) It has been already observed, that the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and of the chronicles, could not have been inserted into the canon by those two inspired writers; first, because there are in them some marginal corrections, which must have been inserted by some of their successors; and, secondly, because some genealogies are carried down vastly beyond their time, some even down to that of Alexander the Great.

The book of Ezra likewise seems to have been written after their time, and, as some think, the prophecies of Malachy. As therefore this Simon the Just is by all the Jews mentioned as the last of the great synagogue we have elsewhere spoken of, and was a man of such eminent piety and learning, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he put the finishing stroke to the sacred code, either by inserting the books abovementioned, or, if they had been received before, by revising and giving a final sanction to them.

As for the genealogies, whoever continued them, that work seems to have been done before him. Had he been the author of them, it is likely he would have brought them down nearer his time.

However from his pontificate is dated the completing of the sacred canon of the Old Testament, which was thenceforward received and conveyed without revival or correction; from this time the Jewish doctors applied themselves wholly to study, explain, and comment upon them, and their explications were in time received with as great submission as the sacred books themselves.

This is that Simon of whom the Talmudists tell us so many wonders, some of which we have formerly mentioned [†], such as that during his priesthood the scape-goat was always broken in pieces down the precipice, which was an omen of God's acceptance; but after his death the Saracens used to catch and eat it; that the ribbon tied about the neck of it always appeared white, another good omen, but after him it appeared oftner red; they tell us likewise (42), that during his time the western branch of the sacred candlestick never went out; that the shew-bread, and two loaves of the first-fruits, used to be multiplied to such a degree, as to suffice all the priests who were then upon duty; that two sticks thrown on the fire of the altar kept it burning and clear all the whole day; with some other such tokens of the divine favour, which ended with his death. All which, those who are acquainted with the allegorical language of the Talmudists, are so far from understanding either as literal truths, or as fictions of those writers, that they rightly look upon them as so many figurative phrases to express the flourishing condition of the Jewish religion and commonwealth, which from that time began to go from bad to worse, till the brave Maccabees raised it again to its ancient lustre.

- a by different names, such as doctors, scribes, lawyers, rulers, and such-like, affected to call themselves Tannaim, or traditionalists ^b, because they handed down their expositions and doctrines by oral tradition to their disciples; and their authority once quoted in any of their schools upon any point, either put an end to the controversy, or the recusant was looked upon as an apostate from his master; and as all other disputes in political affairs were to be decided by the law of God, of which these Tannaim were the interpreters, so they were chosen also to assist, and some of the most considerable for learning, zeal, &c. to preside in all the courts of judicature, from the sanhedrin or great council of the nation, consisting of seventy-two, down to the more inferior ones, which they had in every city; and upon this account they were also called counsellors ^c.

- Ptolemy*, surnamed Philadelphus, having succeeded his father in Egypt, the Jews found in him as great a protector, as they had in Ptolemy Soter; and with this advantage, that the son being a great lover of learning, and upon the point of rearing his noble library at Alexandria, as we have elsewhere described ^d, did strive to oblige them with greater favours than any of his predecessors had done, in order to obtain from them a copy of the sacred books, to be translated into Greek, and deposited there among that immense number of volumes which he had procured from all parts of the world. This version is that which is commonly known by the name of septuagint; our great Usher places the making of it in the seventh year of that monarch's reign; we have already mentioned something of it in the place above quoted, where we promised to speak more fully of it in this chapter. And indeed, when we consider how much this performance has been celebrated, not only by the most learned Jewish writers, but also by the ancient fathers, as well as many celebrated moderns; how much it has been cried up, as a work manifestly conducted by a miraculous providence, and as such referred to and quoted both by our Saviour and his apostles, and by all the primitive writers of the christian church; it will perhaps be expected, that we should be somewhat copious upon it. But when we reflect on the other hand, that all those eminent writers have not only blindly followed their romantic leader, but have in many cases embellished his surprizing account of this transaction; that Aristeas, the first broacher of this history, has only covered himself with the personage, if not with the name of a heathen writer, and an officer of Ptolemy's guards, that he might be the more liberal of his incense to the Jewish nation; that he is guilty of several flagrant anachronisms, and of a manifest falshood at the very threshold of his account, in making Demetrius Phalereus, the pretended promoter of this great work, a great favourite of the king, when the contrary plainly appears from what we have formerly said on that head in our third volume ^e; when we consider that Josephus, Aristobulus, a Jewish peripatetic philosopher, Philo, the Talmudists, and other rabbies, either only copied, or in some cases improved upon him; and lastly, that those ancient fathers, Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Cyril, Chrysostom, Austin, Epiphanius, and others, have too greedily swallowed up the Jewish account of this pretended miraculous version, by reason of the preference which Christ and his apostles seem to have given it either to the original, or to the other versions then extant, not perhaps so much upon its being more authentic than any of them, much less than the original, as because it was the most in vogue, and best understood by the generality of the Jews; we hope, upon all these considerations, our readers will easily excuse our not entering into so spacious a field, and be content with the succinct account we shall now give them of it in the margin (O).

(O) The account we have of this version, out of the book which goes under the name of Aristeas, and out of those other authors who have followed him, is in substance as follows: Ptolemy Philadelphus, a great lover of learning, was enriching the noble library which had been begun by his father, when Demetrius Phalereus, who had the inspection of that work, acquainted him that there were certain books held sacred among the Jews, which highly deserved a place in his collection, if they could by any means be procured. He advised him at the same time of a method in all likelihood the most effective to prevail upon the Jewish sanhedrin to send those volumes, together with a sufficient number of learned men to Alexandria, to translate them into Greek, namely by a general redemption of all the Jewish captives that had been taken during the late wars.

Upon inquiry, the number of them was found to amount to about a hundred thousand; at which Ptolemy was so far from being discouraged, that he caused an edict to be issued out for a total release, and the sum of twenty drachms per head to be paid for their redemption out of his own treasury; so that

ALL that we shall add here, will be two or three remarks concerning this work ; a the first is, that there was near that time a version made of the sacred Hebrew books into Greek, and with which the hellenist Jews were so highly delighted, that Philo tells us ^a, they instituted an annual feast in memory of it, and made a yearly visit, in solemn procession to the isle of Pharos, where it had been made by the seventy-two Israelitish elders : whereas the more zealous hebraising Jews, who looked upon it as a vile profanation of their holy religion, conceived such horror against it, that they instituted a fast in memory of it. These even add, that the day on which it was began, proved as fatal to the Israelites, as that on which Jeroboam set up the golden calves at Dan and Beit-el, and that the sky was covered with thick darkness three days successively ^b. The Samaritans have likewise laid claim to the glory of ^b this that the whole amounted to six hundred and sixty talents. Josephus, who has only abridged that author, doth yet differ from him, in that he makes the price of every redeemed slave to have been a hundred and twenty drachms, and yet the sum total to have amounted but to four hundred and sixty talents, though there were, according to him, a hundred and twenty thousand persons released (1).

After this signal favour to the Jewish nation the king sent a splendid embassy laden with presents to Eleazar the then Jewish high-priest ; who on his side readily complied with the king's request, and sent him, with the copy of the sacred books, written in letters of gold, seventy-two Jews, well skilled in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, and a letter of thanks for his noble presents, in which he congratulated him on his glorious undertaking, and wished him good success in it.

Ptolemy received the interpreters with uncommon respect, and paid such a regard to the sacred volume, that he bowed himself seven times down to the ground before it ; after which he entertained his guests with suitable magnificence seven days successively, assuring them that he should esteem the day of their arrival as an addition to the glory of his reign. They were conducted three days after into the island of Pharos, which stood about seven furlongs from Alexandria, where Demetrius placed them in a sumptuous edifice, conveniently situated near the shore, and where they set immediately about the work.

Their method, according to Aristeas, was to set at it from six in the morning to three in the afternoon ; after which they returned into the city, where they had their victuals and other necessities prepared for them at the king's expence. Whenever any difficulty was started, they debated it in a full assembly ; and when the point was settled, a fair transcript was made, and sent to Demetrius, till the whole version was finished, which took up only seventy or seventy-two days.

Philo, an Alexandrian Jew, who was sent on an embassy to Caius Caesar, soon after our Saviour's death, has greatly improved the story of Aristeas, and speaks of this version as altogether miraculous (2) ; for he adds, that upon comparing the several interpretations of those seventy men, which, according to him, had been carried on by each of them separately, there was not found so much as the difference of a word between them all ; but that they had rendered every period, not only in the same sense, but in the same phrase, word, and order, throughout the whole ; from whence he infers, that they were all divinely inspired. He mentions nothing either of Aristeas or Demetrius Phalerens, probably because he would not be suspected of having copied and enlarged the former.

Justin Martyr, who has adopted this extraordinary addition of Philo, tells us (3), that Ptolemy had caused the interpreters to be shut up, each in a separate cell, to prevent their communicating their thoughts to one another ; that by the conformity of their several translations, he might the more easily judge of the faithfulness of the whole version. He adds, that when they came to be compared together, there was such an exact conformity between them all, that the king, who looked upon it as altogether miraculous, sent the interpreters home laden with honour, and with the richest presents ; and received their writings with that veneration which was due to books divinely inspired. And as a further confirmation of the whole, he tells the Greeks, to whom he writes, that he had seen those very cells, whilst he was at Alexandria, and that those that shewed them to him assured him, that they had the whole story from undoubted tradition.

His account of this version is somewhat different, in another work of his (4), where he tells us, that Ptolemy sent to Herod king of the Jews, for those sacred books ; and that upon their being sent in their original tongue and character, which were unknown in Egypt, he had been forced to send to him for some interpreters to translate them into Greek ; which being likewise complied with, copies of that version were still every-where to be seen in the hands of the hellenist Jews in his time.

After this ample testimony of the good and learned martyr, we need not wonder if so many ancient fathers (5) have embraced the story, and looked upon that version as divinely inspired ; and some of them have given it even the preference to the original, in those places where the difference between them could not be reconciled (6). Epiphanius, who lived about the middle of the third century, and pretends to have preserved the letter which Ptolemy wrote to the Jews to obtain this version from them, has given us a copious account of it (7) ; and to what has been said by Aristeas, and the other authors abovementioned, has added some other circumstances by way of improvement ; such as that there were but thirty-six cells, into which the interpreters were shut up by two in each ; that they had no windows, but received their light from the top by sky-lights ; that each couple had a book given them to translate, which when finished, was conveyed to the next cell, and so on to the third, fourth,

- a this version, and pretend that their high-priest, as well as that of the Jews, having been invited by Ptolemy to come at the head of a number of learned men to carry on the work, upon a review of both translations, that of the Samaritans had been preferred to the Jewish one, and placed in the library of the Egyptian monarch †.

But whether all the books of the Old Testament were translated at once, and by the same set of men, or, as some contend for, only the five books of Moses, we have no sufficient ground to affirm; the latter doth however appear the more probable of the two from the difference of style and exactness, which manifestly appears in them; for that of the pentateuch is not only more faithful and agreeable to the original, but seems somewhat more ancient, and in the Alexandrian dialect; whereas that of the other books is more loose and incorrect, and sometimes renders the same Hebrew word differently from that of the Mosaic ones, which seems to intimate, that they had been done by different hands, and at some distance of time. Thus much however is more than probable upon the whole, that if the first version went no farther than the pentateuch, the hellenist Jews, who found so great a benefit from it, did not go long without having all the rest of the sacred volume translated in the same tongue.

THE second is, that our learned Usher has fixed the time of this version to this year, as he believed the main part of the history, which we have of it under the name of Aristeas, to be true and genuine; for had he placed it later, it could not have coincided with the time of Eleazar, who is there mentioned as the Jewish

&c. and so on to all the rest, by which means each book was translated thirty-six times; that they were confined to their work from morning to evening; after which each couple was conveyed in a separate boat to the royal palace, where they supped with the king; after which they were shut up, each in their separate chamber, till the next day, when they were again conveyed to their respective cells.

When the whole book of the Old Testament had gone through the thirty-six couples, their versions were read before the king, by thirty-six readers, whilst a thirty-seventh held the original in his hand, with which they were compared; and at the end were found to agree in every respect both with the Hebrew, and with each other, to such a degree of exactness, that Ptolemy looked upon those interpreters as divinely inspired, and caused their several works to be deposited in his library of Bruchium, which, as we have observed in the history of Egypt (8), held the first, as that which was called Serapaeum, held the second rank.

The Talmuds of Jerusalem and Babylon agree in most of these particulars abovementioned, but pretend that Ptolemy sent for those seventy-two Jewish elders, without acquainting them what work he designed to set them upon, till they were arrived at Alexandria, when he caused them to be all shut up, each in a separate cell, and gave them the sacred books to translate. Some of those ancient rabbies there quoted, say indeed, that he sent only for seven of them, which was indeed more than enough for the work; they all agree with the rest, that God did so direct their pens, that all their versions were exactly agreeable both to each other, and to the original.

Lastly, and to name no more, St. Clement of Alexandria (9), and Eusebius (10), quote some fragments out of one Aristobolus, a peripatetic Jew of Alexandria, who is said to have wrote a comment on the pentateuch, and to have dedicated it to Ptolemy Philometor, to whom he had been tutor. In which dedication he mentions this Greek version, which had been made by Ptolemy's command, and under the direction of Demetrius Phalerens.

The two fathers above-mentioned quote therefore this comment to prove the possibility of Pythagoras, Plato, and other Greek philosophers, having taken most of their philosophy out of the sacred volumes, since they had been translated so long before in that known language.

The reader may see by what has been extracted out of all those authors, both Jewish and Christian, that the story of this version has gained considerably by every hand it has gone through; and this improvement, as well as some other variations which are found among those writers, is one main argument why the far greater part of our modern critics reject it as a Jewish device calculated to advance the glory of that nation.

But this is not the only plausible argument against it. We have observed in the text above some material objections that are justly urged against the pretended Aristeas, who is the first writer of this story, particularly, that he was a Jew in disguise, notwithstanding his pretending to be a heathen, and one of Ptolemy's guards; and this appears first from his style, which is fraught both with hebraisms and with panegyrics on the Jewish nation. 2. The praises he gives to the Egyptian king and court, are not only apparently false, but seem also calculated to advance the credit of the Jews.

The vast expence which he makes Ptolemy to have been at to get this version perfected, and which, put together and computed at the most moderate rate, must have amounted to near two millions sterling; the sending for seventy-two elders, that is, six out of each of the twelve tribes at a time, when the names and tribes of Israel were absorbed into that of Jews, seems only a compliment on the Sanhedrin, which consisted of that number, especially considering that a much smaller one would have sufficed for the work; the extraordinary answers which those interpreters are said to have given extempore to the king's questions; and lastly, the story of Demetrius Phalerens being such a great favourite with that monarch, and the victory which the latter is there affirmed to have gained at sea over Antigonus, and which is mentioned by no other writer; all these put together, render the whole account very incredible. But our design is not here to confute it, but to direct our readers to those authors who have wrote more copiously on that subject, and which he will find in the margin (11).

high-priest, who sent the seventy-two translators into Egypt, and who died about the ^a beginning of the following year; and had he placed it earlier, it would have been before Ptolemy had married his sister Arsinoë; whereas the Jewish pontiff is there introduced as complimenting that princess, in his letter to the king, as his sister and queen.

OUR last and most material remark is, that whatever wonders and fables the Jews may have invented, and the Christians swallowed, concerning this version, yet it was not without the conduct of a divine providence, that these sacred books were translated into a tongue so universally known and spoken, so many centuries before ^b the completion of those prophecies, which they contained, and which were in due time to be fulfilled by and under the promised Messiah. Had those divine oracles been kept still in the hands of the Jews, and in their original Hebrew till the preaching of the gospel, they must have lost a very considerable part of their evidence; which by their being promulgated in so known a language, and dispersed so far and wide, is now rendered unquestionable and irrefragable. Without such a version and publication of that sacred volume, it would have been extremely difficult, notwithstanding the manifest impossibility of a combination between the Jews and the Christians, to have persuaded an unbelieving world that those prophecies had not been stamped, after their completion, as Porphyry and other enemies of christianity absurdly affirmed: whereas this version, and universal dispersion of them through so many distant parts of the known world, puts it beyond all question, that they were previous to their completion, at least by some centuries, and owe consequently their origin to persons divinely inspired. We have had occasion to speak of several of them in our former volume ^c; those that relate more particularly to the Messiah, will be best seen in the sequel of this chapter. We shall only observe with respect to the latter, that when the primitive fathers, who were ignorant of the Hebrew, did quote those prophecies from this septuagint version, the hellenist Jews found themselves so streightly pinched by them, that they grew as much out of conceit with it, as they had before admired it. This dislike produced those Latin versions of it, which were afterwards known by the names of their authors, Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, and, not unlikely also, that discordance, which is found in the various manuscripts of the Greek one, the ancientest and most correct of all which, in the judgment of those who have thoroughly examined it, is that which is known by the name of Alexandrian, and is now in the king's library at St. James's. A further disquisition upon this head would doubtless be out of our province; and it is, we hope, sufficient to have referred our readers in the foregoing note to those critics who have treated of it more at large.

WE return now to the reign of Ptolemy, under whose benign influence the Jews, enjoying all the tranquillity they could wish, made use of that interval to study and explain the sacred books. They kept open schools, and Antigonus Sochæus was at the head of them; he died in great esteem of his nation, though Sadoc and another disciple, named Baitbus, forsook him and his doctrine to spread their own new-fangled epicurism. He had two successors, namely Joseph the son of Joazer, who took the title of Nassi or prince, and Joseph the son of John, who took that of Ab-beth-din, or father or president of the sanhedrin; and these did jointly read their public lectures at Jerusalem ^d; the Jewish chronologers last-quoted place Antigonus's death about the end of the twentieth year of Ptolemy's reign.

ON the other hand, some other contending monarchs shewed no less a desire to ingratiate themselves to the Jews, particularly Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, and grandson of Seleucus, granted to those of Ionia the same privileges and franchises with the Greeks. This prince held out a long and bloody war against Ptolemy Philadelphus, which was at length terminated by a treaty of marriage, wherein the former was to marry Berenice the daughter of the latter, and to repudiate his first wife Laodicea; but he having broken his contract by a series of enormous murders, as we have elsewhere related ^e, was become so odious to all his subjects every-where, that Ptolemy Euergetes, who had succeeded his father in Egypt, did easily dispossess him of the provinces of Syria and Cilicia, besides several other cities of Asia; all which did readily open their gates to him upon his first appearing. Euergetes in his return from all these conquests, past through Judæa in his way to Egypt; and coming to a Jerusalem, offered a great number of sacrifices at the temple there, as an acknowledgment for his late successes *. It is thought that this preference, which that prince shewed to the God of Israel, before the deities of Egypt, was owing to his having been shewed the prophecies of Daniel, in which those great and swift conquests had been foretold. By this time, Onias II. the unworthy son of Simon the just, was entered into the pontifical office. During his minority, his uncle Eleazar, the brother of Simon, had been invested with that dignity, and enjoyed it near thirty years; it is during his pontificate that the septuagint version above-mentioned is supposed to have been made. When Eleazar died, Onias, though above thirty years of age, was for some reason or other set by from the high-priesthood to make way for his great

b uncle Manasses, the son of Jaddua, the uncle of Simon the just; but Manasses being then very old, and dying soon after, Onias ascended the pontifical chair in the thirty-second year of his age, and in the thirty-sixth year of Ptolemy Philadelphus, but in an unlucky hour for the Jews. Onias, who was of a base, sordid spirit, neglected every thing but hoarding up of treasure, and was like to have ruined the Jewish state by his avarice, had not a near relation of his found out a notable expedient to save it †.

Judæa had till then been taxed at the yearly tribute of twenty talents of silver, which sum his predecessors had constantly paid to the kings of Egypt; but Onias growing more covetous, as he grew older, had sunk that money into his own coffers, instead of sending it to the king's treasury. How long he had gone on in arrears, our author doth not tell us; but they were grown to such a height, that Ptolemy Euergetes thought fit to send Athenion, one of the officers of his court, to demand them of that pontiff, threatening him at the same time, that if they were not immediately payed, he would drive all the Jews out of their country, and repeople it with new colonies of his own. This threatening and unexpected demand put the whole city into the utmost consternation, and Onias, who valued neither his dignity nor nation, in comparison of his money, was the only person who remained insensible of the danger; being resolved to sacrifice both to the resentment of that prince, rather than refund any part of his stolen pelf. His sister had then a son by her husband Tobias, who,
d though young, was highly esteemed for his piety, justice, and prudence; he was then at his country seat, where his mother sent him word of the peril into which her brother's fordidness was like to involve the whole nation. Joseph, that was the noble youth's name, lost no time to come and expostulate with his uncle. He upbraided him in the strongest terms for basely preferring his ill-gotten riches to the sacredness of his function, the safety of his country, and especially of his friends and relations; and finding him deaf to all he urged, he advised him at least to take a journey into Egypt, and endeavour to obtain a remission, either of the whole, or part of the debt. All the answer he could get from the resty old pontiff was, that he never coveted either his dignity or government, and that he was resolved to forego them both, rather than
e take such a long journey. There being no remedy left, but to offer himself to go and apply to the Egyptian monarch, he easily obtained his uncle's consent to it. He then convened the people into the temple, the then usual place for holding their public assemblies; and there endeavoured to dissipate their fears, by promising them that he would shortly go down into Egypt, and find some effectual means, if they approved of his enterprise, to reconcile the king to them.

Joseph's policy to save his country.

His proposal having been received with universal applause, Joseph went immediately to Athenion, invited him to his house, and entertained him in a sumptuous, but obliging manner, all the rest of the time he stayed in Jerusalem; and upon his departure, made him several considerable presents. This noble carriage failed not to have the f desired effect. The Egyptian deputy promised to set the whole matter in a favourable light before the king, and Joseph on the other hand promised to follow him soon after, and to give that monarch full satisfaction for all that had passed during his uncle's government. Both these did punctually perform their promise; Athenion, upon his arrival at court, did loudly exclaim against Onias's sordidness, but said at the same time so many things in praise of his nephew, that Ptolemy had already conceived a high esteem for him; and Joseph on the other hand, having borrowed twenty thousand marks from the bankers of Samaria, set out for Alexandria with a handsome equipage. Egyptian court, we have seen elsewhere *. So that having by his address obtained a the farming of the provinces Cælo-Syria, Phœnicia, Judæa, and Samaria, and borrowed a considerable sum of his Egyptian friends, he returned to Jerusalem, attended with an escort of two thousand men, to assist him in collecting the royal tribute, and to punish those who should refuse to pay it. The Ascalonites were the first who felt the severe effects of his authority. They had not only disobeyed his commands, but had even loaded him with bitter invectives, so that, to prevent the infection spreading further, he was forced to make a severe example of them to the rest. He caused twenty of the ring-leaders to be hanged, and confiscated their estates, out of which he sent a thousand talents to the king, with an account of what he had done. He treated the inhabitants of Scythopolis after the same manner; and these were the b only ones that ventured to follow those of Ascalon; the rest being all over-awed, did willingly open their gates, and pay their taxes, and Joseph at the same time that he remitted them into Egypt, did from time to time send some presents to his friends there, to keep up his interest at court. As for the king, he was so pleased with such a considerable augmentation of his revenue, that he continued him in his office two and twenty years, during which time he gained an immense treasure, under the reigns of three Ptolemy's, namely Euergetes, Philopator, and Epiphanes, the son of Philometor, who was dispossessed of those provinces by Antiochus the Great, as we have shewn in a former chapter 8. After which Epiphanes, having again recovered them by a marriage with Antiochus's daughter, he was again restored to his farms, and enjoyed them c many years after, even, as our Jewish historian tells us, to the day of his death. The reader may see what we said on this head in the place above quoted †.

Joseph by this time had seven sons by one of his wives, and an eighth named Hyrcau by his brother Selinus's daughter, whom he had made him marry, instead of a beautiful Egyptian dancer. Joseph, whilst in Egypt, had seen this fair woman at some of the public shows, and was fallen in love with her; he was ashamed to discover his weakness to any but his brother, who promised to procure her to him; but instead of her, he converted his own daughter into his bed; and when the cheat was discovered, Selinus did so well expostulate the matter with him, that he easily convinced him that he had acted a friendly part in preventing his exposing himself to the d contempt of the Egyptians, by marrying such a public actress. Joseph, satisfied with his reasons, took his new wife home, and had this Hyrcau by her, who proved such a promising youth, that he soon ingrossed his affection from all his other brethren, and the sequel will shew that he was really deserving of it †.

Ptolemy Philopator.

In the interim, Ptolemy, surnamed Philopator, succeeded his father Euergetes in Egypt, not without strong suspicion of his having dispatched him by poison, as he was indeed profligate enough for such a deed; and Simon II. had succeeded his father Onias soon after in the high-priesthood at Jerusalem. This pontiff was of a quite different spirit from his father; he was a man of great piety and zeal, of singular conduct and courage; all which were put to a severe proof before he had passed the e first year of his pontificate. He was moreover free from that sordidness and avarice which had proved so detrimental to the Jewish state during his father's office; for besides those dangers which his wife nephew had the address to avoid, they had suffered a constant series of evils from the Samaritans, ever since these last came to be aware of the baseness of the Jewish pontiff. Nothing less indeed could be expected from that exasperated nation, who watched all opportunities to vent their malice, than that they should take the advantage of their weak government to insidiate and oppress them. Accordingly, Josephus tells us, there was scarce a year in which they did not make some incursion, ravage the country, and carry away captives, during the whole time of that cowardly priest †. But to return to Philopator, we may remember he was like f to have lost Palestine by the treachery of Theodore, governor of Phœnicia, who had rebelled against him, and engaged to put that province, together with those of Judæa and Cælo-Syria, into Antiochus's hands, who had always looked upon them as dismembered from his own kingdom. The plot having been timely discovered, Antiochus openly invaded Gahlee, took a great many cities on both sides Jordan, particularly Philoteria, on the north side of the sea of Tiberias, Bethshan, or Scythopolis, on the south, and Itabyrium, strongly situated on mount Tabor. From thence he took all the land that had formerly belonged to the two tribes and half on the

- a other side Jordan; but winter drawing near, he left five thousand men there under the command of Hippolochus and Keræas, two other revolters from Ptolemy, to keep the country in awe till the next spring. By that time Ptolemy came with such a powerful army against him, that he defeated him in a set battle, and forced him out of those provinces; after which all the cities did readily open their gates to the conqueror, and sent their ambassadors to make their submission and presents to him*.

- THE Jews, always attached to the Egyptians, were some of the forwardest to come and congratulate him upon his late success. They were kindly received by him, and among other marks of his favour, he told them, that he designed to go to Jerusalem, and offer his sacrifices to their God. He did so accordingly, and besides b a great number of victims which he there offered, he made some considerable presents to the temple; but this munificence gave them but a short-lived joy, which was soon after turned into the deepest mourning. The beauty of the temple, and the splendid order and decency of its worship, did unhappily raise in the king a curiosity of seeing the inside; and Simon II. who then officiated as high-priest, failed not to represent to him the sacredness of the place; the entrance of which was by their law forbid not only to strangers, but even to the Jews themselves, who were not of the sacerdotal order; he even ventured to denounce some heavy punishment from God, in case he presumed to profane his temple, whilst the priests were humbly surrounding him, to obstruct his passage, and the people, in the utmost consternation, sending c up their cries to heaven to avert his design. All this opposition made that obstinate monarch more resolute, and having forced his way through the outward courts, he was going on to enter into the holy place itself, when God smote him with such a dread and terror of mind, as put a full stop to his further progress. He was carried out half dead by his attendants, and as soon as he was come to himself, instead of adoring the powerful hand that had smitten him, he breathed out the most dreadful threats, not only against those who had dared to oppose his will, but against the whole nation. Soon after which he departed from Jerusalem, full of the deepest resentment, the sad effects of which he was not long before he made them feel, by one of the dreadfulest persecutions that that unhappy nation had ever suffered, but d which was happily stopped by the singular interposition of providence. We have given an account of this wonderful change in a former volume †; and all that we shall add here is, that as their constancy to their religion had obtained this miraculous deliverance, it drew as heavy a punishment on those who through fear had apostatised from it. Ptolemy, now more than ever convinced that the Jews were protected by a divine power, and that men, who could be thus faithful to their God, could never turn rebels to their prince (P); among other marks of his favour and high esteem, did at their earnest request grant them full power to inflict what punishment they thought fit on those few apostates, who were soon after put to death, to the number of three hundred, as a warning to future ages. The Jews thus
 e happily delivered, erected a stately pillar, and instituted a festival in memory of it, which was observed during several centuries after. This remarkable history however has been omitted by Josephus; he says nothing of it in his antiquities, and as for what we find of it in his book against Apion, besides that it is only in the Latin version of Rufinus, and not in the original, it is there said to have happened under Ptolemy Physcon, so that the book out of which this persecution and deliverance is taken, seems to have been unknown to the Jewish historian. We shall refer the reader to the margin for a further account of the book and its authority (Q).

(P) They gave that prince soon after a noble instance of this, when he was forced to make war against his rebellious Egyptians, in which the Jews proved so faithful to him, that sixty thousand of them lost their lives in one battle (44).

(Q) It is improperly called the third book of the Maccabees; for it is prior to the other two in point of time, and to the second book in point of authority. As for the word Maccabee, of which we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the sequel, it was used by the Jews to signify those brave heroes, who either stood up in defence of, or suffered for their religion; and therefore that name is given to this book, as it contains the history of that persecution which the Jews suffered at Alexandria, and were like to have suffered in all the dominions of Philopator. Who the author of it was, is not there said; but he is supposed to have been an Alexandrian Jew, who has embellished his history after the manner of his nation, with some enlargements, and couched them in a romantic style, not very likely to raise the credit of it, though the main purport of Ptolemy Philopator died some time after, and left the kingdom to his son, surnamed a Epiphanes; who being then but between four and five years old, gave a handle to his two competitors, Antiochus the Great, and Philip of Macedon, to join their forces to divest the young monarch of his whole kingdom (R); the former was to invade the provinces Palestine and Phœnicia, and the latter Egypt, and each was to keep all he conquered. On this occasion the Jews wonted loyalty failed them, so that they took part with Antiochus, who made a quick progress in that province, but was again as quickly deprived of it by Scopas the Egyptian general, who reduced the Jews to their former obedience. This advantage however proved but short-lived, and the Syrian king soon recovered it all from him; and in this second expedition the Jews did do him such signal services, that he resolved to spare no favour to fix them ^b to his interest; for when Scopas had only the citadel of Jerusalem left, into which he had thrown a strong garison, they received the Syrian troops and elephants into that city, and assisted them with all their power, to drive the Egyptians out of it, which was soon accomplished by their united strength (S).

Antiochus therefore, willing to gratify the Jewish nation for their so freely engaging in his interest against the Egyptians, sent a letter to Ptolemy, his then general, which has been preserved at length by *Josephus*¹, and in which having related the great services which that people had done him, he acquaints him that he designed to restore

of the story he nevertheless acknowledged to be true; for the Jews have undergone many such persecutions, and have been sometimes as wonderfully delivered.

The time in which this book was written, is thought to be after the other two of the Maccabees, and that of the son of Sirac, called Ecclesiasticus (45). What is related in the beginning concerning Theodorus and Artaxerxes, seems taken out of Polybius, and therefore is supposed to have been written after this last (46); and yet both authors might have it from more ancient records, so that no sure inference can be made about it.

It was written originally in Greek, and is quoted by some ancient fathers (47) as canonical, but disputed by others, and was once received in the same apostolic canon with the other two; but the vulgar version has never admitted it, though the greatest part of the septuagint copies now extant have it, particularly our Alexandrian one; but this last not being in use in the western church at the time of the reformation, but the Latin only; that is the reason why our English bibles have it not, though it may much better deserve a place in it than some other apocryphal pieces that are in it.

There is still another book of the same name, commonly known by the name of the fourth book of Maccabees. We have often quoted it in the sequel of this chapter, though the author sometimes clashes with Josephus, and other historians. Archbishop Usher quotes likewise sometimes an Arabic version of it, which has been printed in Mr. Le Jay's polyglot; the book itself is very much unknown to the Latin fathers, and the Greek ones by whom it is mentioned, differed much about its author. The reader may see all that is worth knowing concerning it in Calmer's preface to it, and we shall here own once for all, that it is to him we owe all the following quotations out of that book.

(R) The second year of this young monarch's reign being according to the Jewish chronology the three thousand five hundred and sixtieth year of the world, those authors tell us, that Joshua the son of Berachiah was chosen Nassi, or president, and Nathan the Arbélite, Ab-beth-din, or vice-president of the Sanhedrin, and of the divinity school at Jerusalem. They add, that when Alexander the Assyrian king of Judea put the Jewish doctors to death, for having dared to rebuke him for taking upon him the high priesthood, as well as the regal dignity, Joshua fled into Egypt, and that Jesus of Nazareth followed him thither, and became his disciple (48).

One may see by this what wretched chronologers the Jews are, since that Jewish year of the world was many years before that Assyrian king, and above two hundred years before the birth of Christ (49).

(S) Our author doth not tell us the reason of this defection; but it is likely, that Epiphanes's minority had encouraged his governors in those provinces to load them with heavy taxes, and such-like oppressions, especially Scopas, who was of such a rapacious temper, that he stuck at no rapine or cruelty to enrich himself.

On the other hand, Antiochus had shewed himself a great friend to the Jews that were in the province of Babylon and Mesopotamia, and had granted them such great privileges, as might easily induce those of Judea to prefer his government to that of the Egyptians, by which they were now so much oppressed, Josephus tells us further, that the Babylonish Jews had shewed such an attachment to that prince, and done him such signal services, that he confided the guard of his strongest and most considerable garisons to them, and sent them into several provinces to quell his other seditious subjects. All which, being so many arguments of the great trust he put in them, could not but be highly pleasing to those of Palestine.

But whatever was the cause of this change, the same author tells us, that Antiochus no sooner came with his army, than they cheerfully surrendered themselves to him; and that on his appearing before Jerusalem, the priests and elders went out in a solemn manner to meet him, and make their submission to him; they then received him into their city, and entertained both him and his army, his horses and elephants, and furnished him with arms and other necessaries for the war (50).

- a their metropolis to its ancient splendor, liberty, and privileges, and to recall all those Jews who had been driven out of it : that out of his singular respect to the temple of their God, he granted unto them twenty thousand pieces of silver, towards the charges of victims, frankincense, wine and oil ; one thousand four hundred measures of fine wheat, and three hundred seventy-five measures of salt, towards their usual oblations : that the temple should be thoroughly repaired at his own cost : that they should enjoy the free exercise of their religion, restore the public service of the temple ; and the priests, levites, singers, &c. to their usual functions : that no stranger, or Jew that was unpurified should enter within the sept (T) of that sacred place : and that no flesh of unclean beasts should be brought into Jerusalem, not even their skins ; all these under the penalty of paying three thousand pieces of silver into the treasury of the temple. He further granted an exemption from all taxes for three years to all the dispersed Jews that should come within a limited time to repeople that metropolis : and that all that had been sold for slaves, within his dominion, should be immediately set free. By all these extraordinary favours, Antiochus did so fasten the Jews to his interest, that not only Judea, but all the other neighbouring provinces readily submitted to him, and that monarch having in the space of one campaign subdued and quieted them, returned to his capital, and passed the winter there.

- ABOUT three years after this died the high-priest Simon II. and was succeeded by his son Onias III. a person of great piety, clemency, and worthy to have lived in better times than those of his pontificate proved, and of a better end than he met with, as the sequel will shew. This is the pontiff, to whom our learned Usher supposes Aræus king of Lacedæmon sent a letter, of which an account has been given in a former volume * ; but we have there shewn the impossibility of his being the person, and that it could be no other than Onias the first of that name. In the eighth year of Onias III. the Jews lost their great friend and protector Antiochus, who was murdered by the people of Elymais, as has been related in a former volume †. They found as kind a one in his son Seleucus for some time. The Jews were then in such high esteem, that sovereign princes courted their friendship, and made magnificent presents to the temple ; and Seleucus furnished out of his own treasury all the expences of it. Judea enjoyed a profound peace, and their laws were observed with great strictness under their worthy high-priest, until a misunderstanding which happened between him and Simon a Benjamite, brought a series of evils on the Jewish state.

Onias had then enjoyed the sacerdotal dignity about sixteen years ; and Simon had been made governor of the temple. Perhaps that place was devolved to him from Joseph, the generous son of Tobias lately mentioned, whose son he is supposed to have been ; when an uproar happening in the city, caused this fatal breach betwixt those two great persons in the eleventh year of Seleucus. The author doth not tell us upon what account this tumult was raised. We shall give the best conjecture we can about it in the margin (V), it being a sequel of the history of Joseph and his son *Hyrca*n, and

(T) This inclosure, which the Hebrew called Chel, was that which separated the circumcised from the uncircumcised, within which therefore it was unlawful for the latter to enter (51).

(V) We have lately taken notice of Joseph's progeny, and, among others, of his worthy son *Hyrca*n. The father being, before this time, grown so old, that he could not go down to congratulate the Egyptian king in person on the birth of his son, offered that office to all his other seven sons ; none of whom being willing to accept it, *Hyrca*n undertook the journey, having first obtained a letter of credit from his father on his Alexandrian agent, for what sums he should want to defray the charges of his commission.

It being then the usual custom to make those monarchs some considerable presents upon such occasions, *Hyrca*n having drawn one thousand talents from his father's banker, bought one hundred beautiful youths for the king, and the same number of the fairest damsels for the queen, which were presented to them with the addition of a talent which each of them brought in their hands ; so that this single article amounted to four hundred talents. The rest he either bestowed in presents to the great ones of the court, or spent it in making a suitable figure during his abode there ; so that the whole expence of this expedition amounted to two hundred thousand pounds sterling ; whereas his father supposed that the one hundredth part of that sum would have defrayed the whole expence.

If *Hyrca*n therefore, by this uncommon munificence, secured to himself the favour of the Egyptian court, it did no less expose him to the anger and resentment of his old father and brethren ; inasmuch that the latter way-laid him in his return, with a design to murder him ; but *Hyrca*n, who had obtained the reversion of his father's farms, had provided himself with such a strong escort, that two of his brethren were killed on the spot, and the rest put to flight.

This increased still their enmity, especially when, after his father's death, he went to levy the yearly tribute in his stead ; and this raised him so many enemies, that he was forced to retire over Jordan, where he built himself a strong and stately palace, which in no case foreign to that of the Jews we are upon. This contest, whatever it was, grew to such a height, that Simon finding he could not get the better of the strenuous pontiff, went away to Apollonius the son of Tbrafeas, who was then governor of Cælo-Syria and Palestine, the only two provinces the Romans had left untaken from Seleucus P, and acquainted him, that there were immense treasures laid up in the temple of Jerusalem, which might, at his pleasure, be seized upon for the king's use. The governor sent to inform Seleucus (W) of it, who dispatched immediately Heliodorus to fetch it away to Antioch.

Heliodorus endeavours to force the temple

Is punished by God.

Heliodorus, the better to conceal the purport of his commission, pretended that he was ordered to go and view all the cities of Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia, and only to take Jerusalem in his way; but when he came thither, where he was received by the Jews with singular honours, he acquainted Onias with the orders he had received from the king, and made a more particular inquiry after those treasures. The high-priest told him, that there was indeed such a treasure in the temple, tho' nothing so large as he had been informed; that besides those things that had been consecrated to God, the rest had been deposited there by, or for the widows and orphans for their security, whose property therefore they were; that a considerable sum had been likewise laid up there by Hyrcaan the son of Joseph, a man of great dignity; and that he being the guardian of this wealth, could never give his consent that it should be alienated from the right owners, to the disgrace of his dignity, and of that sacred place, which was revered by all the world: but all this not being sufficient to outweigh the positive orders which Heliodorus had received from the king, he marched directly towards the temple. The high-priest and the rest of the ministers of the place did in vain endeavour to obstruct his passage. Whilst the whole city was in the utmost confusion, the gates of the place were ordered to be broken down, and the Syrians were just going to enter, when God smote them with such a panic dread, that they fell down half-dead. Heliodorus among the rest, who saw a vision of a man on horseback sumptuously dressed, who flew upon him with the utmost speed and fury, and crushed him under his horse's feet, was forthwith carried out almost dead by his men, and continued some days in that condition. At length Onias, fearing lest this wonderful accident should bring the Jews under the suspicion of having made some unlawful which he called Tyre, whence he continued to make inroads and depredations on the neighbouring Arabs (52).

During this time it is probable he had regained the high-priest's favour, by sending into the treasury of the temple two hundred talents of gold, and four hundred talents of silver (53), which Simon, the supposed eldest son of Joseph, seems to have challenged as his own, during Hyrcaan's abode on the other side Jordan; but the strenuous Onias refusing to deliver it up, because consecrated to the maintenance of widows and orphans; as he himself, confessed to Apollonius, this refusal might in all probability, so exasperate the angry Benjamites, that he chose to have the whole treasure of that sacred place betrayed to that governor, rather than Hyrcaan or Onias should reap the benefit of what the former had intrusted with the latter.

As for Hyrcaan, he found himself soon after in such danger of being called to a severe account for his depredations, by Antiochus Epiphanes, who had succeeded Seleucus Philopator, that, to avoid the worst, he ran himself upon his own sword (54).

(W) It is plain from this whole story, which is taken from the second book of the Maccabees (55), and confirmed by Josephus (56), that Seleucus had enjoyed Palestine, Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia, some time before his death; and how his father got these provinces from the king of Egypt, we have already seen; but how they reverted to that monarch, after they had been restored to Ptolemy upon his marriage with Cleopatra, we can nowhere find.

It is true, Polybius seems to intimate, that this restitution was never made to Ptolemy (57); but that both Antiochus and his son still kept those provinces in their hands after the marriage; and elsewhere he introduces Antiochus Epiphanes denying that his grandfather had ever promised to surrender them to Ptolemy the king of Egypt (58). Hence some have concluded, that they had never returned to the latter, but had been constantly kept by the three former.

But all this seems clearly contradicted by what Josephus affirms of Hyrcaan's being sent to Egypt to congratulate Ptolemy on the birth of a son by his queen Cleopatra. Shall we then say, that Joseph sent this compliment to him, not as to his king, but as to his quondam benefactor? But our Jewish historian adds, that all the nobility of Cælo-Syria flocked thither on the same errand; which plainly intimates, that he was in possession of those provinces.

We must therefore suppose, either that these compliments were paid to Ptolemy by the Jews and Cælo-Syrians, as to the son-in-law of Antiochus, to whom those provinces were shortly to devolve in virtue of the marriage; or else, that if they had been really surrendered to him, Seleucus took afterwards the advantage of his son Philopator's minority to divest him of them; since it is plain by the history of Simon's applying to Apollonius, of Seleucus sending Heliodorus, and of Onias applying himself, not to Ptolemy, but to Seleucus, for redress, that this last had possessed them some time before his death.

a attempt against the Syrian minister, went to the temple, and offered some sacrifices for his recovery; which being obtained, he immediately left Jerusalem, and went to acquaint the king with what had happened to him. Seleucus however, whether he suspected the truth of his relation, or was resolved at any price to get the Jewish treasure, asked him further, whether he knew any man that was fit to be sent upon that expedition? Heliodorus answered, that if the king had any enemy that he would be glad to get rid of, he need but send him to rifle that sacred place, and he would see him come back in such a condition, as would convince him, that it was under the protection of some divine and irresistible power ^a.

b WHEN Simon found that he had missed his aim, he endeavoured to throw all the blame upon the good high-priest, pretending that he was the person who had called Heliodorus to Jerusalem; and drew such a party against him, that several persons were killed on both sides. At length Onias, fearing the consequences of such an intestine faction, especially seeing his rival in high favour with Apollonius the then governor, went to complain to the king at Antioch. He was well received, and Simon was thereupon banished ^r; but Seleucus dying soon after, was succeeded by his son Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, whose brutish character we have seen in a former chapter ^s, and who soon made his subjects repent of the joy they had expressed at his first coming to the crown. The Jews, of all others, were not long before they felt the dreadful effects of his fury, more through the ambition of some, and the factions and feuds which reigned then in that unhappy state, than the cruel temper of this new monarch.

c He was scarce settled on his throne before Jason (X), the brother of Onias the then high-priest, taking advantage of the king's penury, his treasury having been quite exhausted by the large tribute his predecessors had paid to the Romans; went to Antioch, and procured from him the high-priesthood at the price of three hundred and fifty talents, and obtained an order that his brother should be sent to, and confined to dwell at that metropolis. Without this last, there would indeed have been little likelihood of his enjoying his ill-gotten dignity with any satisfaction, since the very presence of the deposed pontiff, so highly admired for his singular piety, must of course have revived the resentment and hatred of the people against him, and have proved a constant check to his authority ^t. Jason finding how welcome this money was to the young monarch, and being desirous to lessen, as much as possible, the antipathy which other nations had against that of the Jews, offered him another sum of one hundred and fifty talents for the liberty of erecting at Jerusalem a gymnasium or place of public exercises, such as were practised in Greece; an academy for training up the youth after the Grecian manner; and for the liberty of making such Jews as he thought fit, free of the city of Antioch; all which was readily granted to him. He then set out for Jerusalem, and with these powers formed so strong a party in Judæa, as he thought would easily overbear that of his rival Onias, which was still very strong, especially in Jerusalem. Among those that joined themselves to this intruder, were the malecontent sons of Joseph lately mentioned, and a number of others, who, through a wanton inconstancy, were become excessively fond of the Grecian customs, and as weary of their own ^u. The freedom of the city of Antioch, a very valuable privilege, was another bait, which drew still greater numbers over to him. From this time a general apostasy from the Jewish religion overspread the greatest part of the nation; the academies were erected by the usurping high-priest both for their youth and for men grown; and as some of these exercises were to be performed naked, these vile apostates found means to efface the scar of circumcision, to prevent their being distinguished from other nations. The priests, as well as the people, from thenceforward neglected the service of the temple, to assist at these new heathenish exercises; and the laws, which the Jewish nation had obtained for the free exercise of their religion and rights, became of none effect, through the baseness of one single renegade, who sacrificed his religion and country to his ungovernable ambition.

(X) This wretch was called Jesus; but as he was going to purchase the favour of the king and court at the expence of every thing that ought to have been valuable to an honest Jew, he began with changing his name into that of Jason, which he thought more conformable and pleasing to the Greeks, whose customs he was then going to introduce into his nation.

As he stuck at nothing that could ingratiate himself to Antiochus, he sent the next ^a year a number of his partisans, on whom he had bestowed the freedom of Antioch, to assist at the olympic games, with a considerable sum to (Y) be spent in sacrifices to the Tyrian Hercules, in whose honour those games were celebrated *; but these men, whether out of conscience or fear, chose rather to make a present of it to the Tyrians towards the repairing of their fleet. Antiochus by this time understanding that the young king of Egypt, now of age, designed to attempt the recovery of Palestine, Phœnice and Cælo-Syria, made a tour into these provinces, and took Jerusalem in his way, where Jason received him with a magnificence suitable to the value he put upon that monarch's favour and friendship.

He did not however enjoy his ill-gotten dignity long before he was thrust out of ^b it by his own brother Menelaus (Z), whom he had sent to Antiochus with the usual tribute. Menelaus, instead of consulting the king about those matters which his brother had charged him with, took that opportunity to insinuate himself to him by the most flagrant flatteries; to which having added the sum of three hundred talents more than Jason had paid for the high-priesthood, he easily obtained it, and returned with his new commission to Jerusalem in the third year of Jason's pontificate. He soon got himself a strong party, at the head of which were the sons of Tobias, who were then very powerful in Judæa; but Jason was not without his powerful friends, who detesting Menelaus's treachery, soon forced him to retire, with the heads of his faction, into Antioch. Hither, the better to gain their point against Jason, they went, and acquainted Antiochus, that they were fully resolved to forsake their old religion, and wholly ^c to conform to that of his country; which so pleased that proud monarch, that he sent them back with a force sufficient to drive Jason out of Judæa into the land of the Ammonites. Being thus rid of his rival, and seated in his new dignity, his next care was to perform his promise to the king, and to outdo his brother in his apostasy ^d.

Menelaus summoned to Antioch.
BUT whilst he was endeavouring, by all wicked means, to ingratiate himself to Antiochus and to his court, he neglected one main article, the paying of the money he had promised to him, tho' Softratus, then governor of the citadel of Jerusalem, and receiver of the king's customs in Palestine, was continually pressing him to it. At length Antiochus suspecting some private intelligence between them, ordered them ^d both to come to Antioch, Menelaus leaving his brother Lysimachus his vicegerent at Jerusalem. At their arrival at Antioch, they found that the king had been forced to go and quell a sedition in Cilicia †, and had left the government of Antioch to Andronicus, one of the prime nobles of his court. Menelaus having exhausted his coffers, and finding that nothing but the payment of the king's money could recover his favour, sent private instructions to his brother at Jerusalem, to convey to him as many of the golden vessels as he could conveniently strip the temple of; which having received soon after, and caused to be sold at Tyre, and in the neighbouring cities, raised him a sufficient sum, not only to satisfy the king, but also to bribe his courtiers in his favour. All this however could not be transacted so secretly, but his brother ^e Onias, who had been, ever since his deposition, confined to that capital, had intelligence of his sacrilege. He made such bitter complaints against Menelaus, as were like to have raised all the Antiochian Jews against him. He was therefore obliged to have recourse to Andronicus, whom he had already bribed by his presents;

(Y) This sum, the common Greek copies say, was only three hundred drachms; but as the learned Ussher observes (59), this was too inconsiderable a sum upon such an occasion, it amounting to but a little above eleven pounds sterling; and therefore prefers the Arundelian manuscript, which calls it three thousand three hundred, which was a more likely present, considering the person who sent it, who was a man wholly devoted to that monarch's pleasure.

(Z) This apostate's right name was Onias, which he changed for that of Menelaus, in imitation of his brother, and in compliance to the Greeks. The book of the Maccabees (60) makes him the son of

Tobias, and brother of Simon above-mentioned; but if he had been of that family, he could not have entered into the sacerdotal office, without such a manifest violation of the Mosaic law, as would have set the whole Jewish nation against him; for tho' they proved but too complying to the Grecian customs lately introduced, yet they seem to have had an invincible attachment to the Aaronic family.

Josephus therefore is most generally followed, who expressly tells us (61), that he was the brother of the deposed Onias, and of Jason; and that he did but require the latter for having supplanted the former, in which case the high-priesthood was still retained in the right line.

a and for a fresh sum of money engaged him to cut off the good old high-priest, who being by this time apprised of his intreagues, had taken sanctuary at Daphne, an asylum near the city of Antioch. Andronicus went to him, and, under some pretence or other, accompanied with the most solemn vows and protestations for his safety, had no sooner got him out of the place, than he put him to death ^w, without regard either to his oaths, the sacredness of the place, or the laws of hospitality (A).

THIS treacherous murder of a person so venerable for his age and exemplary piety, and so respected in that metropolis, both by Jews and Gentiles, drew the bitterest complaints against the sacrilegious assassin, as soon as the king was returned to Antioch; and that prince, bad as he was, could not forbear shedding of tears at the

b news of it. As soon therefore as he had taken full cognizance of the fact, he caused the murderer to be stripped of his purple, and to be conducted with infamy to the place where it had been committed, and there to be put to death. As for Menelaus, tho' the most guilty of the two, he found means to avoid the present storm, and to maintain his credit some time longer; but this obliged him to draw such large sums from Jerusalem, that Lyfimachus was forced to raise them by the most unheard-of violences and sacrileges, which ended in an universal mutiny, in which the Jews fell upon him, and the three thousand men he had got to defend him, with such desperate fury, that they killed a great number of them, and put the rest to flight. Lyfimachus, no longer able to resist, was pursued to the treasury of the temple, and there

c massacred by the enraged multitude. Antiochus coming soon after to Tyre, the Jewish sanhedrin resolved to send a deputation to him, both to justify the putting to death Lyfimachus, and to accuse Menelaus as the author and cause of all the troubles that had happened both in Judaea and Antioch. The three deputies pleaded their cause so well before the king, that Menelaus, not knowing which way to clear himself, and avoid the impending punishment, had recourse to his old secret of bribery. He applied himself to a favourite of Antiochus, named Ptolemy Macron, the son of Dorymenes, and promised him so large a sum, that that courtier, who knew the inconstancy of that monarch's temper, easily prevailed upon him not only to absolve the apostate high-priest, but also to condemn three Jewish deputies to death. This sentence, unjust as it was, was forthwith put in execution, and those venerable men were hurried to death, who, as the author of the Maccabees expresses it, would have gained their cause, had they pleaded it before even the Scythians; and indeed this piece of cruelty and injustice was so shocking to the Tyrians, that tho' they dared not openly exclaim against it, yet they ventured to shew their respect to those deputies, by bestowing an honourable burial upon them ^d.

Year of the flood 2829. Before Christ 170.

THIS unjust sentence gave the traitor Menelaus such a complete victory over all his opposers, that from thenceforth he gave himself up to all manner of tyranny and wickedness; Jerusalem became destitute of protectors; the sanhedrin, if there were any zealous men left among them, were so terrified by this last cruelty on their deputies, that they no longer dared to oppose him, tho' they saw that every step he took was with design to enslave the nation still more, and to overturn the small remains of their religion and liberties. These were the sad prognostics of those evils which soon after overtook that rebellious nation, and in which God chose to punish them for their apostasy, by means of that very monarch, whose favour they had bought at the expence of their religion and laws; and to convince them that these grievous calamities were the effects of his anger, they were pre-signified to them by the most terrifying apparitions in the air during the space of forty days, during which there were seen multitudes of armed men, both foot and horse, magnificently armed and apparelled, charging and fighting against each other in battle array, whilst their ears were f dinned with the clashing of swords, lances and shields; all which dreadful omens

(A) This worthy person, whose character is excellently well drawn by the author of the second book of Maccabees (12), is supposed to have been murdered in the the twenty-fourth year of his pontificate.

There is indeed some difference between Josephus and Eusebius, and the Alexandrian chronicle, concerning the length of time between his accession to that dignity, and his being murdered at Antioch; but as the last quoted author assigns expressly twenty-four years to it, he has been preferred before the other two. The reader may see the reasons for it in our learned Prideaux (13).

threw the whole city into the deepest consternation, whilst they all looked upon them ^a as the sure forerunners of some sad calamity, which they in vain endeavoured, when it was too late, to avert by their prayers, from that unhappy land ¹.

Jason forces
Jerusalem.

THIS fatal change was occasioned by an accident, which seemed at first of no great consequence, but proved in a little time the cause of all their miseries. Antiochus was then taken up with the conquest of Egypt, when a false rumour was by some means spread, that he had been killed before Alexandria. Jason, who had been forced to retire into the land of Ammon after his deposition, heard of it, and thought it was a fit opportunity to attempt the recovery of his dignity, and that his nation, tired with the Syrian government, and especially with the tyranny of Menelaus, would readily receive him again with open arms. To this end he got him a band of about one ^b thousand resolute men, at the head of whom he quickly appeared before the walls of Jerusalem, which, by the help of a party which he had within that metropolis, he easily entered, and forced his brother to retire into the citadel; after which minding nothing but his resentment, he committed the most horrid butcheries against such of the Jews as he suspected to have been of the contrary party. He was however soon after forced to leave both the city and country, at the news of Antiochus coming with a powerful army against him (B); for that prince, highly provoked at this rebellion, and especially at the news, that the Jewish nation had made some rejoicings at the report of his death, was actually coming with a great army against Jerusalem. The Jews, apprised of his will towards them, seem to have made a stout resistance, and ^c to have given him no small trouble in forcing his way into their metropolis (C); but the gates being at length forced open to him, perhaps by some of his friends from within, he spared no cruelty against its unhappy inhabitants, insomuch that within three days they reckoned no less than forty thousand killed, and as many taken captives, and sold for slaves to the neighbouring nations ².

HIS fury did not stop here; he caused the traitor Menelaus, who, by this time, had by some means recovered his good graces, to lead him to the temple, which he entered, even to its most sacred recesses (D), laying his impious hands on all the vessels that were in it, and caused the golden altar of incense, the golden table of the shewbread, the golden candlestick, the censers, bowls and other utensils belonging to ^d that holy place to be seized, together with the golden shields, crowns and other ornaments which had been dedicated to it. He caused also the gold plating that covered the gates and other architecture of the temple, the veil that divided the holy

(B) Our historian says, that he retired at first to the Ammonitish king, where becoming soon after suspected by that prince, he was forced to withdraw, and to wander from city to city, being detested by all that knew him, as a betrayer of his country, and a monster of mankind (14).

He came at length into Egypt, and finding no safety there, he hoped he might at least find it among the Lacedemonians, in virtue of the pretended kindred between their nation and his own; but here he also missed of his aim, at least it seems as if he had not met with any favourable reception, since our author adds, that, at his death, his carcass was left to rot above ground, being denied even the common sepulchre that was allowed to other strangers (15).

(C) So says the book of the Maccabees (16), with whom agrees Diodorus Siculus (17), and even Josephus, in his wars of the Jews (18), where he expressly says, that he laid siege to that city, and represents him as enraged at the trouble it gave him; but in his antiquities he tells us, that he entered it without force; and that those of his party within did open the gates to him (19). The former is indeed the most probable, and Josephus might easily forget himself through the distance of time in which he wrote those two books; and this may in some measure atone for such-like inconsistencies which are to be met with in him.

(D) D. Siculus, in the place last quoted out of him, tells, upon some Heathenish report, that Antiochus being entered into the most sacred part of the temple, where the high-priest alone was to be admitted, he there found the statue of a man carved in stone, with a long beard, holding a book in his hand, and mounted upon an ass; and supposing it to have been the statue of Moses the Jewish law-giver, and founder of Jerusalem, he took it into his head to destroy the mutual hatred between the Jews and the rest of the world, by destroying of their law.

To this end he caused a large sow to be sacrificed on the altar of burnt-offerings to that law-giver, sprinkled the porch and the sacred books with the blood of it, caused the high-priest and others to eat of the flesh, and put out the lamp which burnt night and day in the temple. All which Josephus has sufficiently confuted (20), from Polybius, N. Damascus, and other authors better acquainted with the Jewish religion than this Sicilian. Only he adds, that Antiochus, not contented with rifling the temple of all its riches, caused it to be polluted, by sacrificing some swine upon its altar, and sprinkling the broth of them upon the Jews (21); but this circumstance, if true, has been omitted by the authors of the two books of the Maccabees.

- a from the most holy place, and in a word all that was valuable either for its metal or workmanship, to be carried off, besides one thousand eight hundred talents of gold and silver, which he forced out of the treasury. Having thus glutted his revenge and avarice, he returned in such a kind of triumph to Antioch, as if he had had it now in his power, to use our author's words, to make the land navigable, and the sea passable on foot^a. As a further mark of his spleen against that unhappy nation, he put it under the government of one Philip, a most barbarous Perrygian, and Samaria under that of Andronicus, a person of the same brutish disposition, and left the apostate Menelaus, the most hateful of all the three, in possession of the high-priesthood^b.
- b WHAT the Jewish nation suffered under those governors, or rather butchers, is more easily imagined than described; but their miseries were not to end there. Some time after Antiochus having received the mortifying letter from the Roman senate we have elsewhere taken notice of[†], he chose them above all other people to wreck his resentment against, and with as much cruelty as if they had been the cause of his disgrace. To this end he dispatched from his army, as he was marching through Judæa, Apollonius, at the head of twenty-two thousand men, with orders to plunder all the cities of Judæa, to murder all the men, and to save only the women and children for sale. Apollonius came accordingly with his army (E), and, to outward appearance, with a peaceable intention, which was not suspected by the Jews, because he was superintendent of the tribute in Palestine. He kept himself quiet till the next sabbath, when they were all in a profound quiet, when on a sudden he commanded his men to arms, some of whom he sent to cut all in pieces that were gone to the temple and to the other synagogues, whilst the rest going through the streets of the city, massacred all that came in their way, which they did without the least resistance from those unhappy wretches, who suffered themselves to be butchered in that merciless manner, rather than break their sabbath by standing on their defence. He next ordered the city to be plundered, and then set it on fire, pulled down all their stately fabrics, caused the walls to be demolished, and carried away captive about ten thousand of those that had been saved from the slaughter^c. From that time the service of the temple was
- d quite abandoned, that place having been every-where polluted both with the blood of the slain, and with many other defilements. From the ruins of the city the officers of Antiochus built a large fortress on an eminence in the city of David^{*}, fortified it with a strong wall, stately towers, and placed a garrison in it to command the temple, over-against which it was built; so that the soldiers could easily see and fall upon all those that ventured to come to that sacred place, so many of whom were continually plundered and murdered by them, that the rest not daring to stay longer in Jerusalem, went and dwelt in the neighbouring cities of the Gentiles. In this polluted and forsaken condition did this metropolis and its temple continue three full years and a half; that is, till Judas Maccabeus, having wrested both out of their hands, did
- e purify and restore them to their ancient splendor and use, as we shall see in due time^d (F).

(E) Josephus seems to have confounded this slaughter with that which was made by Antiochus two years before, by making him present at this also (22); but it appears from the author of the Maccabees, who rightly distinguishes these two persecutions, that the one was executed in the presence of that monarch, and the other by his vicegerent Apollonius.

(F) In the time of this persecution under Antiochus, is generally supposed to have lived Jesús the son of Syrac, author of the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus. Some place him indeed in the time of Onias II. (23); but, by some passages scattered here and there in his work, he seems rather to have lived about the time of Onias III. and at a time when his nation suffered some grievous persecution[†]. He praises the high-priest Simon II. as a person long since dead (24). His grandson did afterwards translate this book into Greek, under the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes (25), about the year 132, that is, about thirty-six years after this time we suppose him to have wrote it.

Who this author was, is neither agreed nor easily guessed. Some make him of the sacerdotal line, as descended from Josbua the son of Josedech (26). Some Greek copies give him for grandfather Elean-

A cruel persecution in Ju-

THE Jews of Palestine were not the only ones who felt the fury of this persecu-^a tion. Antiochus, resolved either totally to abolish their religion, or to destroy their whole race, as far at least as he could reach them, caused a decree to be issued out the following year, that all nations within his dominions should forsake their old religion and gods, and worship those of the king, under the severest penalties. To make his orders more effectual, he sent overseers into every province to see them strictly put in execution; and as the Jews were the only people who he knew would disobey them, so especial directions were given to have them treated with the utmost severity. Many therefore of them, either to avoid the effects of his rage, or to ingratiate themselves to him, did not only comply with great readiness, but having once apostatized, became the bitterest enemies of those who had the courage to refuse; ^b all which did but increase the already too general defection, as it did on the other hand the sufferings of those who stood firm to their religion^c. As for the Samaritans, a much less danger would have cooled all their zeal, either for the Jewish nation, or the Mosaic law. To convince the king therefore that they did not design to die martyrs to either, they sent a deputation to him, setting forth, that tho' they had hitherto conformed in many of the Jewish superstitions, in imitation of their forefathers, who had been persuaded to it for their own safety, yet they were now ready to forsake them all, and to embrace the king's religion. They added, that they had a temple on mount Garizzim, which was dedicated to a God without a name (G); but begged it might thenceforth be dedicated to the Grecian Jupiter, as Josephus has ^c it, or rather, as the author of the Maccabees calls him^d, the hospitaller, or, the receiver or protector of strangers, intimating thereby, that they were not originally natives of that country, but strangers settled there in times past. They concluded with a petition, that as they were not of Jewish, but Sidonian race, and were ready to conform in every thing to the king's will, they might not be involved in the same calamities with their wicked rivals. Antiochus readily granted them their request, and dispatched a letter to Nicanor his sub-governor there, with orders that they should be distinguished from the Jews, and that their temple should be dedicated according to their petition; all which was punctually observed.

WHILST the Samaritans peacefully enjoyed the fruits of their treacherous com-^d plaisance, Athenas, an old minister, well versed in all the Heathenish rites, as well as in cruelty, did make those of Judæa undergo the most severe punishments for their stedfastness to their religion. He began with dedicating the temple to Jupiter Olympius, and causing his statue to be erected on the altar of burnt-offerings (H), with another for the father of Syrac of Jerusalem; but we find nothing like this pretended priesthood or descent in those places of the book where he speaks more particularly of himself (27). Only it appears, that his great thirst after wisdom (28) made him pray fervently, study hard, travel much, and undergo many great dangers for it (29); that he had been unjustly traduced to the king (30); whence he is supposed to have retired into Egypt, and there composed his book. Lastly he tells us, that he was the last writer of the Jewish nation who treated of moral subjects (31). This is all that we know of the author.

As to the work, which was anciently called Παραπτοε, that is, according to the Greek energy, the store or treasure of all virtues, we shall have occasion to speak of it, when we come to the time of its being translated into Greek. Some ancients, particularly St. Auspin (32), thought once the same person the author of the book of Wisdom, as well as of this of Ecclesiasticus, but he owns his mistake in another place. And as to the latter of these, it is not known who wrote it, only it is generally believed, that it was never wrote originally in Hebrew, because there are none of those Hebraisms in it, which are everywhere found in other versions out of that language; and there are in it many Greek ones, which convince one, that it was originally written in that language. This might be sufficient to confute those who pretend it to have been originally written in Hebrew, and by king Solomon (33); but, besides this, we may urge against them the unlikeness of style with his other writings; its never being mentioned by Jewish authors; its being rejected out of their canon, and many more too obvious to be mentioned.

(G) We have, in a former volume (†), acquainted our readers, that the Jews, after their return from the Babylonish captivity, had left off pronouncing the name Jehovah, and substituted that of Adonai to it, where-ever it occurred in their reading of the sacred books. As therefore the temple was simply called the house or temple of God, and oftner emphatically the house or temple, without adding any proper name, the Samaritans made this a pretence for calling theirs the temple of a nameless deity, as the superstitious Jews called that name of God, Αἰνδιον, unutterable, or unlawful to be uttered.

(H) This idol was set up in the temple on the fifteenth of the month Cisleu, which answers to part of our November and December; but they did not begin

- a another lesser altar before it, whereon they sacrificed to that false deity. All those therefore that refused to come and worship it, were either massacred out of hand, or put to some more lingering torments, till they either complied, or died under the hand of their butchers. At the same time there were altars, groves and statues set up in every city and town of Judæa, to which the inhabitants were compelled to come and sacrifice, under the same severe penalties; insomuch that the whole land was but a scene, either of the most abominable idolatries and debaucheries, or of the most horrid butcheries; and when the feast of Bacchus was come, they were either forced to assist at it, and to go about the streets with their heads crowned with ivy, in honour of that beastly deity, or exposed themselves to some cruel death. All this while it was made immediate death to be caught observing either the sabbath, the rite of circumcision, or any other branch of the Mosaic law; insomuch that two women having been found to have circumcised the children of which they had been lately delivered, were both led, with the infants hung about their necks, through several streets of Jerusalem, and cast headlong down from the highest walls of the city, and all that had assisted at the ceremony were put to death ^z.

- THESE unheard-of barbarities having obliged many of the Jews to leave their habitations, and to go and hide themselves among the cragged rocks in holes and caverns, and to live upon wild roots and herbs, to avoid either death or apostasy, some of them ventured to assemble themselves in a cavern near Jerusalem, to celebrate the sabbath. c But Philip their barbarous Phrygian governor having been informed of it, came against them with a sufficient force; and after having in vain offered them a general amnesty, if they would forsake their religion, and conform to that of the king, he waited, without any other hostilities, till the next sabbath; on which day entering the cave without resistance, he caused them all, men, women and children, to be massacred, to the number of a thousand ^b. As to the sacred Jewish books, Philip and his officers had taken care to burn and destroy all that they could lay hands on, whether in the temple, in their synagogues, or even in their private houses; after which, if any Jew was found to conceal any of them, he was dragged to immediate death ¹. They had several other ways of trying those who retained still a due regard d to the law of Moses; and in order to make as many as they could comply with the king's command, they spared neither flatteries nor caresses to encourage, nor threats and tortures to deter them; so that, tho' vast numbers were seduced by these means, yet there were still a sufficient number, especially in and about Jerusalem, who continued proof against them, to vex the tyrant for not being universally obeyed.

As soon therefore as he heard that there were such numbers who remained still inflexible, he resolved to come in person to Jerusalem, and to see either his orders begin to offer sacrifices to it till the twenty-fifth of that month, which was the king's birth-day; so that from thenceforth they continued sacrificing to it every twenty-fifth day of the month, till the Jewish religion and state were restored by Judas Maccabeus.

The profanation of the temple, and the setting up this idol in it, had been long before foretold by the prophet Daniel (34), under the name of abomination of desolation; but there are in that chapter many other strokes, which do plainly delineate this persecution, and the tyrant that caused it. We shall content ourselves with subjoining some of the plainest of them.

This expedition begins at the 19th verse of that chapter thus; He shall return at the time appointed, and come towards the south (Egypt); but he shall not be as the former or as the latter; for the ships of Chittim (the Romans) shall come against him; therefore he shall be grieved, and return with indignation (or turn his indignation) against the holy covenants (the Jewish religion.) Thus shall he do, he shall get intelligence of those that forsake the covenant. Arms shall stand on his side, and he shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination (or abominable thing) that maketh desolate; and such as do wickedly against the covenants, shall be corrupt by flatteries. But the people that know their God shall behave valiantly, and such as have understanding, and instruct the people, (divert them from apostatizing) shall fall by the sword, by flame, by captivity, by spoil. — And the king shall do according to his will, and shall exalt and magnify himself above every god. He shall speak wonderful things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for that which is determined shall be done, &c. The same prophet points him out there by his scattering the prey, spoil and riches among his followers; and it is well known, that his extravagant largesses had not only emptied his coffers, but gained him the title of magnanimous and munificent.

The reader may remember, that whilst Antiochus was preparing himself for the conquest of Egypt, the Romans sent their deputies to him, who obliged him to set aside that enterprize; for which he vented his resentment on the innocent Jews in the manner we have related, and exactly as it had been foretold in the prophecy before us; so that it is impossible not to know that he was the person designed by providence to be the scourge of his people.

more punctually obeyed, or the recusants punished with the most exquisite cruelties. ^a One of the first that fell a victim to his fury was the venerable Eleazar, a man of ninety years of age, respected by all for his great learning, probity, and zeal for his religion, and whose example had preserved a great number of Jews from falling into apostasy. Him they brought upon the butchering stage, and endeavoured to force him to eat swines flesh; and when they could not prevail upon him by any means to comply, they desired him that at least he would, out of regard to his extreme old age, consent to eat some other unforbidden flesh, that they might make the king believe that he had obeyed. The good old man answered with a becoming courage, that the most dreadful death was preferable to such a base dissimulation, so unworthy his old age and character, and so dangerous in its consequence, since it might be a means of ^b seducing many of his nation to follow his example. As soon as he had ended this speech, which was interpreted as the effect of his pride rather than of his zeal, he was haled to execution; and when he was ready to expire under the strokes of his butchers, he gave a great groan, and expired with these words in his mouth, O Lord, thou knowest what pains I suffer in my body, from which I might have freed myself; but my soul feels a real joy, because I suffer them for the sake of thy law ^k. After him the seven brethren, whose martyrdom is related in the same book ⁱ, suffered, one after another, the most exquisite torments with invincible courage and constancy, whilst their heroic mother, divested of all the weakness of her sex, stood by encouraging and strengthening them in the Hebrew tongue, with the assurance of a glori- ^c ous recompence in the next life, for which she was, last of all, sacrificed to the tyrant's fury, and died with the same cheerfulness and intrepidity, which she had inspired into her seven sons (I).

It was about this time that Mattathias, an eminent priest of the family of Joarib (K), began to signalize himself by his brave zeal for his religion. He had been some time before forced to retire to Modin his native place, to shun the sight of those scenes of cruelty and profaneness, which were acted at Jerusalem by Apollonius and the apostate Jews. During his recess there, Apelles, one of the king's officers, came to oblige the inhabitants of the place to execute his commands ^m. Having got the people together, with Mattathias and his five sons (L), he addressed himself to him ^d on account of his dignity, and the great esteem he was in, hoping, that if he could persuade him to comply, his example would soon draw all the re... (I) Josephus has likewise given us the history at large of those heroic martyrs, in a book by itself, which was intitled, Of the empire of reason. It is now better known to us by that of the book of the Maccabees; but as neither he, nor the author of the second book of that name, do expressly mention the place where this dreadful scene was acted, Rufinus has taken it into his head, that it was done at Antioch (35), because they shewed their tomb in that city in St. Jerom's time, and had there built and dedicated a church to them (36). But as Josephus seems to believe that it was done at Jerusalem (37), and is followed by many learned men, and Rufinus gives no better reason than that of his tradition, we see no reason for following him, as some others have done (38); it being more likely that Jerusalem should be the place, where, above all others, the Jews shewed the greatest firmness for their religion, and consequently where such severe examples were thought most necessary by that exasperated prince.

Josephus, in the book above-quoted, gives us the names of those seven brothers, and of their mother, whom he calls Solomona; but the Jews call her Hannah. He adds, that she flung herself into a large fire which was there kindled, to prevent the executioners laying their profane hands on her. The La- tin version says, that she was dragged on the ground to execution, where having cut off her breasts, and scourged her naked body, they flung her into a boiling caldron. Rufinus is of the same opinion (39).

The Arabic version, and Josephus Ben-Gurion on the contrary say, that having lived to see her seven sons martyred, and lying dead on the ground before her, she flung herself in the midst of them, and prayed to God to take her out of this world; and that she immediately fell upon them, and expired. An ancient poet makes her die of excess of joy, in these words: Solverunt gaudia matrem (40).

(K) We have already spoken of this family, which was the first of the twenty-four classes appointed by David to officiate at the temple (41), and was one of the four that returned from the captivity. Mattathias was the son of John, the son of Simon, the son of Asimoneus, from whom descended the Asimoneus (42). From this Mattathias descended the Maccabees, so famed in history for their zeal and bravery, and of whom we shall speak in the following section.

(L) These were Johanan, surnamed Kaddis, Simon, surnamed Thassi, Judas, called Maccabeus, and the most famous of all the rest, Eleazar, surnamed Avarani, and Jonathan, surnamed Apphus (43).

^a his sons, would be the immediate reward of his compliance. Mattathias answered him, with a voice loud enough to be heard by all the assembly, that tho' the whole Jewish nation, and the whole world, were to conform to the king's edict, yet both he and his sons would continue faithful to their God to the last minute of their lives, and that no consideration should prevail on them to forsake the religion of their forefathers. In the mean time some of the king's officers had prevailed on some cowardly Jews to take another way, and one of them was just then offering himself to sacrifice to an idol, when the good old priest calling to mind what the law of Moses ordains against such transgressors, that they should be put to immediate death ^o, fell upon the man, and killed him upon the spot. His sons at the same time, being fired with the same zeal, killed the king's officer and his men, overthrew the altar and idol, and running about the city, cried out, that those who were zealous for the law of God should follow them; by which means they saw themselves at the head of a numerous troop, with whom they soon after withdrew into some of the deserts of Judea. These were presently followed by great numbers of others, who, to avoid persecution, flocked to him from other parts of the country ^p; so that the deserts of Judea were filled every-where with them.

As soon as Mattathias and his men were come into a place of safety, they set themselves on consulting the best means for standing on their own defence. Here the remembrance of those of their brethren, who had suffered themselves to be butchered by their enemies on the sabbath, soon made them sensible of their danger, unless they steered a different course; for as long as they continued in that scrupulous notion of nonresistance for fear of breaking the sabbath, they would be still liable to the same stratagems, and by that means, in a little time, be totally extirpated. Having therefore maturely weighed the matter, and consulted other learned priests and rulers that were come over to him, it was resolved, that, for the future, it should be lawful, nay obligatory, to take up arms in their own defence, whenever they were attacked, on the sabbath as well as on any other day ^p. This decree having been privately communicated to the Jews in and out of Palestine, together with their reasons for passing it, was universally received by all; and from that time they made no difficulty to defend their lives and properties at all times, and upon all occasions. Among those who resorted to, and did not a little strengthen the little flying army of Mattathias, were the Assideans, or rather Hasideans, a brave and strenuous sect, ^{The Assideans join Mattathias.} formed among the Jews soon after their return from the captivity. We have already given some account of them in a former volume [†]; the rest the curious reader may find in the margin (M). These being known to be the most strict observers of the Jewish laws and traditions ^q, their example did very much influence the rest in the late decision, and encourage them to set aside their scruples about the sabbath, whenever the safety of their lives came in competition with the observance of it.

^c Mattathias having by this time strengthened his little army with these and other stout and religious men, who daily resorted to him, began to come down with them into the plains, and to try his force not only against their persecutors, but also against his apostate brethren. As many of these as he caught, he put to death; the rest, in ^{Mattathias restores the worship of God.}

(M) We have already seen what their doctrine was concerning meum and sumum ^{*}. They differed likewise from the Zaddikim their opposite sect, in that these contented themselves with observing all that was written in the Mosaic law, without troubling themselves with the traditions, comments and constitutions of the elders; whereas the Assideans insisted upon a strict observance of all.

Scaliger supposes them, not without some good reasons (44), to have been rather a fraternity than a sect of Jews, who had given themselves up more strictly than the rest to the service of the temple, to the keeping up the repairs of that place, and the divine worship in it. To this end, besides the half shekel which every man was to pay towards it, they contributed other voluntary sums. They likewise sacrificed every day, except that of the grand expiation [†], a lamb, besides those of the daily sacrifice; and this was called the sin-offering of the Assideans. They practised greater hardships and mortifications than the rest, and their common oath was, by the temple. To their zeal and love for that sacred place, now polluted and profaned, was owing their coming to Mattathias, and that courage which they shewed from thenceforth under him and his brave offspring; for the book of the Maccabees expressly says, that they were mighty men of Israel, and wholly devoted to the law. Whether the sect of the Essenians, or any other, sprang from the Assideans, we shall have occasion to speak in another place.

much greater numbers, he forced to fly into foreign countries, to secure themselves ^a from his resentment. Having once injected an universal fear on all his enemies, he marched from city to city, overturned the idolatrous altars, opened the Jewish synagogues, which had, till then, been either shut, or appropriated to other uses; made a diligent search after all the sacred books which had escaped the fury of their enemies, and ordered fresh copies to be written of them; caused the reading and expounding of the scriptures, prayers, and other parts of divine worship to be resumed (N), and all the males born since the persecution to be circumcised ^r. In all these God blessed him with such success, that he had extended this reformation through a considerable part of Judæa, within the short space of one year; and had in all likelihood gone through with it, even to Jerusalem, where the strongest Syrian garison was kept, had ^b he not been prevented with death. But what he left unfinished, was soon after perfected by his worthy sons, especially by Judas Maccabeus, of whom we shall speak more fully in the next section.

In the meantime Mattathias, finding himself quite worn out with age and sickness, called his sons together, and spoke to them to this effect, Hitherto pride and oppression have been suffered to prosper over us, for a punishment of our sins; but now be ye valiant and zealous for God's laws, and fear not to expose your lives in defence of God's covenant with your forefathers, if you expect the reward promised to it. Call to your remembrance the obedience of Abraham, the faithfulness of Joseph, the zeal of Phineas, Caleb's courage, David's constancy, Elijah's zeal, and the intrepidity of ^c Daniel, and his faithful companions. Let their miraculous deliverances inspire you with a sure trust in the Almighty's protection. Be not discouraged by the threats and weak efforts of the greatest men, who, tho' they seem to triumph now, will shortly be cut off, and become the food of worms; but arm yourselves with courage in defence of our laws, liberties and religion, and you will not fail of success. Simon, your eldest brother, has always shewed himself a man of consummate wisdom; let him supply the office of a father and a counsellor, and do nothing without his advice. Judas is well known to you all for his valour and conduct; let him be your general, and lead you against your enemies. And may heaven crown his and your valour with glory and success. Having thus said, he expired in a good old age, and was ^d buried at Modin with his ancestors, greatly lamented by all the faithful in Israel (O). He was, according to his desire, succeeded by his brave son Judas, in the command of the army; and by him the Jewish religion and state were soon after restored to their ancient splendor, as we shall see in the next section.

(N) We have already taken notice, that the king's prohibition extended only to the five books of Moses; which had therefore been taken away from them, and been either burnt and destroyed, or polluted with blood, swine's broth, idolatrous pictures, and other such defilements, which rendered them unfit for future service, and to which therefore he substituted new ones, which he caused to be transcribed from the best copies.

But this had not obstructed the lecture of other sacred books, the Prophets and Hagiographa, amongst those who had persisted in the exercise of their religion, and who then substituted these to the pentateuch; so that when the public worship came to be restored, and the law to be again read and expounded as formerly, they still retained also the reading and explaining the other books; and this occasioned double lessons, one out of the law, and the other out of the prophets, &c. which continued ever after; and for the understanding of which, new targums or paraphrases in the Chaldee were compiled by proper persons, as we have elsewhere hinted in this chapter ^{*}.

(O) The first book of Maccabees doth barely tell us, that he died in the one hundred and forty-sixth Year, without mentioning whether of his life, or of the æra of the Selencida. Some therefore have taken it in the former sense; but the far greater part in the latter; for the one hundred and forty-sixth year of the kingdom of the Greeks falls exactly with the Julian year 166 before Christ, which is the year in which he died (45).

His deciding the point about the necessity of taking arms on the sabbath, has made several learned men, both Jews and Christians, fancy that he had been high-priest of the Jews (46); but it is plain he did not determine the case by his own authority, but by the advice of such learned men as were with him; neither doth the book of Maccabees or Josephus say any thing of this imaginary dignity. It appears on the contrary, that Menelaus was still alive, and in credit at the court of Antiochus, and was succeeded by his brother Alcimus, of whom we shall speak in the sequel.

The sequel of the Jewish history, from Judas Maccabeus, to the conquest of Judæa by the Romans.

- a JUDAS, surnamed Maccabeus, from whom the heroes of this epocha had the name of Maccabees (P), did not suffer his troops to continue longer idle than till they had ended the days of his father's mourning. His little army amounted to no

(P) There are various conjectures concerning the etymology of this word, and not one of them to be depended upon; not only because nothing is more uncertain than etymologies, but because the book of the Maccabees being only extant in Greek, we have no certainty which were the original letters of the word; so that some have taken the middle letter to have been a π, others a μ, others the β, according to which the sense of the verb will vary exceedingly.

It might indeed appear at first sight, that the Maccabees were so called from the Hebrew מַכְבֵּה, Muchabeh, or Meuchabeh, hid, as a term of contempt, because they hid themselves in holes and caverns; and that having afterwards wiped off the reproach of it by their bravery, they retained still that appellation in memory of their former abscon- sion; or from the word Makkebab, which signifies a cavern; and so they might be called caverners, or lurkers in caverns.

Others derive it from the verba macab to wound, from makab to perforate, from hakab to supplant; all which they do, by some seeming analogy, apply either to those Jewish heroes who fought, or to those who suffered martyrdom for their religion, whether in Judas or out of it. Rufinus above-men- tioned tells us indeed, that the eldest of the seven brethren who suffered under Antiochus, was called Maccabeus; and that all the rest who fought or suf- fered for the same cause with him, were called Maccabei; but he gives us no authority for it but his own.

The most general opinion is, that it was taken from the four initial letters מַכְבֵּה of the 15th verse of the 15th of Exodus, Mi camoca baelim Jehovah, Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? which four letters are supposed to have been em- broyded upon their standards and shields, in the manner of the Romans S. P. Q. R. That the Jews were afterwards fond of these abbreviations, appears from those of the treble or quadruple name of their learned Rabbies; such is that of RAMBAN for Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon; RALBAG for Rabbi Levi-ben Gershom, and many more (1); but whether or no these kind of abbreviations were so ancient as the Maccabees, it seems plain from the text, that Judas had that surname long before he displayed his stand- ards against his enemies (2); not by anticipation, but in the same manner as his other brethren had each his different one, of which it would still be more difficult to find the cause or meaning.

However that be, Judas the Jewish chief seems to have bore it by way of eminence; and from him it passed to his brethren and successors, and thence to all who took up arms, or died for the Jewish cause; and lastly, it was given to the books which contain the history of those wars and persecutions, and of which it will be therefore necessary to give our readers a short account, before we close this note.

The first book of the Maccabees was written origi- nally, either in Hebrew or in the Chaldee, which became the current language of the Jews after the capti- vity. Its style and phrase come nearest that of the sa- cred historians of any of the Apocrypha, and its chro- nological computation is purely Hebrew, and begins al- ways at the month Nisan, answering to our March and April; whereas the Syrians, &c. began their year six months later. St. Jerom tells us, that he had seen it in the former (3); and Origen tells us, that it was intitled Sharbis Sar Bene El, or, the sceptre of the prince of the sons of God (4); or, according to others, (who read Sarbene in one word, and with the samech instead of the shin) the sceptre of the rebels against the Lord, intimating, that the Maccabees had main- tained the divine sceptre or power, against those who had rebelled against it; but the original has been long since lost, and the Greek version is now reckoned the most authentic.

It contains a clear and succinct history of what happened to the Jews, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, to the death of the high-priest Simon (5); that is, of about forty years. It was partly com- piled from the memoirs which Judas Maccabeus had caused to be collected (6), and partly from those of the high-priest Hyrannus the son of Simon, who began his government where the book ends, and who is therefore by some supposed to be the author of it, tho' he be barely quoted in it as having tur- nished him the materials out of his chronicle (7), and seems therefore to have lived after him.

Theodotion is generally supposed to have translated this book into Greek; but it being quoted by some fathers as ancient as that writer, seem to argue this version to be of older date. It is however from this that our English version was made.

The second book of the Maccabees is, as we have observed in another section, an epitome of a larger history written by one Jason, but long since lost. Both the author and the abridger seem to have been Hellenists, by their manner of computation and style; or rather it looks like a collection of some valuable pieces relating to the Jewish history, from the attempt of Heliodorus upon the treasury of the temple, to the signal victory which Judas Macca- beus gained over Nicanor fifteen years after.

It begins with two letters from the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, one to the Jews of Alexandria, the other to those in Egypt, to notify to them the purification of the temple, and dedication of the new altar, in- stead of that which had been polluted with the idol of Jupiter, and to exhort them to join in the cele- bration of the festival of it on the twenty-fifth of the month Cisleu. But both these letters are esteem- ed even more apocryphal than the rest of the history, and therefore neither of them need be longer dwelt upon.

We have already spoken of the third book of the Maccabees, as previous in time to these two, and in authority to the latter of them. We shall likewise refer the reader to what we subjoined in that note concerning the fourth book of that name.

more than six thousand men^a; but what they wanted in number, they made up in a zeal and bravery, and God gave them such success, that they quickly got into some of the strongest fortresses of Judæa, fell upon their enemies so suddenly, and with such courage, that they drove them out of their cities, villages and advantageous posts; insomuch that Judas's name began to become terrible to the Syrians, Samaritans and apostate Jews, whilst those who had forsook their country to avoid persecution, were encouraged to resort daily to him from their retreats, whereby his troops increased to a degree as to make Apollonius, the then governor of Judæa and Samaria, think it high time to suppress their growing power, before it was grown to a greater height. He hastened therefore to raise a considerable army, which chiefly consisted of Samaritans, Jewish renegadoes, and other neighbouring nations, with whom he b marched against the Maccabean chief. Judas, on the other hand, in no ways terrified with the superiority of the enemy, came out against him with his handful of men, and gave him a total defeat. Apollonius was killed on the spot, with a great number of his men. The rest were put to the rout, leaving a rich plunder behind them. Among the rest of the spoil, Judas took the slain governor's sword, and used it ever after in those wars which he waged against the enemies of the Jewish nation^b.

THIS defeat so enraged Antiochus, that upon his hearing the first news of it, he swore again the total extirpation of the Jews; and happy was it for them that his treasury was then so exhausted by his extravagant largesses, that he was forced to suppress his resentment, till he could raise a sufficient supply of money to renew the war against them; but before he could accomplish this, another of his generals c received likewise a signal overthrow. This was Seron, deputy-governor of Cælo-Syria^c under Ptolemy Macron, who took it into his head to come against Judas, in hopes, that if he could defeat that little army of his before the king sent more forces thither, he should gain no small glory by it. He advanced therefore with his troops as far as Bethoron, where Judas met him with a handful of his men. These seeing the superiority of the enemy, expressed a great reluctance to engage, fatigued as they were with marching and fasting (Q); but Judas soon dispelled their fears, by reminding them, that they fought the cause of God, who was not wont to save by strength or number, and whose glory, now concerned in their success, would display itself the more, by the disproportion there was between their two armies. Having thus put d new life into them, they fell upon the Syrians with such vigour, that Seron was overthrown and killed, with eight hundred of his men, on the spot. Some of the rest fled as far as Bethoron, and the greatest part saved themselves by running into the land of the Philistines^d. These continued successes of the new Jewish general made Philip governor of Judæa think it high time to acquaint Antiochus with the danger that province was in of being lost, if not speedily relieved. Antiochus had then left the government to Lysias, whilst himself was gone beyond the Euphrates, as we have seen elsewhere*. Lysias, who had orders to invade Judæa, and to destroy all the Jews, e dispatched immediately to Ptolemy Macron, governor of Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia, and to Nicanor and Georgias, two experienced officers, forty thousand foot, with orders to see the king's commands punctually obeyed against the Jewish nation. These came and encamped on the plains of Emmaus, not far from Jerusalem, about twenty miles from Lydda, where they were reinforced with seven thousand horse. Nicanor, who had resolved to raise, if possible, the sum of two thousand talents, which the king his master did owe to the Romans, caused proclamation to be made in all the cities and sea-ports round about, that he would sell his Jewish captives at the rate of ninety for a talent; and this brought a great concourse of merchants, who came with large sums of money to purchase those captives. Our author reckons no less than a thou-

(Q) It was, it seems, this Hebrew general's method to keep a fast before they engaged the enemy (9); and here their march, fast and onset so closely followed, that his men began to despond of the victory, when they saw the superiority of Seron's army to theirs.

As for Bethoron, it was, according to St. Jerom and Eusebius, about twelve thousand paces from Jerusalem (10); but, according to Josephus, one hundred stades (11). It was situate northward of Jerusalem, and between that metropolis and Shushem (12).

- a fand of them, besides a great number of servants, who brought chains and other materials to convey them away *.

Judas being thoroughly apprised of this bloody apparatus against his nation, gathered his little army together, consisting only of six thousand men, and reminded them, not only of his late signal victories, but of those which had been formerly gained in a more miraculous manner against Senacherib, and other powerful enemies of the Jews; and particularly of a recent one, which six thousand of their nation had gained over an army of one hundred and twenty thousand Gauls and Macedonians †. However, concluded he, remember, that, let the success be what it will, it is still more glorious to die sword in hand, in defence of our religion, lives and liberties, than to fall into the hands of an enemy fully determined to our utter destruction.

- b After this exhortation, he was obliged, by the Mosaic law, to make a proclamation, that all who had married wives, planted vineyards, &c. or whose hearts failed, should depart ‡; and this carried off near one half of his men, whilst the rest who remained intrepid, were scarcely furnished with weapons fit for so bold and unequal an enterprise †. However, he led his three thousand men to Mizpa (R), there to implore the divine assistance, by prayer, fasting and sacrifices, in confidence of which he marched with them against the enemy, and encamped as near them as he safely could, resolved to give them battle early on the next morning, of which he gave his troops notice that very night †. In the mean time news were brought to him by some of his scouts, that Georgias was coming at the head of five thousand of his choicest men, and one thousand horse, to surprise him in his camp; which gave him such an opportunity of countermining him, as gained him a complete and easy victory; for taking the advantage of Georgias's absence, he and his three thousand men fell on a sudden on the Syrian army, killed three thousand of their men, and put the rest to flight, and into such confusion, that they could not be rallied again by any means, but left their camp, and all their baggage and spoil, behind them, and fled. Georgias having in vain fought for his enemy, whom he supposed to have retired again into the mountains, was returning back to his army, when he perceived his camp on fire, which threw his men into such a panic, that, in spite of all he could do to prevent it, they threw down their arms, and ran after the rest. Judas did not leave off pursuing them, till he had killed six thousand more of their men, besides a great number of maimed and wounded; after which he led his victorious troop to plunder the enemies camp, where, among other rich spoil, they found that money which the greedy merchants had brought to buy the Jewish captives with. This signal victory was gained on the Friday, and the next day, being their sabbath, was celebrated with suitable returns to the divine providence for their miraculous deliverance †.

- c THIS defeat proved doubly advantageous to the conqueror. It furnished him with quantities of arms and ammunition for his men, and his fame drew daily fresh reinforcements from all parts of Judea, whom his success encouraged to repair to him from all the places of their dispersion; so that he found himself soon after in a condition to attempt another action, which proved no less glorious and successful to him. Timotheus, governor of the country beyond Jordan, and Bacchides, another experienced officer of the Syrian army, had joined their forces, and were coming against him, with a design to retrieve their late defeat; but Judas was by this time so well reinforced, that he met and overthrew them in a set battle, killed twenty thousand of their men, enriched himself with their spoil, got a new supply of provisions for his men, and took presently after several strong fortresses from the disheartened Syrians,

(R) This place, which is famous in the Old Testament upon many accounts, and where the Jews used to assemble themselves to worship before the temple was built (13), was now made choice of upon this occasion, the temple being then polluted, and kept by a Syrian garison.

Here they fasted in sackcloth and ashes, whilst Elezazar, Judas's brother, read and expounded to them some proper portions out of the scriptures. The Nazarites likewise, who should have performed the conclusion of their vows at the temple †, assembled themselves with the priests in their robes; and, at the close of their fast and prayers, the priestly trumpets gave a signal, as a sure omen of their future victory; and the Maccabean chief gave for the watch word, the help of God (14).

which he garisoned with some of his troops, and deposited in them the arms which they had taken from the enemy. In the distribution of all the spoil Judas's generosity outwent what was even prescribed by the Mosaic law, which intitled none to share it with the combatants, but those who were left to take care of the baggage †; but he caused a considerable part to be divided among his indigent brethren, so that the old, decrepit, the sick and lame, the widows and the fatherless, were made partakers of the fruits of his victories. In this battle was killed one of Timotheus's chief officers, named Philarchus, who had been a bitter enemy to the Jews; and whilst they were making their rejoicings for their success, news were brought, that Calisthenes, the man who had first set fire to the gates of the temple, had concealed himself in a little house not far from them; upon which Judas dispatched a detachment, who went and set it on fire, and burnt him in it, as a just retaliation for his sacrilege¹. As for Nicanor, he saved indeed his life, but lost his honour, being forced to retreat to Antioch in the disguise of a servant, and there excuse his late disgrace, by owning, that the Jews, when under the protection of their God, were invincible^m.

WHEN Lysias heard the news of the total defeat of the army he had sent into Judæa, he made all the haste he could to put himself at the head of sixty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all of the choicest troops he could get; and entering Judæa with them through the territories of Idumea, was met at Betbura (S) by the Maccabite general, at the head of only ten thousand men. The two armies engaged, and Judas, tho' so much inferior to the Syrians, fell upon them with such courage, that he immediately killed five thousand of them on the spot, and routed the rest; and Lysias observing that the Jews fought like men determined either to conquer or die, dared not venture a second engagement with the remainder of his scared army; but returned to Antioch, with a design to bring a much greater force against them by the return of the year (T)ⁿ.

(S) This was a very important fortress about that time. It was in the tribe of Judah (15), and had formerly been fortified by king Rehoboam (16), it being one of the keys of Judæa on the south-side of Idumea (17). The second book of the Maccabees places it at five furlongs distance from Jerusalem (18); but this must be a mistake either of the translator or transcriber, it being, according to Eusebius, full twenty miles from it, on the road to Hebron (19).

It is likely that this was one of the fortresses which Judas had retaken from the Syrians, and which Lysias came now to besiege; but was defeated in the attempt by the Jewish chief, who came immediately from Bethoron to its relief.

(T) This is one of the most signal victories that ever Judas yet gained against the Syrians, and at the same time the most difficult to be accounted for, from the imperfect relation which the Jewish authors give us of it. That which he gained against those two experienced generals, Nicanor and Georgias, was owing to a surprize, the Syrian army being attacked in the night, and in the absence of one of their generals, whilst the other, depending on his stratagem, did lie in profound security. In that which he gained over Timotheus and Bacchides, he killed twenty thousand of their men before they gave ground; neither is it said of either of these two actions, whether Judas attacked the two commanders jointly or separately; so that if we may guess, from his character, it is more likely he fell upon them in both, before they had joined their forces.

But in this, Lysias comes at the head of sixty thousand choice foot, and ten thousand horse, sets down before Betbura, is attacked by only ten thousand men, and has scarcely five thousand of his own killed, a small number out of seventy thousand; before he is routed and so disheartened, as to leave the province, and retire to Antioch. Our authors do not tell us in what order either side disposed their troops; but from what we have formerly mentioned of the Jewish way of fighting †, and even by what we can gather from that of the Maccabees, who seem to have still followed the old way, the method was, (whenever their army was too small to make a front equal to that of the enemy) to divide their troops into four or five bodies of a considerable depth, and so fall on the enemy at proportionable distances.

As for the Syrians, we may reasonably suppose that they did, like other nations, spread their phalanges according to the number of their troops, and cover at least their two wings with their cavalry; and in this last respect Lysias had vastly the advantage, as well as in number, since we find not anywhere that the Maccabees made use of any cavalry; for, if they had, it is hardly to be supposed their historians would have omitted mentioning it, as well as that of the enemy.

Let us therefore suppose ever so great a superiority in the Jewish army, either in point of courage and experience, knowledge of the ground, advantage of situation, or the like, it will still appear next to a miracle, that seventy thousand choice men of horse and foot should be routed and broken, upon the death of five thousand of their men, and by so small a number as ten thousand, (suppose none of these were either killed or wounded) so as not to be rallied again by their old experienced officers; but that they should, one and all, be flung into such consternation, as to quit both the field and the country to so inferior an enemy.

If therefore the Jewish authors have not exaggerated the number of their enemies, we may very well suppose they have their character; and by their defeat,

- a But all these successes seemed still too small to our Jewish general, whilst the sanctuary continued polluted with abominable idols, the temple garrisoned by idolaters, and the city a ruined heap. As soon therefore as their enemies were gone out of the province, Judas marched with his army to the metropolis, fully purposed to recover and purify it, and was as cheerfully followed by them. Upon their coming to mount Sion, and seeing the desolation in which it did lie, the houses, palaces and gates of the temple burnt down, the courts of the sanctuary over-run with shrubs and briers, the priestly apartments demolished, the altar and holy places profaned, and stripped of all their ancient splendor, they rent their cloaths, covered their heads with dust, filled the air with cries, and other tokens of the liveliest sorrow. As soon as Judas observed these first emotions a little assuaged, he posted some of his bravest troops to guard all the avenues of the city from surprize, and then appointed such of the priestly order as had best signalized themselves for their zeal and sanctity, to enter into the temple, and see it thoroughly rid of all its profane lumber, whilst the rest of the people were busy in clearing the streets and places of all their rubbish. Whatever old materials they found, that had undergone any defilement, they broke in pieces, and carried them out of the city, and buried them in some common place, especially the altar of burnt-offerings, which had been so notoriously profaned, that no part of it was fit for future use; and which was therefore demolished, and carried off, and another of unhewn stones substituted to it (V). There were still many things wanting before the divine service could be resumed; the altar of perfumes, the table of shew-bread, the seven-branch candlestick, censers, and other sacred utensils, all of the purest gold, had been carried off, as well as the rich veil which covered the holy of holies: all these therefore the Jewish chief caused to be made anew out of the spoils of their enemies; and all being set up in their respective places, and the holy and most holy place repaired, they began the divine worship with the dedication of the new altar, and other holy utensils, on the twenty-fifth day of the month Cisleu, it being the very same day on which it had ceased by the profanation of the temple three years before, and in the second year of Judas's government.

Comes and purifies the city and temple.

- d This ceremony, which was performed with all imaginable solemnity, was ushered in with the earliest dawn, by the sound of the trumpets, by raising a fresh fire by the striking of two fire-stones; which was no sooner kindled, than they began with offering the lamb for the daily sacrifice, lighting the lamps, burning the usual portion of incense, and all other parts of the divine service, according to the Mosaic law; from which time it was never discontinued, till the destruction of the temple by the Romans. This festival was kept eight days with great devotion and joy, after which it was ordered to be solemnized every year in the same manner, by the whole nation, under the name of the feast of the dedications v. During this time the front of the temple was adorned with crowns, garlands, escutcheons, and other ornaments defeat, and their general's so suddenly retiring from Judas, it may be reasonably concluded, that his army, instead of consisting of such choice horse and foot, was only an undisciplined multitude, gathered up in haste, and easily scared at the sight of so brave and resolute an enemy. What confirms this conjecture is, that Lysias had much better success the next year, when he came against Bethzura with a fresh army, whilst that of Judas, as well his fame, and consequently the courage of his troops, increased by every one of these victories.

(V) It seems there arose no small difficulty among the Jewish doctors, about disposing of the materials of this old altar. On the one hand, it had been dedicated to, and had a long time been used in the service of God; so that they thought it unlawful to apply them to any common uses. On the other hand, the heathens had polluted it in so many ways, by sacrificing unclean beasts upon it to their idols and false deities, that the retaining any part of it would have been deemed to defile all their future offerings. At length a middle expedient was agreed on, that they should be deposited into some convenient cavity of the mountain on which the temple stood, till some prophet arose that could direct them how to dispose better of them (20).

Among the sacred utensils which Judas caused to be made, instead of those which Antiochus had carried off, we do not read of an ark and mercy-seat to stand in the most holy place; nor is it said by Exra, Nehemiah, or even by Josephus, that ever they made a new one.

The Talmudists, after the author of the second book of the Maccabees, tell us indeed, that Jeremiah caused the old one which Moses had made, to be buried in so secret a place a little before the captivity, that it could never be found; and the former add, that it will never be brought forth, till God is reconciled to the people, and has gathered them all under the king Messiah. It is therefore reckoned one of the five things that were wanted in the second temple; but whether they made any thing like it after their return, is more than we dare affirm. We shall see in the sequel, that when the Romans plundered the sanctuary, they found it quite empty of all those utensils.

of the best gold. Every house was likewise illuminated and adorned; and from a thence it was also called the feast of lights⁴ (W). The author of the second book of the Maccabees adds⁵, that in memory of their having kept the feast of the tabernacles whilst they lurked in their dens, and on the mountains, they repaired to the temple on this new festival with palms and other curious branches in their hands, and celebrated this wonderful deliverance with psalms and hymns suitable to the occasion.

AND now there remained but one obstacle more to be removed, namely, the garison which Apollonius had placed in the fortress of Acra, on the eminence over-against the temple (X), to annoy those that went to and from it; for whilst that was still kept by heathens and apostate Jews, it could not but obstruct their concourse to that place of worship. A siege would have took up too much time, had Judas been furnished with men and warlike instruments for it; because the place was very strong both by art and nature: and to have blockaded it would have taken up a greater number of men than he could spare. There was therefore but one way left, namely, to fortify the mountain of the temple with a high wall, and strong towers round about, and to leave a stout garison to defend it, and hinder that of Acra from disturbing those who resorted to Jerusalem. At the same time Judas caused some additional fortifications to be made to Bethzura, it being, as was lately observed, an advantageous fortress, to obstruct the entrance from Idumea (Y); for which reason it had been lately attempted by *Lysias*⁶.

BY this time all the neighbouring nations having heard what had been done at Jerusalem, were so exasperated against the Jews, that they resolved to join their forces to extirpate the whole nation. They began with murdering all those that chanced to live among them, and waited only the coming of Antiochus into Judaea to assist

(W) It was accordingly continued to be celebrated by lighting of many candles, some at their doors, and some in their houses. Even to this time they light a certain number of large wax-tapers in their synagogues during this festival; that is, one on the first day, two on the second, and so on to eight on the last day of the feast; the occasion of which, the Jews tell us, was, that when they came to light the lamps on the great candlestick, they could find no holy oil to feed them with, till, after much looking, they found a little vessel sealed, which contained just as much as would serve one day; but, to their surprise, burnt eight whole days. On this day they likewise celebrated the death of Holophernes by Judith, tho' they are not all agreed that it happened about this time (21).

It was lawful however to work during the festival, it being only observed by mirth and going to the synagogue. The Jews call it hanuca, which signifies restoration, or renewing. One of the evangelists calls it encania (22), which implies the same thing, and adds, that it fell in the winter, about the time of that solstice.

This circumstance is so much the more material, because Christ vouchsafing to assist at it, tho' appointed only by human authority, sufficiently proves the lawfulness of instituting festivals in memory of public blessings (23).

The Jews did indeed celebrate two other dedications, viz. that of Solomon, and that of Zerubbabel, which were properly founded on divine authority, because instituted by persons divinely inspired; but that this which our Saviour is observed to have been present at, could be neither of these, is plain, because that of Solomon was kept in the month Tisbri, which is about our autumn (24); and that of Zerubbabel in the month Adar, or the last month, which falls in the spring (25); whereas that of Ju- das Maccabens was in the winter, which agrees with what the evangelist says of it in the place above-quoted.

(X) The word Acra, properly signifies an eminence, or fortress built on some eminent ground, which has the command of the country round about; and as this of Acra stood higher than that of Sion, it gave that garison the advantage of annoying all that passed to and from the temple, as was observed above.

(Y) It will not be improper here to remind our readers, that this Idumea is not the Idumea anciently so called in the sacred books of the Old Testament, otherwise the land of Edom, situate between the Dead and the Red sea, and known since by the name of Arabia Petrea; concerning which the reader may see what has been said in a former volume *.

But this we are now speaking of, was a portion of the inheritance of the tribes of Simeon and Judah, taken in possession by some Idumeans, during the time of the Babylonish captivity; who being driven out of their land by the Nabatheans, came and settled here, and enlarged their territory from the south part of the lot of Judah, as far as Hebron, which they made their metropolis, as it had been that of the tribe of Judah. These therefore, and not the ancient Edomites, are the Idumeans we shall have often occasion to mention in the sequel of this history.

Now Bethzura, lying on the road between Hebron and Jerusalem, at about twenty miles from the latter, as we have hinted in a former note, was an important barrier against the incursions of the Syrian troops that were in Idumea, and did well deserve all the care that Judas bestowed in the fortifying of it.

a them in the utter destruction of the Jews; but, happily for these, Antiochus's death, which happened soon after, broke all their measures, and freed them from the bloody designs which that exasperated tyrant had sworn against them, when he heard of their success against his three generals'. We have already given an account, both of his preparations and extraordinary death in a former chapter *, and to which nothing needs to be added here.

THE minority of the young Antiochus caused some alterations in Palestine, and gave the Jews a kind of respite, which proved however but short-lived. Ptolemy Macron, governor of Cælo-Syria, who had been an inveterate enemy to the Jews, and had made them suffer great hardships during the last reign, was now by some means become their friend; but he was soon after accused for it to the king, and deprived of his government by Lysias, who succeeded him in it, and came presently after with a powerful army into Judæa. In the interim, Georgias, who commanded the Syrian forces there, having gathered a fresh body of strangers, was making continual incursions against the Jews, whilst the Idumæans, who had joined with him, held the most advantageous posts, and received in them all the renegado Jews, in hopes to tire the rest by prolonging the war. But Judas having gathered his army together, went and attacked them in that part of their territories, which was called Acrabatene, and killed no less than twenty thousand of them †. From thence he marched against the children of Ben (Z), who had proved a great thorn in his sides, and drove them into two of their strongest towers; and when he understood they were furnished with every necessary thing to hold out a siege, he left his three brethren, Simon, Joseph, and Zaccheus, with a sufficient force to reduce them, whilst he led the rest upon a more important expedition. During the siege, some of Simon's head officers suffered themselves to be bribed with a sum of seventy thousand drachms, to let some of the besiegers escape. Judas being informed of it, ordered those traitors to be tried by the heads of the army, and to be put to death; after which he took the two fortresses by assault, put both garisons, which consisted of about twenty thousand, to death, burnt the towers to the ground, and past over Jordan into the land of the Ammonites ‡. These he found likewise in a good posture of defence, having Timotheus the Syrian general at their head, who had gathered a great number of forces out of Asia, and was coming to invade Judæa; he had several skirmishes with the Ammonites, before he could come at the Syrian commander, defeated and killed great numbers of them; after which he took the city of Jazar, put a garison in it, and marched back into Judæa §.

IN the mean time Timotheus had not been idle, but had gathered together an army from among all the heathen nations, who were now more than ever exasperated against the Jews, resolved, if possible, to wipe off the disgrace of his former defeat, with the extirpation of that people. To this end, he entered Judæa with his new forces. Judas did not let him penetrate far, before he met, and totally defeated him, killed twenty thousand five hundred of his foot, and six hundred horse, and forced him to retreat into the city of Gazara (A), which was commanded by his brother Chereas. Hither Judas pursued and invested him, and having carried the place in five days, slew him with his brother and another Syrian general named Apollonides ¶. This defeat, though very advantageous to the Jews, proved the cause of great numbers of their nation being murdered by the heathens, who could not brook the continual success of the Maccabite general. A thousand of them were sacrificed to their fury in the land of Tob, and their wives and children carried into captivity; the rest of their brethren must have undergone the same fate, had they not timely prevented it, by flying into Dathema, a fortress in the land of Gilead, and there timely provi-

(Z) Whether Ben was the name of a man, city, or tribe, is not certain; but most probably they were a tribe of Idumæans, of whom the text says, that they were a snare and decoy to the Israelites, and did lie in wait against them on the high-ways

ded for their own defence^a. From thence they sent letters to Judas, informing him of their condition, and that Timotheus, perhaps the son of him that was lately killed at Gazara, at the head of the Tyrians, Sidonians, Ptolemaidans, and others, was besieging them in it. Judas had scarcely done reading these letters, when he received others from other brethren in Galilee, who were also in the same distress. The general immediately convened a sanhedrin, in which it was resolved that Judas and his brother Jonathan should go to help the Gileadites, with part of his troops, making in all about eight thousand: that Simon, another of his brothers, should go with another part, to succour those of Galilee; and that Joseph and Azarias his other brothers, should stay to defend Jerusalem with the residue of their troops. To these latter, Judas gave strict charge in no case to act offensively, but to stand in their own defence, b till his or his brother Simon's return^a.

Judas.

UPON Judas's passing the Jordan, he was informed by the Nabatbeans, with whom he was then at peace, that not only the Jews of Darbema, but likewise those of Bossora, Caspbon, Maked, Alema, Carnaim, and other considerable cities of the land of Gilead, were likewise closely shut up by their enemies, and, if not timely relieved, were designed to be all destroyed in one day. As there was no time then to be lost, Judas immediately fell on Bossora, took it, and destroyed all the males; and having freed his brethren, set fire to the city, and marched directly to Darbema. Upon his arrival thither early on the next morning, he found Timotheus ready to storm the place; and fell upon him so unexpectedly, and with such force, that he c put all to the rout; for they no sooner heard the sound of their trumpets, and understood that Judas was at the head of their enemy, than they threw down their arms in the utmost confusion, and betook themselves to flight. Judas pursued them some time, and killed about eight thousand of them; but remembering the condition of his other brethren in the Gileaditish cities, he marched against and took them one after another, made them undergo the same fate as he had that of Bossora, loaded himself with the richest plunder, and returned with his victorious army, and delivered d brethren, to Jerusalem^b.

ON the other hand, Simon, his brother, though inferior in strength, having but three thousand men, was no less successful in Galilee; he defeated his enemies in several rencounters, killed about three thousand of them, and pursued them as far as Ptolemais, enriched himself with their plunder, and delivered his brethren from their cruel thralldom; but finding it impossible with his handful of men to secure their longer abode there, by the total reduction of their oppressors, he chose rather to bring them with their families and valuable things to Jerusalem; whence Judas soon after sent them to new people the desolate cities of Judæa, where they might dwell in more safety. Whilst things went on thus successfully in Gilead and Galilee, the two brothers that were left at Jerusalem, unluckily took it into their heads to signalise themselves also by some brave exploit on their heathen neighbours, though contrary to Judas's express commands. Jamnia appeared to them a fair sea-port town (B), e and worth their conquering, before the return of their victorious brethren. Thither therefore they led their little army, but were unhappily defeated by Georgias, who commanded the place, and who sallied out against them, killed about two thousand of their men, and forced the rest to return with shame and loss to Jerusalem^c.

lucky attempt on Jamnia.*

This disgrace however did not hinder the fame of their worthy brothers increasing daily, and his valour being more and more dreaded by their enemies. This gave the Jewish chief a fresh opportunity of falling upon the Idumeans, who, as we have seen, had joined with the Syrians, and had been in some measure humbled by them. But as he found them still stirring against him, he led his forces into the south parts of Idumea, laid siege to Hebron their famous metropolis, took and demolished it, f with all the neighbouring towns, and carried off a considerable plunder^d. From thence he entered the territories of the Philistines and Samaritans, injecting terror

a where-ever he past, and discouraging those nations at least from acting offensively against him. In this expedition, some indiscreet priests that were in his army, endeavouring to signalise their valour by some exploit against the enemy, fell a sacrifice to their untimely ambition, being all slain in the attempt, and by their deaths convinced both him and his army, how dangerous it was to go one step beyond the orders of such an experienced general. Judas did not return into Judæa till he had taken a tour thro' the land of the Philistines, and destroyed, with their fortresses, all their altars, groves, and other instruments of idolatry *.

ALL these repeated successes raised such a jealousy and shame in the lately defeated Syrian governor, that he assembled an army of eighty thousand foot, together with b all the horse and elephants he could get, and marched with them into Judæa, not doubting but speedily to reduce that unhappy kingdom into as miserable a condition as Antiochus had formerly done. After which his design was to extirpate the whole Jewish nation, and to repopulate their land with heathens, and to enrich his master and himself, both with the richest plunder of the land, and with the sale of the high-priesthood, and other dignities. Flushed with these great hopes, he marched through the southern territories of Judab, probably because the other was too mountainous and craggy for his elephants and cavalry and laid siege to the fortress of Betbuzra. Judas, who was then at Jerusalem, having first implored the divine blessing on his arms, set out with his little army to its relief. On the road there appeared to them a man on horseback in rich shining armour, and seemingly brandishing his spear against c their enemies. This sight, whatever it was, gave his men such flush of courage, that they fell like lions on the Syrian camp, killed eleven thousand foot, and put the rest to flight.

Lysias, now more than ever convinced how impossible it would be to carry on the war against such an enemy with either honour or advantage, sent Judas some overtures of peace †, with a promise that it should be ratified by the king his master, and that the young prince should make him all the concessions he should with justice demand, and conclude an alliance with him. Judas accepted the proposal, and sent soon after John and Abisolom, two of his captains, with the conditions upon which he d would agree to a peace, to Lysias, who caused them to be forthwith conveyed to Antiochus. They contained upon the whole a general amnesty for whatever had been done before; a total revocation of the late edict, which obliged the Jews to renounce their religion, and to conform to that of the Greeks; a free exercise of their religion and customs; and safe passports for commissioners to pass from Jerusalem to Lysias, or, if need required, to Antioch. These conditions, advantageous as they were to the hated Jews, were readily granted by the king, and two letters were sent, the one to the governor, and the other to the Jewish senate. Lysias likewise wrote to them, as did also Q. Memmius and T. Manlius, two Roman ambassadors to the Syrian court. All these four letters the reader may find in the chapter last quoted ‡; by which it
e appears how ready both the governor and his master were to agree to a peace with the victorious Jews, and how friendly those two Romans had interposed their good offices on their behalf (C). It appears also by the king's letter, that Menelaus,

(C) Lysias's letter being dated from the month Discorinius, or, as the Latin version abridges it, Discorus, has very much puzzled the chronologists, because there is no such month to be found in the Syro-Macedonian calendar, or indeed in any other of those times. Those who suppose it to have been an intercalary one, placed between those of Dysirus and Xanthicus (32), answering in part to our March and April, have not given us any proof, that either Syrians, Macedonians, or even Chaldeans, had any such intercalary month; and the main reason on which they build their supposition, viz. that the ratification of the peace is dated from the month Xanthicus, immediately following, doth make rather manifestly against it.

For Antioch and Jerusalem being at least four hundred miles asunder, it is hardly credible that these articles of peace could have been sent for, transmitted and ratified in so short a space as a month. We must therefore either suppose some mistake in the text occasioned by the inadvertency of the transcribers, or suppose that the king was not then at Antioch, but either in Phœnicia, or some other place nearer Jerusalem; and this latter seems indeed the most probable, if we consider, that according to the king's letter (33), those Jews, who were to transact this peace, and to go from Jerusalem to Lysias's camp, or as was observed above, to the Syrian court, had but fifteen days allowed them, viz. from the fifteenth to the thirtieth day of Xanthicus, which would have been too short a space to have gone to and from the king, and makes it reasonable to suppose he was nearer Judæa.

the apostate high-priest, who in all likelihood was then at the Syrian court, had also laboured to promote this peace, and was desirous to be included in it, since he was sent back to Jerusalem by Antiochus, as his letter terms it, to comfort or confirm the Jews^a.

This peace however, which seems to have been obtained from the young king by the sole interest of Lysias, unless we join with him the high-priest above-mentioned, could not be brooked by the other Syrian generals; so that, as soon as Lysias was retired to Antioch, Timotheus, Apollonius (D), Hieronymus, Demophon, and Nicanor governor of Cyprus, began to renew their hostilities against the Jews. The neighbouring nations, whether out of innate hatred against them, or by the suggestion of the Syrian officers, were equally forward to infect them. Some instances of which the author gives us in those of Joppa, who treacherously invited, upon some pretence, a number of Jews, with their wives and children, who lived in the place, on board some barges by the sea shore, rowed them further into the deep, and flung them over-board, to the number of about two hundred. This barbarous action was soon after heard of at Jerusalem; and Judas, justly provoked at it, marched against those murderers, came upon them in the dead of night, set fire to their boats and port, and killed all those that had saved themselves from the flames. He would have done the same to the city itself, but they had timely shut their gates upon him; and when he was resolving its utter destruction, he heard that those of Jamnia had hatched the same cruel mischief against those Jews that lived with them; he turned his arms thitherward, and came suddenly upon them, burnt their ships, port, and magazines, insomuch that the flames were seen from Jerusalem, though, as we hinted before, at near two hundred and forty furlongs, or about thirty miles distance^b.

Judas defeats

Judas staid not to take a further revenge of those two perfidious towns, because he heard that Timotheus, who had by this time got a fresh army, was entered the land of Gilead; but marched directly to their assistance; he had scarce gone nine furlongs, before he was attacked by a band of Arabian nomades (E), in number about five thousand foot, and five hundred horse. A fierce engagement immediately ensued, in which Judas having got the better, forced those booters to sue for peace, and granted it to them the more readily, that his march into Gilead might not be stoppt^c. However, he obliged them to furnish him with a certain number of cattle and provisions, and extorted a promise that they should assist him in any thing he should require of them, after which he marched in all haste to the other side Jordan to attack the Syrian general. However, he met with several other obstacles, and was forced to take some places in his way. The first of them was Caspis, a city well fenced with high walls, and so well provided within, that the inhabitants, trusting to their own strength, threw many scornful and blasphemous sarcasms at the Jewish army; but Judas assaulted it with such an unexpected bravery, that he made himself master of it, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, insomuch that a neighbouring lake about two furlongs broad, was seen running with blood^d.

In this case Diofcorinthius and Dioforus may be probably enough either a corruption, or more likely, other names for Dysurus, immediately preceding Xanthicus, or, if the former be derived from Δις noqivbie, as who should say the month Dius of the Corinthians, because Dius among the Bithynians answered the Dysurus of the Syro-Macedonians, which is not improbable, then the Dioforus of the Latin version will be only an abbreviation or corruption of the Diofcorinthius (34).

These letters bear moreover the date of the hundred and forty-eighth year, viz. of the Seleucide, which the learned author last-quoted has proved to answer to the year before Christ 163, and the rest in proportion accordingly; to which we refer the reader.

(D) Not the general that has been spoken of in the former section, who was the son of Thyrseus, and was killed by Judas, but another, who is here called the son of Gennaeus †.

(E) These were a kind of wandering people, living in tents, and staying in a place no longer than it afforded them provision for themselves and cattle. They were the descendants of Ishmael, and according to the angel's prediction of them (35), their hands were against every man, and every man's hand against them; for they lived chiefly upon plunder, especially of the caravans, who did therefore go well armed, and whenever they met, they seldom gave quarter to one another; and as those plunderers were stout, warlike, and well acquainted with the course of all those countries, it was no ill policy in the Jewish chief to secure their friendship and future services.

- a FROM thence he marched into the land of Tob, where the Jews, called from thence Tubieni, had shut themselves up in the fortrefs of Cbaraca (F); and whence Timotheus having in vain tried to dislodge them, was gone, after having left a good garifon in a place strongly fittuate within its neighbourhood to keep them in awe. As soon therefore as Judas found him gone, he sent two of his generals with a detachment to take that garifon, whilst he with the rest of his army, marched in search of the Syrian chief. Dositheus and Sosipater, the two Hebrew generals, soon after forced the garifon, and put it to the sword to the number of ten thousand. By this time Timotheus had got an army of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; and when he heard that Judas was in full march against him, he sent all the women, children, and other luggage, into Carnion, a strong city of Gilead, and very difficult of access, whilst himself incamped his army in the neighbourhood of Rapbon, upon the borders of the river Jabboc. As soon as Judas was come near enough for his van-guard to be seen by the enemy, they seem to have been seized with a panic fear, for they made such haste to fly from him, that they wounded one another with their own weapons in the flight. In this running fight Timotheus lost thirty thousand of his men, and unable to rally the rest, betook himself to his heels. Those who escaped the slaughter, finding themselves closely pursued, fled into Carnion, and a great number of them went and took refuge in the temple of Atargatis (G). Judas, who came close after them, burnt the temple, and them in it; then setting fire to the rest of the city, they all perished likewise, either by the flames, or by his sword, to the number of twenty-five thousand. As for Timotheus, he fell in his sight into the hands of Dositheus and Sosipater, who were halting from the land of Tob to join their commander. These two captains however were persuaded by him to give him his liberty, upon promise that he would do the same to a great number of Jews, whom he held prisoners, many of whom were very nearly related, either to some of those officers, or to some of their troops there present^m. This victory quite completed the reduction of the land of Gilead, and put it out of his enemies power to undertake any thing against him there. However, as the cities of Judaea were still in great measure unpeopled, he chose rather to follow his brother Simon's example, and bring the Jewish Gileadites to inhabit and fortify themⁿ.
- d I n his way to Judaea, he was of necessity to pass through Ephron, that city being so advantageously situate, that he could neither turn to the right nor the left hand of it. It was moreover well fortified and peopled by strangers of all nations. He therefore sent in a peaceable manner to demand a passage through it; but they instead of opening their gates to him, did shut, and even wall them up, and prepared themselves for a siege. Judas therefore caused it to be proclaimed through his camp, that every man should scale the walls in the place that chanced to be over-against him. On the other hand, the city, which had been well garifoned by Lysias, had placed their choicest men on the battlements of it. The assault was fierce, and lasted the whole day; at length Judas carried it, and took the city, put all the males, about twenty-five thousand, to the sword, took their wives and daughters captive, seized all the richest plunder, and burnt and quite erased the place. From Ephron, crossing the Jordan, he spread his army along the plains of Bethshan, then called Scythopolis, a considerable city, about a hundred furlongs from Jerusalem †. Here he inquired of the Jews how they had been treated by the Scythians, and they answering much to

We find a city mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy by the name of Carno in Arabia. Eusebius mentions one near Jerusalem (37); and there might be many more of the same name, if Ashtar was either the moon, worshipped under that name, or the Egyptian Isis, repre-

(G) Supposed to be the same with the Astarte mentioned in the last note. Diodorus says (39), she was worshipped at Ascalon, under the figure of a woman from the navel upward, and fish downward, like the Dagon of, if not the same with that of the Philistines; for she was worshipped under several names, though under the same form, being called Derceto at Joppa, Ashtaroth, Atargatis, and Atergata in other places (40).

the commendation of that people; Judas returned them thanks for their kindness to his brethren, exhorted them to live in friendship with them, and assured them of his own^o, and then continued his journey towards Jerusalem. During their march, Judas kept still in the rear of his army, encouraging those that lagged behind, and brought them at length to that metropolis about the time of pentecost. Here they went to the temple to return thanks to God for their quick and wonderful success (H), and particularly that they were all returned safe and victorious without the loss of one man^p.

Judas had still a powerful enemy left: Georgias, governor of Idumea, was at the head of that nation, and had harassed the Jews for some time. He therefore made no longer stay at Jerusalem than the ending of that festival, immediately after which he marched at the head of only three thousand foot and four hundred horse. The two armies met, and the onset was so fierce on both sides, that Judas, till then so victorious, had the mortification to see some of his men killed on the spot. Dositheus likewise, a brave captain of his, whom we have lately mentioned upon another occasion, having seized the Idumean general alive, had his arm cut off close to the shoulder by a Thracian horseman, and was forced to quit his prisoner, who took that opportunity to fly into Maresa, a fortress near Eleutheropolis. Another part of his troops commanded by Esdra, had sustained the shock so long, that they were quite exhausted. At length Judas having again revived his men by fresh prayers, and warlike canticles, the enemy took fright and fled, which gave him an opportunity of rallying his scattered forces to Odollam, a town near the field of battle, where they purified themselves for the sabbath then ensuing. On the day following, when he and his men came to view the slain, in order to bury them, they found upon every one of them some gold and silver idols, which had been consecrated by the Jamnites, and which, though taken in plunder, were forbidden to be worn by the law of Moses^q. It was then easy for them to discover the true cause of their late defeat, and the just punishment of those wretches, who had ventured to transgress in that clandestine manner. Judas did not lose so fair an opportunity of inspiring the survivors with an abhorrence against all such heathenish superstitions, and with a sure confidence in God, as long as they kept themselves free from them. He then ordered a voluntary collection to be made among them, which amounted to two thousand drachms of silver, which he sent to Jerusalem, and caused an expiatory sacrifice to be offered up for those that had thus died in their sin, and to avert any further punishment being inflicted on them for it in the other life (I)^r. From thence Judas fell upon the southern parts of Idumea, took Hebron and other fortresses; after which he went and took Azotus from the Philistines, and pulled down all their images and altars where-ever he passed, and so returned to Jerusalem laden with fresh laurels and plunder.

ALL this while the fortress of Acra was in the hand of the enemy, and not only hindered many of the Jews from resorting to the temple, but annoyed those that did,

(H) Quick and wonderful indeed! if we consider that the peace could not be broken as soon as made, and that it was concluded on the fifteenth of Xanthicus, answering to the beginning of our April; and that the feast of pentecost fell either on the latter end of May, or beginning of June; so that in less than two months time they burnt the two havens and fleets of Joppa and Jamnia, beat the Arabian nomades, took the city of Caspis, defeated Timotheus and his numerous army, burnt and destroyed Carnion and Ephron, besides several other strong fortresses, released a vast number of their brethren, and were returned to Jerusalem laden with spoils, and a vast multitude of female captives, and all this without any loss on their side.

(I) This is certainly the meaning of the historian (whatever might be that of the Jewish chief in causing this sin-offering, or reconciliatory sacrifices and prayers to be made for those dead sinners); for he adds (41), that Judas gave thereby a signal proof of his belief of a resurrection; for, says he, if he had not hoped that those slain men would have risen again from the dead, it had been vain and superfluous to have caused prayers to be made for them.

Judas might, in all likelihood, have in his eye the defeat which the Israelites had formerly had upon such another occasion, in the case of Achan's sacrilege (42); but it may as well be likewise, that the notion of praying and offering of sacrifices for the dead might be then in use, if not of longer standing. However that be, it must have been so in the time in which the historian wrote it, unless we will suppose with some interpreters that the passage above quoted was a gloss of the translator (43).

We may further observe, that the Arundelian copy, and Syriac version, mention three thousand drachms, and the Latin one twelve thousand (44).

- a especially in Judas's absence. Upon his coming therefore from Odollam, he resolved to form the siege of it, and to that end gathered together his whole army, furnished himself with engines for throwing of large stones, and with other instruments for the siege. The place being very strong, and the garison numerous, and well furnished with arms and provision, made it likely to hold out a considerable time. But the renegado Jews, a great number of whom were then in the place, and knew the valour and stoutness of Judas and his troops; finding that they should be forced at length to surrender, and knowing how little mercy they had to hope for from the conqueror, advised the commanders to make a vigorous sally, in order to give an opportunity to some of their brethren to go to Antioch, and inform the young king of their distress. Their advice was taken, and the sally so well managed, that a number of those renegadoes, with some officers, found an opportunity to divide from the rest, and to take the way to the court unperceived. Upon their arrival they went and informed the king of all that Judas had done. They added, that he persecuted with the most merciless hatred all that dared shew any fidelity to the Syrians, that he plundered, sacked, and put to fire and sword all that came in his way; and lastly, that to shake wholly off the Syrian yoke, he had besieged the garison of Acra, which had been placed there to keep their metropolis in awe, and that it must undergo the fate of Bethzura, and other of his cities and fortresses, if not speedily relieved. This news failed not to alarm the Syrian monarch, who ordered immediately all his generals to assemble his troops, and if they were not thought sufficient, to hire a number of auxiliaries, and to march with utmost dispatch into Judaea. His orders were punctually obeyed, and a vast army was drawn together, consisting of a hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, thirty-two elephants, and three hundred armed chariots. These having the young king and his uncle Lysias at their head, marched to the borders of Idumea, where they laid siege to the fortress of Bethzura. We have already given an account of this war in a former volume †, and of the miraculous deliverance of the Jews, which ended in an advantageous peace to them, though dishonourable to Antiochus, who, contrary to the articles of it, caused the fortifications of their metropolis to be demolished.
- d Menelaus, the apostate high-priest, who had accompanied the king in this expedition, in hopes of being restored to his ill-gotten dignity, and perhaps of obtaining the government of Judaea, left no stone unturned to ingratiate himself to the young monarch, though at the expence of his nation and religion; but his wicked policy failed him, and Lysias, tired with so dear and dishonourable a war, and fearful, lest, if that wretch was left at Jerusalem, and invested with any power, he should stir up a new revolt, either to ingratiate himself to the Jews, or to maintain his own authority against a people who he foresaw would never brook it; thought it more adviseable to find out some expedient to rid himself of so dangerous a wretch. He easily compassed his end, and his great credit with the young monarch, to whom he accused him as the author and cause of all the late mischiefs, soon prevailed upon him to condemn him to such a death as his treason, if not to Antiochus, yet to his God and nation, had deserved. He was accordingly sent under a strong guard to Beræa, and there made to undergo the cruel punishment of the ashes ‡, a death we have already described in a former volume §.
- e Menelaus put to death.

THE Jews, though glad at the death of that monster, did not however gain much by the change. Lysias found means to persuade the young monarch, that there was a necessity of bestowing the high-priesthood on one that was not of the pontifical family; so that that dignity which of right belonged to Onias, the son of that worthy high-priest, who had been murdered at Antioch, was bestowed on Alcimus, or Jacimus, as he is called by Josephus, who was of another family, though of the Aaronic race, and a person no less wicked than his predecessor. As for Onias, when he found his right given to one who had neither title nor merit, he repented the wrong to such a degree, that he retired into Egypt, in hopes by some other way to recompense himself for his loss. Accordingly, upon his coming to that court, he found means to ingratiate himself so well to Ptolemy Philometor, and to his queen Cleopatra, that they granted him, some time after, the liberty of building a temple at Alexandria like unto that of Jerusalem, of which he secured the priesthood to himself and descendants, as shall be seen in the sequel ¶.

by Alcimus.

WE have elsewhere seen how Demetrius, the lawful heir of the Syrian crown, had found means to escape from Rome, where he had been long kept as an hostage; and being arrived at Antioch, had put to death both Antiochus Eupator, and Lysias, and had made himself master of that capital, and soon after of the whole kingdom *. In the mean time Alcimus, whom the Jews had refused to admit to the high-priesthood, because he had obtained and sullied that dignity by open apostasy, and conforming to the religion and customs of the Greeks, came to complain of it to the new monarch; he brought with him a number of other Jewish renegadoes, whom Judas had caused to be banished Judaea for the same crime. At the head of these miscreants he applied himself to the king, accused Judas, and the rest of the Maccabean or Asmonean race, of having destroyed those that stood firm to their allegiance to him; of banishing others for not joining with his revolted party, and of other such crimes as they thought would render them odious to the court. They added, that their present distress was owing to their readiness in obeying the edicts of the late king his uncle; and in the end, Alcimus forgot not to beg to have the high-priesthood confirmed to him by Demetrius. This accusation, carried on with such seeming zeal for the king, did so exasperate him against the Jews, that he sent back the apostate, and with him Bacchides, governor of Mesopotamia, at the head of a considerable army, and with orders both to reinstate Alcimus to his dignity, and to carry on the war against the Maccabees. These two were joined in the same commission, and Alcimus, impatient to see himself restored to his dignity, hastened the Syrian general, who was wholly devoted to him, to march forthwith into Judaea †.

UPON their arrival, the two colleagues, who knew what an enemy they had to deal with, endeavoured at first to decoy him by some treacherous stratagem; and to this end sent deputies to the Jewish chief to invite him to a conference, in order to end their dispute in an amicable way. They spared no promises nor vows, that he should come and go with utmost safety. Judas easily suspected their design, and rightly judged that such a powerful army was intended rather to surprise him, than to decide the title of an intruding priest, hated and rejected by the whole nation. Instead therefore of accepting of their invitation, he set himself about preparing for a vigorous defence. His behaviour however was disapproved by several doctors and scribes, and particularly by some of the Assideans, whose sect we have spoken of in a former section. These pretending to a greater degree of sanctity than the rest, insisted that an amicable way was preferable to an hostile one, and that Alcimus being of the race of Aaron, ought not to be lightly suspected of treachery against them. But finding Judas unmoveable, they took it into their heads to try how far their mediation would work towards the desired peace; and having obtained an oath of safety from the treacherous high-priest, they came to him accompanied with some of their doctors and scribes. Alcimus gave them at first a friendly reception, but as soon as he had got them into his power, he caused sixty of them to be seized, and put to death ‡. This action proved of singular service to Judas and his council, and sufficiently justified his refusal; and his whole army being now fully convinced that nothing but the blackest perfidy was to be expected from that base pontiff and his colleague, resolved to stand up for their general, their religion and liberty. Some few indeed, being terrified either at the news of Alcimus's perfidy, or at the sight of so great an army, left Jerusalem, and retired into the country; but there stayed with him a sufficient number to suppress the power of the treacherous pontiff, in spite of his daily reinforcements from the renegado Jews, who resorted to him, especially after Bacchides's departure. For that general, whether stung with the reproaches, which his late perfidious action brought upon him, or with shame for not having been able to subdue an enemy by treachery, whom he dared not attack openly, left Judaea, and returned to Antioch, leaving Alcimus what he thought a sufficient number of troops, to maintain himself in his new dignity. However, whilst he was in his way to the Syrian court, he could not forbear committing some cruelties against those Jews that came in his way. Particularly at Beseth, or Bethsetha, he caused a considerable number of them to be seized and killed, and their bodies to be flung into a well §.

Alcimus on the other hand spared neither pains nor cost, flatteries nor cruelties, to strengthen himself. Those that were of greatest service to him were the Jewish renegados and malecontents, whom his caresses and generosity drew daily to his side.

- a For with these, supported by the Syrian troops, he was making continual excursions into some part or other of the country, plundering, burning, and destroying all that refused to acknowledge him. Judas on his side was no less watchful of all opportunities to oppose and suppress him; he defeated him in several rencounters, and took such a severe vengeance on as many of the revolted Jews as fell into his hands, that the rest dared no longer act against him. Alcimus being by this time convinced of the impossibility of mastering his enemy, and of ever being admitted to approach the sacred altars, unless he procured a much greater army to force the Jews into a compliance, returned to the Syrian court, renewed his former accusations and complaints, which failed not to be backed by all the enemies of the Jews that were then at Antioch; and having presented Demetrius with a rich crown of gold, and other valuable presents, obtained of that incensed monarch a fresh army, the command of which was given to Nicanor, one of the bitterest enemies the Jewish nation had, with express orders to cut off Judas and his party, disperse his army, and to settle Alcimus in his power and dignity beyond the possibility of any future opposition². But Nicanor, who had lately been so feelingly convinced of the strength and bravery of the Jewish chief, and justly reckoned that one defeat more would complete his disgrace, entered Judæa, with a numerous army indeed, but with a full resolution, if possible, to bring Judas to accept of a peace rather than hazard any more battles with him.
- c HOWEVER, upon his first coming into that province, all the apostate Jews, and the heathen, whom Judas had driven out of Judæa, came in shoals to list under him, in hopes to be soon resettled in their former habitations, so that his army was increased exceedingly, before he reached the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. On the other hand, the Jews being informed of his approach, went to the temple to implore the divine assistance by fasting and prayers, and then prepared themselves for a vigorous defence. Nicanor advanced as far as the fortress of Dessau, where Simon, Judas's brother, having attempted to come out against him, was so terrified at the sight of his numerous army, that he was glad to retire to *Jerusalem*³. All this however could not induce the Syrian general to begin any hostilities against the valiant Judas; on the contrary, he sent three of his head officers, Posidonius, Theodosius, and Matthias, to make overtures of peace to him. Judas, who had so lately observed the propensity of his men to a peace, acquainted them with the proposals made to him by Nicanor; which were so well approved by them, that a day and a place for an interview was agreed on by those two generals to give it the finishing stroke. Judas however, justly suspecting the sincerity of the Syrians, caused a certain number of his stoutest men to be so advantageously posted, that they might come to his relief, in case any violence were offered to him. But his precaution at this time was needless, and Nicanor was so bent upon clapping up a peace with him, that their conference was carried on to the satisfaction of both parties; the articles were agreed on, after which Nicanor went and stayed some time in Jerusalem, without giving the Jews the least cause of complaint; so far from it, that to avoid giving them any umbrage, he disbanded the greatest part of his army, and lived in perfect friendship with the Jewish nation^b (K).

(K) In this year some chronologers (45) place the introduction of the cycle, or rather period of eighty-four years, in order to settle the return of their new moons and festivals depending on them. We have shewn in a former volume †, what a wretched method they had used before the captivity, for discovering those new appearances without the help of astronomical tables. The inconvenience they found in it after their dispersion, obliged them to fall upon some surer method, that the whole nation might, in every place, observe them and the other festivals on the same day.

This method was the period of eighty-four years, which in all probability was only the period of Callippus, which that learned astronomer had published about a hundred and seventy years before, and consisted of seventy-six Julian years, and to which they added the Ostoteris, either thinking it answered their purpose better, or, which is more likely, as dean Prideaux conjectures (46), to make it look like a discovery of their own. For the Jews, who were always very jealous of being suspected to borrow any things of the heathen nations, may be supposed to have been more so at this time, when they had just gone through so great and general a reformation in their church.

But whether Judas and his sanhedrin, harassed as they were on all sides by their enemies, could have leisure enough to find out and settle this new method, or whether they had not brought already something like it, either from Babylon, or from some of the Greeks; one thing is certain, and worth observing, that this period of eighty-four years was peculiar to the Jews, and has been used from thence downward to the time of the famous Hillel, who corrected their calendar in the year of Christ 360. It

THIS harmony was however interrupted soon after by the perfidious high-priest, ^a who thinking the peace not sufficiently advantageous to him, went a third time to Antioch to complain against Nicanor, as a betrayer of his master's interest, and a friend to his mortal enemies; in testimony of which, he urged the peace lately concluded between them. Demetrius, though justly surprised that his general should venture to take such a step, not only without his leave, but without informing him of it, would not however recall him: he contented himself with refusing to ratify the articles, and sending him fresh orders to renew the war against the Jewish chief, and not to sheath his sword, till he had killed him, and wholly suppressed his party. Upon receiving this unexpected order, Nicanor was extremely displeased; on the one hand, he was loath to violate the peace, which had been so strictly kept by the Jews; ^b on the other, he feared the resentment of the king, if he disobeyed such an express command. This last motive having at length determined him, his main study was now to find out some plausible pretence for laying hold on the Jewish chief. To this end he began to alter his behaviour towards him, and instead of their former intimacy to treat him with coldness, and an air of superiority. This soon gave Judas to understand, that it was high time to look to himself, which he accordingly did, with such speed and secrecy, that he was quite disappeared before they had the least suspicion of it. Nicanor, surprised to find him gone out of his reach, endeavoured, as well as he could, to conceal his resentment: he found himself now obliged to raise a new army, and to act against him as an open enemy, and yet was both afraid and unwilling to do it. At length having gathered a sufficient number of forces, and come towards Jerusalem, he resolved once more to try to surprise him by some foul stratagem, before he ventured upon an open rupture. To this end he sent some deputies to acquaint him that he was not come to make war against him, but to treat of peace with him, and to invite him to a new interview. Judas came accordingly to the place agreed on, where their first greeting was in all appearance very friendly and peaceable; but having discovered his treacherous intent, he withdrew, and from that time refused to meet him any more. Nicanor then ordered his troops to advance towards Capbarsalama, not far from Jerusalem, where being met by the Jewish army, ^c a battle was fought, in which he lost five thousand men. But the Jews finding ^d themselves unable to make head against the enemy's superior forces, retired, some to the city of David, and some into the temple ^e. Nicanor then led his army strait to Jerusalem, and getting upon the eminence of mount Sion, was addressed by some of the priests and heads of the people, who came in a submissive manner to him, and shewed him from that place the sacrifices which were then offered up in the temple for the prosperity of king Demetrius. But the exasperated general having cast many insolent and blasphemous reflections on what he called their base superstition, swore the utter destruction of them and their temple, unless Judas was immediately delivered up to him. But Judas had happily put it out of their power, having betimes withdrawn himself into the land of Samaria with some of his faithful troops. However, it was in vain for the priests to urge this or any thing else in their own defence, to a man who was now determined to make them feel the effects of his resentment, for having missed his blow. The poor priests seeing an exasperated enemy at the head of a powerful army at the very gates of the temple, and their valiant protector forced to abandon them to his mercy, had no other recourse but to their prayers and tears; whilst Nicanor, still bent rather upon stratagem than open war, bethought himself of a hellish expedient to oblige the Jews to apostatise both from their God, and their brave deliverer ^f.

THEY had at that time an aged member of their sanhedrin, named Razis, a man highly esteemed by the nation for his strict piety and virtue, and whose inviolable fidelity to his religion and nation, had gained him the title of father of the Jews. Nicanor having heard so good a character of him, and that his example had preserved numbers of his people from apostatising, conceived a design, either to force him to it by fair or foul means, or else to do a despite to the nation, by putting him to some cruel death. To this end he dispatched five hundred of his soldiers to take and bring him to him. These finding his castle strongly guarded, were endea-

- a vouring to break open the doors, or to force him out by setting it on fire, when the old man, after a long and stout defence, finding himself on the brink of being either taken, or burnt, rushed on the point of his sword, and pierced himself through. However, the wound not proving mortal, and he seeing the soldiers rushing into the house, ran to the top of one of the turrets, and flung himself headlong down. This fall not having put an end to his life, he raised himself up, ran through the midst of them to a neighbouring steep rock, leaving a rivulet of blood behind, which issued out of his wounds, and having gained the top of it, he opened his wound with his hands, tore out his bowels, and flung them at his agashed enemies^e. Thus Kills himself.
- b The Jews however have made no scruple to canonise him a martyr, though his death was rather that of a madman, or a desperado.

- WHILE this was doing at Jerusalem, Nicanor having heard that Judas was in the land of Samaria, marched against him with an army of thirty-five thousand men; and as he still trusted more to his political stratagems, than to his strength, he resolved to attack him on the sabbath, not doubting but they would, as they had formerly done, chuse to be all murdered, rather than fight on that day. He was however assured of the contrary by some of that nation, who were in his army, and who begged that he would pay a regard to that sacred day, which the God of heaven had consecrated to his service. Nicanor asked them, with a scornful taunt, Whether
- c there was indeed a mighty God in heaven, who had ordered the sanctification of the sabbath? And being answered in the affirmative, he replied, And I, who am powerful upon earth, do command you to fight for the king your master, and to obey his orders. This blasphemous arrogance, as well as his former threatenings against the temple, did not go long unpunished; for whilst he was incamped in the neighbourhood of Bethoron, Judas marched immediately against him with his three thousand men, and incamped near Adasa, a place about thirty furlongs distant from the enemy. The first thing he did was to encourage his little army with proper texts out of the sacred books, and to assure them further of the divine assistance, he acquainted them with a comfortable vision, which he had lately had, in which he
- d saw Onias, the late worthy high-priest, and after him the prophet Jeremiab, interceding for the Jewish people, and that the latter had presented him with a splendid sword, and given him at the same time an assurance of a complete victory. This speech had the desired effect, and his men were on a sudden fired with such courage, that they routed the enemy on the very first onset; for Nicanor being killed one of the first, his men were seized with a panic, threw their arms down, and sought in vain for a shelter; for Judas pursuing them, and the Jews of the neighbouring cities hearing of this victory, stopping their flight, killed them all to a man, inasmuch that there was not a single person left to carry the news to Antioch. This battle was won on the thirteenth day of the month Adar, answering to our February; and on
- e the next day, the body of Nicanor being found among the slain, Judas ordered his head, and right hand, which he had so lately lifted up with threatening oaths against the temple, to be cut off, and carried in triumph to Jerusalem; where being arrived with his army, he caused them to be expoted to the view of Jews and Gentiles, reminding them at the same time that those were the head and hand of the profane Nicanor, who had sworn the total destruction of their sacred temple. His tongue he likewise ordered to be cut out, and minced, and to be thrown to the birds, and his head and hand to be hung up on some of the highest towers of that city. After the usual rejoicings for their late success, a public anniversary was instituted by the sanhedrin, to be kept by future generations on the thirteenth day of Adar,
- f by the name of the day of Nicanor^f, which has been kept ever since.

THIS victory gave the Jewish nation some peaceful intermission, and their enemies being justly terrified at the continual successes of their leader, suffered him to return, and take quiet possession of the city, which his successors was however forced to quit soon after to the then superior power of the Syrian general and apostate Alcimus, who held it but a short while, and for the last time, as the sequel will presently shew. During this peaceful interval, Judas, always intent on the interest of his religion and nation, observing how powerful the Romans were now grown, and how faithfully they protected and assisted their friends, resolved to procure an alliance with them, which might prove a bulwark against the oppressive power of the Syrians. Eupolemus the son of John, and Jason the son of Eleazar, who had been already sent with success to Seleucus Philopator, were likewise chosen for this embassy. Their proposals were readily accepted by the Roman senate, and a decree was accordingly made, and engraven on copper, in order to be sent to Jerusalem; importing that the Jews were thenceforth acknowledged as friends and allies of the Romans; that both nations should be ready to succour each other, and the allies of either with all their power, and in no case should assist their enemies; and for as much as Demetrius Soter had been complained against to the senate, as an oppressor of the Jewish nation, they sent a letter to him, injoining him for the future to forbear all hostilities against them, and threatening him with an invasion of his country by sea and land, in case he did not comply with the purport of their decree ^a. This alliance was made in a lucky time; for whilst it was transacting at Rome, Demetrius, having received the news of Nicanor's defeat and death, was sending the right wing, that is to say, the flower (L) of his army, into Judaea, with Bacchides and Alcimus at their head. It consisted of twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse, and with these Bacchides entered Galilee, and took the city of Mafeloth or Massadoth in the territories of Arbela, where he killed a great number of Jews. From thence they marched towards Jerusalem, but being told that Judas was retired into the neighbourhood of Eleasa, they went to attack him there. Judas had then but three thousand men, and when these beheld the superiority of the enemy's army, their hearts failed them so far, that only eight hundred of them stayed with him, and the rest conveyed themselves away, to the great regret of their valiant chief, who was now so sorely pressed, that he had no time to get a new reinforcement, but must either fight or be cut in pieces. However, trusting in that superior assistance which had accompanied him hitherto, he encouraged his men the best he could; a dreadful fight ensued, which lasted from morning till evening; and Judas observing that the enemy's right wing, commanded by Bacchides, was the strongest, made a stout push at it, broke and pursued it as far as mount Azotus; ^b

(L) It was usual in those days for the kings to command the right wing of their army, so that the best of their troops were generally placed there.

With relation to the alliance above-mentioned, Josephus observes (47), that it was the very first that ever the Jews made with Rome, which is very probable also from the manner in which the author of the first book of Maccabees prefaces his account of it (48); for it appears from it that the Jews till then knew but little of the Roman state.

And here it will not be amiss to inquire how far the account which Josephus gives of this alliance (49) is liable to the reproof which our learned Usher gives it (50); that historian tells us, that the decree of the senate was written by Eupolemus and Jason, when Judas was high-priest, and his brother Simon general of the Jews. That Judas died before Alcimus, and so could not be chosen by the people to succeed him in that dignity, as he there affirms a little before, is plain, not only from the first book of Maccabees, but even from Josephus himself, who tells us in another place, that Alcimus had no successor till seven years after his death (1), but that the superscription abovementioned was therefore forged by him, doth not so clearly follow. It is probable on the contrary, that his finding it in those very terms, in the Roman records, which he was then consulting, might lead him for the present into that mistake, that Judas had been chosen to the high-priesthood after Alcimus's death.

If it be asked how it came to be so worded, we answer, that the Jewish nation being known to have had a high-priest at the head of all their affairs both religious and civil, such an alliance could not be well contracted without one. On the other hand, Alci- mus having been constantly rejected by reason of his apostasy, it is not likely that they would make use so much as of his name in so public a transaction. What other expedient could then be found, but that Judas, who was then at the head of all affairs, should take that title upon him, at least in the transacting of this alliance?

We might add, that it is not easy to guess how the nation could be so long without a high-priest; for setting aside those religious functions which were peculiar to that dignity, and which might, for ought we know, have been suspended during this interval; it is plain, the sanhedrin, or grand Jewish senate, could neither assemble nor make any authentic decrees without him; so that we must suppose, either that every thing went irregular, or that they chose some person to that dignity; in which case, why might not the choice of the nation, or at least of the heads of it, be deemed as valid at least, as that of a heathenish king, or rather, tyrant and usurper? for such the Jews deemed even the best foreign princes that ruled over them.

How the generalship came to be given in this inscription, rather to Simon the third brother, than either to Judas, or to Jonathan the next in birth, can only be guessed at. Judas treating then with the Romans as high-priest, might think the quality of general incompatible with it, and Simon might for some signal exploit or other have been at that time more famed than his brother.

One thing may be added, that this supposed inscription might imply no more in the Jewish historian, than that Eupolemus and Jason wrote, or sent the written decree to Judas the high-priest, and to Simon the general.

a but in the mean time, the left having quite surrounded him and his men, he was at length over-born by their numbers, and slain, after a long and vigorous defence ; so that he fell down on a heap of his enemies, which he had killed round about him. As soon as the news of his death had reached Jerusalem, the whole city was filled with the most lively sorrow. An universal mourning was made for him for some time, and in imitation of that which David made for Saul and Jonathan, they sung these lines of his, How is the mighty fallen ? How is the preserver of Israel slain ? However, his body did not fall into the hands of the enemy ; for whether the Syrians, after this victory, which redounded less to their honour than a defeat, left the field of battle, or whether a truce was made for the burying of the dead, the author tells us that it was taken and carried off by his two brothers, Jonathan and Simon, and buried in the sepulchre of his father at Modin ^b. Thus died the brave Jewish general, six years after his father Matthias, and was succeeded by his brother Jonathan. The Maccabite historian adds, that the rest of his victorious wars were omitted, because they were too numerous ; and Josephus, that he never departed from the precepts of his father, who enjoined him never to shun any labours or hazards for the service of his country, and that he died on the third year of his executing the office of high-priest ^c, which confirms what was observed in the last note ; so that for ought appears his only mistake was in making him die so long after Alcimus.

c THE news of his death was no sooner spread through Judea, than it gave a new life to all the enemies of the Jews, so that the greatest part of these found themselves obliged, partly for want of a chief of known valour and conduct, and partly through a grievous famine, which then raged in the land, to acknowledge Bacchides their governor, and to submit themselves to him. Whilst therefore this general was taking all proper measures to secure his own government, some of the chief officers that served under him, were ordered to make a diligent search after the principal friends and adherents of the Maccabees, and to put them to the most torturing deaths ; insomuch that this persecution did seem to exceed all that they had suffered since their return from Babylon, and caused as general a defection. Under these dismal circumstances, those few who retained still a love for their religion and country, had recourse to Jonathan, surnamed Apphus, and desired him to take upon him the command of the Jewish forces, and to endeavour to stop the cruel progress of the Syrian general. Jonathan was easily prevailed upon, and was gathering what forces he could get. But Bacchides being informed of it, and coming against him with a design to surprise and put him to death, forced him and his few followers to retire into the desarts of Tekoa, where they encamped near the lake Asphar, being fenced by a large morass on the one side, by woods on the other, and the Jordan before him ^d. This situation, which he thought very advantageous to his handful of men, because there was but one narrow way to come at them, proved the very reverse, when they came to engage the enemy, as we shall soon see.

c IN the mean time, as soon as he heard that Bacchides was in full march against him, his first care was to secure their goods and equipage, which were very numerous, till better times. The Nabatheans, as we observed before, were then at peace with them. John therefore, the brother of Jonathan, was sent at the head of a convoy to go and deposit it with them. But in his way he was surprised by the Jambrians (M), who issuing out of their city, fell upon him, slew him and his men, and carried away all their baggage. This injury did not go long unrequited. Jonathan being informed soon after that a great wedding was to be celebrated at Medaba, between one of the Jambrian chiefs, and a daughter of a Canaanitish, or perhaps rather a prince of the Arabians, now settled there, and having got notice of the day on which the bride was to be conducted to her new home, he and his men laid in ambush behind a hill ; and as soon as the company, which was very numerous, and of both sexes, was come nigh enough, they fell upon them, killed them to the number of four hundred, and carried away the plunder to their camp.

comes against the Jews.

As soon as Bacchides heard of this retaliation upon the Jambrians, he hastened his army, with a resolution to attack the Jewish general on the sabbath, at which Jonathan found himself in no small distress. On the one hand, he was hemmed in on all sides, and on the other his men were with difficulty prevailed upon to stand in their own defence, partly at the sight of their superior enemy, and partly out of respect to the day; whether they had forgot the resolution and example of their late chiefs to the contrary, or whether they scrupled the validity of it. At length, Jonathan finding himself pressed by the enemy on the one side, and on the other by the reluctance of his men to engage them, he addressed himself to the latter in the following short, but pathetic speech; "Come on, and let us fight for our lives; for it is not now with us, as it was in time past; for you see plainly, that the battle is both before and behind us, and the Jordan on this, and the morass and the wood on that side. Neither is there a place left for us to turn aside to. Wherefore cry ye now unto heaven, that ye may be delivered out of the hand of your enemies". As soon as he had done speaking, his men, what through his encouragement, and what through despair, made a bold push at the enemy, and killed a good number of them on the first onset. Bacchides all the while seemed to aim solely at Jonathan, which being perceived by him, he attempted to make a full and effectual blow at him, but was prevented by his address. The Jews finding themselves at last unable to cope with such an army, cast themselves one and all into the river (MM), and swam to the other side, after having killed about a thousand, or according to Josephus, two thousand of the enemy¹.

Bacchides, now convinced that they would fight on the sabbath, as well as on other days, did not think fit to pursue them farther, but returned with his army to Jerusalem, and there gave orders for the fortifying and garisoning such places as were most likely to keep the Jews in awe, and to oblige the Maccabite party, either to submit, or at least to forbear all future attempts against him. Among these were Bethoron, Jericho, Emmaus, Bethel, Thimnath, Bethzura, and some others, especially the fortress of Acra, into which, besides a new supply of men, arms, and provisions, he sent the children of some of the principal Jews to be kept as hostages there, to prevent their parents and relations going over to Jonathan and his party. At the same time the apostate Alcimus, finding himself master of Jerusalem, gave orders for demolishing the wall of the temple, which inclosed the court of the priests from that of the people (N), and which had been formerly built by the direction of the prophets Haggai and Zachary. But he had scarce began the work, before he was struck with a dead palsy, which took his speech from him, so that he died without being able to speak a word, or to take any care of his house. After his death Bacchides, having by that time brought all Judea into subjection, thought he had no further business there, but returned to Antioch, and left the Jews and heathens to live in peace there, which they did for about two years^m (O).

(MM) Whoever compares the situation of these places with the abstruse and imperfect account which the author of it gives of this action, must confess, with the judicious *Calmer, that Jonathan must have crossed the Jordan twice, instead of once, else he could never have had that river before, and Bacchides behind. For when he retired to Teckoa, the river must then have parted them, and he must have crossed it again to come to Medeba to punish the Jambrians; for Medeba was on the east side, and Teckoa, where they had incamped at first, was on the west side of that river.

Had he then crossed it again, after this bloody expedition, which would have been the third time, he could not have had it before, and Bacchides behind him, unless we supposed that he also crossed it either higher or lower, and so fetched a long compass about to inclose him; in which case there would be three crossings omitted, viz. two of Jonathan's, and this of Bacchides. But it is more probable, considering what haste the latter was in to fall upon him, that he overtook him as they returned from Medeba, and before he could cross again to return to Teckoa; and this may be the reason, when they found themselves overpowered, of their flinging themselves into that river, and swimming across it, in order to recover their camp, which might be so well situate and fortified, that it discouraged the Syrians from pursuing them further.

(N) Or more probably that which divided the court of the circumcised from that of the uncircumcised. For as his apostasy had made him incur the hatred of all the sincere Jews, it is not unlikely that he caused this partition wall to be pulled down to mortify them, and to ingratiate himself with the heathen and the renegados of his nation. However, the book of Maccabees calls it the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary (3); and Josephus (4), the wall of the old sanctuary, and adds to it the works of the prophets.

(O) It may be also likely enough, that he was privately recalled by Demetrius; for that prince at this time stood in great need of the friendship of the Romans (5), and had probably received their letter,

■ Jonathan and his party made the best of this short interval to secure themselves, so that they lived quietly, and without any mistrust. This gave his enemies an opportunity to make a fresh attempt upon him, by inviting Bacchides to surprise and destroy the whole party, which they sent him word might be done in one night. Demetrius, who had been by this time acknowledged king of Syria by the Romans, and had made a new alliance with them, having now nothing to fear from that side, was easily persuaded to send Bacchides with a powerful army into Judæa. As soon therefore as this general was got there, he sent letters to those of his party, with orders to seize Jonathan and his men, and to bring them to him, as had been agreed before. This plot however had not been carried on with such secrecy, but that vigilant chief had notice of it time enough, both to disappoint it, and to punish those traitors that had hatched it; for he came suddenly upon them, took fifty of the chief conspirators, and put them all to death; after which the rest were soon dispersed, and the whole design discomfited.

AFTER this signal escape, Jonathan being informed of Bacchides's coming against him, and finding himself by far too weak to withstand so great a force, retired to Bethbasi, or, as Josephus calls it, Bethlagan, a place strongly situate in the desert of Jericho, which he and his brother Simon fortified, and filled with all necessary provisions for a siege. Bacchides came according to his expectation, and laid close siege to the place with his numerous army, which he had increased with all his adherents in Judæa, whom he summoned to repair to him thither. As the siege was like to last long, Jonathan, after a vigorous defence, left the place under the care of his brother, and with a small brigade went out to reinforce his army; and crossing the country, defeated Odonarches, and his brethren, and the sons of Phasiron in their tents. These we suppose were part of the besieging host. From thence he went on, attacked and annoyed other parts of their camp, and forced Bacchides to come to their assistance; which being perceived by Simon from within, he made a vigorous sally, burnt their engines, then falling upon his army, discomfited it on one side, whilst his brother did the same on the other. Bacchides, vexed at the heart to meet with such a defeat, where he expected an easy victory, vented his rage on those who had invited him out of Syria, and put many of them to death, resolved to raise the siege, and to return to Antioch. The only difficulty was how to do it, if not with honour, at least with as little disgrace as might be; which as soon as Jonathan understood, he sent him some messengers with proposals for a peace; which were gladly accepted, and soon after ratified by both parties. By these articles all prisoners were to be released on both sides, which was accordingly done; and Bacchides having sworn never more to act hostilely against Jonathan, departed into Syria, and punctually kept his oath to him as long as he lived. It seems likewise that by these articles Jonathan was left, if not governor, at least deputy governor of Judæa; for as soon as Bacchides was gone, he went and settled in Michmasb (P), where he judged Israel, pretty near like the ancient Judges. He began with making a severe example of all the apostate Jews, who were the cause of all the wars and persecutions that fell upon their nation, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, downwards to that time. After this he set about reforming the Jewish church and state. So that from this time Judæa began to enjoy a perfect peace, and free exercise of their religion, the happy effects of their general's valour and piety.

Soon after this, the troubles that happened in Syria, and of which we have already spoken in the last volume †, gave the Jews a fair opportunity of wholly recovering their liberty, and not only of raising themselves into a state of independency, either from that kingdom, or that of Egypt; but of being highly courted by both. But above all, Demetrius, who so feelingly knew their strength and bravery, had most letter, which ordered him to cease all hostilities against the Jewish nation; so that he was forced to recall him, yet so privately, that the Jews should not be too elated by it; and this may be the reason why neither Josephus nor the book of Maccabees mention it.

cause to use all possible means to prevent their declaring for his competitor Alexander Balas. To effect which, he wrote a letter to Jonathan full of expressions of the sincerest friendship and confidence, and in which he gave him full power to levy what forces he should think fit, and to cause new arms to be fabricated, and declared him his new friend and ally. In the end, he added an order for setting at liberty all the hostages which had been sent by Bacchides into the fortress of Acra, and had been detained there ever since, notwithstanding the late peace concluded with him. As soon as Jonathan had received the letter, he brought it to Jerusalem, caused it to be read before that garison, and demanded the hostages to be delivered unto him according to the tenor of it. The people seeing how great a power he was now invested with, dared not hesitate about the matter, but immediately complied with his demand; after which Jonathan found his army increase exceedingly, there being now no check nor danger in joining him. On the other hand, those garisons which Bacchides had left in several strong places of Judaea above-mentioned, not finding themselves strong enough to withstand him, forsook them and fled. Those only of Belbuzra and Acra, which were mostly filled with apostate Jews, not daring to follow their example, lest they should be pursued, and meet with their just deserts; resolved to stand it out to the last, and either surrender upon safe terms, or to die sword in hand. Jonathan however did not think fit to besiege them immediately, but went to Jerusalem, where his presence was more required, and there caused the repairs both of the city and temple to be forthwith set about, fixing his abode in that city to see the work more effectually finished ^a.

WHEN Alexander understood what a powerful friend Jonathan was like to prove to the side he should declare himself for, and of the favours which Demetrius had lately bribed him with, he resolved to outbid him, and to draw him to his interest. He sent him a most obliging letter (Q), in which he bestowed the high-priesthood on him, and accompanied it with rich presents, and among them a purple robe, and a golden crown ^b. Jonathan readily accepted of them, put on the priestly vestments, on the feasts of tabernacles ^c, in the ninth year of his government (R), and in the seventh month of that year. However, as he would not seem wholly to receive that dignity from a prince, whose right to the Syrian crown was so justly suspected, he got himself chosen to it by the suffrages of the Jewish nation; and indeed not without a specious right to it; for being, as we hinted in the last note, of the family of Joarib, and consequently of the first class of the Aaronic race, that was sufficient to intitle him to it upon the failure of that of Jozadac, which had enjoyed it ever since their return from Babylon; and we don't read of any survivor of it except Onias, who was then in Egypt, and had there, if not apostatized, at least made a considerable schism, by setting up a new temple, altar, and priesthood there. As soon therefore as Jonathan ^d

(Q) The purport of it was to this effect: "King Alexander to his brother Jonathan, &c. Being informed of your power and valour, and that you are worthy of our friendship, we constitute you high-priest of your nation, and it is our pleasure that you be enrolled in the number of the king's friends. To this end we have sent you a purple robe, and a golden crown, not doubting a suitable return from you for our affection and friendship (8).

We have often observed in the course of this history, that the purple was a mark of the greatest dignity next to the royal one; it was esteemed such among the Jews, Persians, Macedonians, &c. and those that wore it were called king's friends, and implied the same as the king's cousins here with us.

(R) Josephus (9) says in the fourth year after the decease of his brother Judas; but we have already shewn in a late note his mistake in making this last outlive and succeed Alcimus, the contrary of which appears from the book of the Maccabees (10), which expressly mentions the installation of Jonathan to have been on the hundred and sixtieth year of the Grecian kingdom, which answers to the three thousand eight hundred and fifty-second year of the world, and one hundred and fifty-three before Christ (11).

We have likewise shewed at the close of the last section †, that Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, was descended from the priestly family of Joarib, though not from that of Jaddan or Jaddus, the high-priest, whose lineal heir and successor was the Onias whom we lately mentioned to have retired into Alexandria, and there built a temple for the use of the Egyptian Jews.

Jonathan, if not his brother Judas, was therefore the first of the family who enjoyed the pontifical dignity, which continued in it through a number of successors till Herod's time, who from hereditary, made it venal and arbitrary, as we shall shew in the sequel.

- a was invested with his new dignity, his first care was to raise new forces, and to cause a great number of arms to be made, resolved to side with Alexander. When Demetrius found that his competitor was likely to deprive him of so important an ally, he spared neither favour nor promises to prevent it: he sent him a long letter, couched in the most obliging terms, and wherein he artfully disguised his resentment for his defection under the greatest professions of confidence in his friendship and loyalty. In acknowledgment of which, and to bind him still faster to his interest, he promised him a general relaxation of all arrears, an exemption from future tribute, imposts or taxes, a free exercise of their religion, with many other concessions and privileges, vastly exceeding those which Alexander had made to him, and too great indeed to be really designed by that monarch. At least the memory of the many mischiefs and persecutions which they had so lately suffered under him, made them suspect the sincerity of them; and indeed such was the character of that prince, and the present situation of his affairs, that they might well extort such exorbitant promises from him, without any real intention to perform them. However, whether through resentment or diffidence, Jonathan chose rather to enter into an alliance with his competitor, and disclaimed all future friendship with a man who had given them so many feeling proofs of his hatred to their nation. So that from this time they stuck close to Alexander's interest, and it was lucky for them that they did so, since Demetrius was soon after defeated and killed by him, as we have seen in a former volume *.
- b THE new monarch however having by that decisive battle made himself master of the Syrian crown, forgot not to express his gratitude to the Jewish chief; he invited him soon after to his nuptials, to which Jonathan went with a numerous retinue, and was received with great marks of friendship and esteem. During his stay at Ptolemais, where they were celebrated, some disaffected Jews came to exhibit some accusations against him; but the king, resolved not to hear any thing against his friend, caused a proclamation to be made through the city, expressly forbidding any such complaint to be brought before him. To mortify his enemies the more, he caused him to sit by him clothed in purple, confirmed all his former grants to him, and made him generalissimo of Judæa, and gave him some other titles and government in his kingdom (S); all which did cast such a damp upon his accusers, that they sneaked away for fear of further mischief. Jonathan on the other hand having made some considerable presents to the king and queen, and to their court, returned into Judæa, highly satisfied with his reception, and much more with his choice of such an ally. From this time the Jewish nation became more and more considerable, not only in Judæa, where they enjoyed every branch of liberty, whether religious or civil; but in other countries also, and particularly in Egypt; where Ptolemy Philometor, and his sister and wife Cleopatra, raised many of them to considerable posts both at court and in the army, intrusted them with the keeping of their principal fortresses, and had given the command of their army to Onias and Dositheus. These two, if we may believe Josephus w, seem to have wholly ingrossed the king's favour during his whole reign. But Onias could not be satisfied with it, whilst he saw himself deprived of the dignity of the Jewish high-priesthood, and of the pleasure of performing the functions of that supreme dignity, which his birth intitled him to. Since therefore there were no hopes that Jonathan would ever yield to him that of Jerusalem, he had no other way to make himself amends for it, but by setting up a new one in Egypt; and his great credit with the king and queen did easily procure him the liberty of doing it. But as this transaction did no further concern the Jews of Judæa, to which we confine ourselves, than as it made a great schism with them, we shall relate it in the margin (T).

Defeats him.

Alexander's gratitude to

By this time Alexander having, partly by his negligence and debaucheries, and partly by the tyranny and cruelties of his favourite Ammonius, as it were, invited young Demetrius out of his retirement in Cnidus, to come and recover the crown from him †, Apollonius, then governor of Cælo-Syria and Palestine, revolted to him, whilst Jonathan, remembering his late alliance and obligations, stuck close to Alexander's interest. Apollonius therefore having got a considerable army together, marched against him as far as Jamnia; but not daring to advance farther into the mountainous parts of Judæa for fear of losing the benefit of his cavalry, he sent him a daring message to come and fight him in the plain country. Jonathan readily accepted the challenge, and marched from Jerusalem to Joppa at the head of ten thousand men, and in his way was met by his brother Simon with a reinforcement. The town being garisoned by the troops of Apollonius, shut their gates against the Jewish general, and obliged him to take it by siege, which he quickly did, and almost in full sight of the enemy's army. As soon as Apollonius perceived it, he came against him with eight thousand foot, and three thousand horse, leaving a thousand more of these behind to surprise the Jews on the rear, whilst he attacked them in front, and so made a feint, as if he was marching with the former southward towards Azotus. Jonathan came out as he expected, and he facing about, fell upon him, not doubting but his stratagem would gain him a complete victory. But he soon found his project discomfited by the experienced Jewish general; for having drawn up his army in the figure of an oblong square, not unlike the Macedonian phalanx, his brave troops bore the brunt of the battle on both sides with unusual firmness till the evening, when Jonathan observing the enemy's horse to be quite spent, rushed on the sudden upon the foot which was now destitute of their cavalry, and totally routed them. The greatest part of them fled to Azotus, and sheltered themselves in the temple of Dagon, whither the Jewish army pursued them; and having made themselves masters of the town, set it on fire temple and all. The number of the slain, whether by the sword, or the flames, amounted to eight thousand. From Azotus Jonathan went and plundered some other neighbouring towns; only that of Ascalon, which met him with presents, and compliments of submission, was spared, after which they returned to Jerusalem laden with rich plunder. Alexander soon after hearing of Jonathan's faithfulness and victory, sent him a present of a rich buckle or clasp, such as those only of the royal family used to wear, and which fastened their purple mantle to the shoulder: he gave him moreover the city and territory of Ecron, and some other marks of his esteem *.

ON Philometor's coming with his army into Palestine, on pretence to succour his son-in-law, but in reality to dispossess him of his kingdom, whether to seize it for himself, as the author of the Maccabees pretends †, or which is more likely from the sequel, in favour of young Demetrius; some of the enemies of the Maccabees tried stone wall, and had the altar of incense and burnt-offerings, &c. like that in Judæa; only, instead of the seven-branched candlestick, Onias contented himself with a stately golden lamp, which hung from the roof by a chain of the same metal.

The place he pitched upon was the ruins of an ancient Egyptian temple, within the name of Heliopolis; which being therefore polluted, gave no small scandal to the Jews there, who were moreover very strenuous against the setting up any temple against that of Jerusalem, as being expressly contrary to the Mosaic law. To remove these two scruples, Onias trumped up a prophecy out of Isaiah (2), importing that an altar should be set up unto the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and alluding to the times of the gospel, which he applied to this new edifice he was about to build; and whereas one of the Egyptian cities there mentioned is called עיר החרס, hair hacheres in the text, which signifies the city of the sun, though the keri or margin reads it עיר הרס, hair heres, the city of destruction (3); Onias took it in the former sense, and so is supposed to have made choice of the territory of Heliopolis, as if it had been alluded to by the prophet (4). Though the last quoted author adds another reason, viz. his being governor of that district, and having built a city in it, which he had peopled with Jews, and called by his name Onion.

When he had once removed these two difficulties, he did not want for priests and levites to officiate under him, so that the divine service was afterwards performed in this new temple in the same manner as it was at Jerusalem, till both were destroyed by the same Roman emperor (5).

However, those priests who had once officiated in the Egyptian, were never suffered to do so in the Jewish, but were, if we may believe the talmudists (6), looked upon as guilty of the same schism with those who had sacrificed on the high places, and as such were only admitted to the very lowest services. They received their elemosynary stipends out of the revenue of the temple, but were excluded from eating any of its holy things.

a to render them odious to him, by shewing him the devastations they had lately made, particularly the ruins of Azotus, and of the temple of Dagon, and the carcases of those they had slain, and which were still stinking above-ground. But that prince, whatever his reasons were, could not be induced to shew any resentment against them for it. On the contrary, he laid all the blame of it upon Apollonius; and when Jonathan came to pay him a visit at Joppa with a numerous retinue, he met with a kind reception from him, accompanied him to the river Eleutherus, and returned to Jerusalem ¹.

THE reader may remember how this prince having given the kingdom of Syria and his daughter Cleopatra from Alexander to young Demetrius, surnamed Nicanor, died
b of the wounds he received in the last battle, before he could well settle him on his throne. Jonathan therefore took this opportunity, Egypt being then imbroiled in a civil war about the succession, and neither able nor inclined to assist the new Syrian king, to begin the siege of Acra, which was still garisoned by Syrian troops, and was a great check to, and always ready to annoy the Jews, going to and from Jerusalem. He wanted neither forces nor engines to form it in the best manner; but in the height of the siege, complaint having been made of it to the young king, he was forced to leave it to appear before him at Ptolemais. However, he gave orders that it should be carried on with the same vigour, as if no such summons had been sent to him; and taking with him some of the most considerable priests and elders
c of his nation, came to the court, where he pleaded his cause so well before that prince, and backed it with such rich presents, that he was received into his favour and friendship, and quite discomfited his accusers, who were sent away with disgrace. After this, Nicanor confirmed him in his pontifical dignity, inrolled him in the highest place among his friends, and for the annual tribute of three hundred talents, released, not only Judea, but also the three toparchies of Lydda, Apharema, and Ramatha (U), from all future taxes whatsoever ².

Jonathan upon his return to Jerusalem doubled his strength and vigour against the fortress; but finding that it was like to hold out long, and to cost him dear, he bethought himself of procuring an order from the king for the evacuation both of d that and some other places, from which he complained to him the garisons were still annoying the Jews. He chose a lucky juncture for sending this request: for Demetrius having a little before disbanded his troops, had given occasion to that revolt which Tryphon raised at Antioch, and spoken of in a former volume ³. He was therefore glad to grant it to him upon condition he should assist him with some of his forces to quell the rebels; and we have seen there, how effectually the three thousand men, which he sent him, did it, and at the same time retaliated to the Antiochians the many cruelties which those of their own nation had formerly suffered from the Syrians both in Judea, and out of it ⁴. Demetrius however, instead of performing his promise to Jonathan, broke even those which he had made to him at Ptolemais, and began to e insist on his paying all the taxes and customs which he had remitted to him at that interview. But it was not long before a new insurrection, in which he was driven out of his kingdom by Antiochus, the son of Alexander, made him repent of his perfidy to the Jews, and of his tyranny to his own subjects.

THE new king did not forget to secure the Jewish general to his interest; he confirmed to him all the former grants, and added some others to them; and among them he made his brother Simon general of all his forces, and governor of all the sea-coasts, from the ladder of Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt, upon condition that those two brothers should declare for him. Jonathan was easily prevailed upon to forsake his old treacherous ally, and to accept of the offers of the new one: he sent him

(U) These three with their territories had been dismembered from Samaria some time before, and joined to Judea; and the late Demetrius in his courting letter to Jonathan, confirmed to him the possession and immunities of them (13); and now the present king renews the same grant, and allots the revenues of it towards the maintenance of the service of the temple, and of the priests in duty (14).

The reader may see the letter which he sent to Leptines in favour of the Jews in the place last quoted. He there styles that Ceræus general his father, because he had assisted him in the recovery, and preserving his crown; and commands him to send a copy of his letter to the Jewish general, to be set up on some eminent place of the temple, to be perused by all comers.

immediately an embassy to thank him for his favours, and to assure him of his best services. In pursuance of which, having obtained a commission for raising a good army, the two Jewish generals put themselves at the head of it, crossed the Jordan, and defeated Demetrius's troops that were sent to make a diversion in Galilee. In this expedition, Jonathan was in imminent danger of being cut in pieces by the enemy: he had incamped his army near the lake of Genezareth, and was advancing early one morning towards Azor. In his march he fell unexpectedly into an ambush, which had been placed among the defiles of the mountains to surprise him. As soon as he perceived his danger, he disposed his men the best he could for a brave defence; but the greatest part of them being seized with a panic, forsook him, and fled; so that he was left with only fifty resolute fellows, and two of his commanding officers, Mattathias and Judas. With these he faced about, and fought so desperately, that the enemy began to give way; which being perceived at a distance by his runaways, they rallied again to him; and renewed the fight with such vigour, that they gained a complete victory; and pursued the Demetrians to their very camp at Cadesb. They killed of them about three thousand men; after this Jonathan sent his brother to go and besiege Belbuzura, which had till then been garisoned by heathens, and renegado Jews, whilst himself went and secured some of the principal cities of that province; particularly that of Ascalon, which opened its gates to him; that of Gaza, which he forced to surrender, and in a word, all the towns from thence to Damascus. Simon on his side having made himself master of Belbuzura, freed that neighbourhood from the continual insults of that garison, and returned to Jerusalem, whither his brother came also presently after.

THESE successes of the two brothers abroad, had cast such a damp on their enemies at home, that they found all things in quietness at their return. However, Jonathan did not think fit to trust to the gratitude of the new king, to whom he had done such signal services; but set about means of preserving the peace and liberty of his nation, on the foot he had so happily established it. To this end he sent a new embassy to Rome to renew his alliance with the senate, which was done with great readiness on their part. In their return, his ambassadors were ordered to do the same with the Lacedæmonians, and other Grecian states, with whom they were in friendship, which they did with the same ease and success. In their letter to the Lacedæmonians, the substance of which the reader will find in the margin (W), they reminded them of their letter formerly sent to their high-priest (Onias III.) by Arius their king †, and inclosed a copy of it with their own. But whilst these alliances were transacting, news were brought to him, that the Demetrian generals, whom he had lately defeated, were advancing towards him with a more numerous army. To prevent therefore their entering into Judæa, he marched out with utmost expedition at the head of his forces, resolved, if possible, to attack them in their own territories. He made such good speed, that he reached Amathis, a place on the frontiers of Syria, and incamped over-against them. Their design it seems was to surprise his camp on the following night, but Jonathan having timely notice of it, kept his men under arms all that night, ready to receive them; which being perceived by the enemy, they retired immediately into their camp; where having lighted a good number of fires, to conceal

(W) Jonathan, high-priest, with the elders and priests of the Jewish nation, unto the ephori, senate, and people of Lacedæmon, their brethren, greeting:

"Whereas we have found, among our records, a letter long since written by Arius, one of your kings, to Onias, formerly high-priest of the Jews, wherein he expressed your friendship and affinity to our nation, which affinity we acknowledged with greater honour, because we find it confirmed by our sacred books: We have sent these our deputies unto you to renew the said alliance and brotherly union with you, lest we should be thought unmindful of it, by reason of the long interval which has elapsed since the receipt of it. Be it therefore known unto you, that we have had you always in our minds both in our solemn

As for us, though we thought ourselves honoured by your friendship and alliance, yet have hitherto forborn to be chargeable or troublesome to you, during all the grievous wars and persecutions which we have been exposed to from our tyrannous neighbours; but now, since heaven has blest us with better times, we have thought fit to send to you Numenius and Antipater, our late deputies to the Roman senate, with fresh offers of our best services to you, not doubting but they will be as heartily accepted of by you, as they are tendered by us (15)".

a their flight, they forsook it, and marched off unperceived. When the rising morning gave the Jews notice of their flight, Jonathan strove in vain to pursue them; they were already got far enough beyond the Eleutherus before he could reach that river. To make himself therefore some amends for his disappointment, he fell upon some Demetrian Arabs, whom he defeated, and carried off a considerable plunder, and from thence passing through Damascus, making still some excursions all the way, he arrived at Jerusalem ^a.

WHILST these things were doing, Simon, who had been left to take care of Judæa and Galilee, kept a watchful eye over those places he had lately secured to Antiochus in the last of those provinces. He went and took a review of the garisons of Ascalon, b and other fortresses in that neighbourhood; and being told that the citizens of Joppa were inclined to receive a Demetrian governor, and some Syrian forces, he went and took it, and put a strong garison of his own in it, and returned to join his brother at Jerusalem. Here they called a council, wherein it was resolved, that all the forts and sconces of Judæa should be forthwith repaired; that new ones should be erected where they were wanted; that the wall of the city should be rebuilt; and a new one c be raised between mount Sion, and the rest of the city, of such a height, as might effectually cut off all communication between them; to the end that the garison of Acra, being thereby deprived from all future supply, might be the sooner either forced to surrender, or be starved in it. All these wholesome resolutions were immediately put in execution; Jonathan undertook to oversee the work within the city, and Simon that without. A strong and high wall was accordingly built by the former, which reached quite close to the old one that was then a repairing, and made up that place which was called Chapbenatha, towards the east of the city, near the brook Cedron. This did so effectually inclose that mount, that the garison were not long after forced to surrender. Simon on his part went and repaired all the old forts, and added to them that of Adiba, or Adiaba, in the region of Sephala, westward of Eleutheropolis. By all which Judæa was now in a better condition for defence than it had ever been since their return from captivity ^b.

By this time Jonathan had governed the Jewish state near seventeen years, with great wisdom and success, when he was unwarily decoyed into the perfidious Tryphon's power, and soon after murdered by him. That traitor knew but too well
 d how vain it would be to attempt to wrench the crown from the young monarch, whilst he had so faithful and powerful an ally; and therefore, spared neither promises, oaths, nor any other treacherous means to persuade him to disband his numerous army, now become, as he pretended, useless and burdensome. Jonathan, too easily prevailed upon to take that destructive step, was soon after as unhappily decoyed into the city of Ptolemais, attended only by one thousand of his men, who were all treacherously murdered by his orders, and their chief only spared till the villain had obtained a large sum from Judæa under the name of a ransom, and caused him to be e massacred as soon as he had got it into his hands ^c. So that Jonathan died as much a sacrifice to his too generous credulity, as to his unshaken fidelity to Antiochus. As soon as the news of his being seized, and kept prisoner, and of the murder of his men, reached Jerusalem, the whole city was in the utmost consternation. They doubted not but the perfidious murderer would soon be at their gates, and be joined by all the heathens and apostate Jews, whom the bravery of their late leader had suppressed hitherto; and indeed their fears were but too well grounded; for Tryphon was making great preparations to march into Judæa, with a full resolution to extirpate, if possible, the whole nation; and all their enemies, who had been till now kept in awe, but had received a kind of new life at the news of Jonathan's being in his
 f hands, had began to express an impatient desire to see the land once more invaded, and threaten the Jews with a severe retaliation. Simon was now the only one of the sons of Mattathias that was left, and the courage and conduct which he had shewed hitherto made him looked upon as the only fit person to succeed his brother. An assembly was therefore called at the outer court of the temple, in which he was by their unanimous consent desired to take the command upon him; which he readily did, not only as he was the next in succession, but that he might find some means, either of releasing, or, at the worst, of revenging his worthy brother. To dissipate therefore as much as possible, that fear which he observed in their countenances, he addressed him-

As soon as he was installed in his new dignity, his first care was to finish the fortifications of the city with all speed, and to get together an army sufficient to make head against that of Tryphon, who was in full march against him. But when that traitor came to find the Jews in such a brave condition of defence, he contented himself with sending him word that he had seized his brother for a debt of a hundred talents, which he owed him; and that, if he would send them to him, and his two sons as hostages, their father should be immediately released. Simon easily saw through this treacherous pretence; but dared not refuse his demand, for fear of bringing some unjust suspicion on himself, as if he was the cause of his brother's detention. In the mean time the Syrian garison being sorely pressed for want of provision, found means to send Tryphon word, and to beg his assistance; and he having increased the number of his forces, was coming to their relief, but was prevented with a deep snow, and forced to withdraw into winter quarters; soon after which, he caused both Antiochus and Jonathan, with his two sons, to be murdered (Y), as we have elsewhere related; and returned to Syria. As soon as he was gone, Simon ordered their bones to be fetched from that place, and to be deposited in the sepulchre of his fathers at Modin, with the solemnity suitable to his rank, and then caused a stately monument to be reared over it (Z) h.

His next care was to send an embassy to the Roman senate, to notify to them the treacherous murder of his brother, his succession to his office, and to renew his alliance with them. They were to do the same with the Lacedæmonians, and in both places they were received with great honour. Both nations shewed an uncommon resentment at Tryphon's treachery, and cheerfully renewed their friendship with Simon, to whom they sent back letters of congratulation on his accession to the Jewish high-priesthood and government, together with the ratification of their alliance engraved on copper. All which being received, Simon caused them to be read before their great assembly; and then set about fortifying afresh both Jerusalem and other places of Judæa, and to raise new forces against any future invasion i. Having thus far strengthened himself by alliances, and the land with men, arms, and other necessary stores, he sent an embassy to Demetrius, whom Tryphon had by this time stripped of almost his whole kingdom; and in his letter to him, offered to acknowledge him king of c

(X) It seems as if the assembly however had some scruple about the regularity of this election to the pontifical dignity; and therefore we find a kind of an apology made for it in the ensuing chapter (16); where having recapitulated all his glorious deeds, and his lineal descent from Josiah, they add, that they had chosen him their governor and high-priest, and intailed those dignities on his posterity, until there should arise a faithful prophet (17), who might set them to rights about it.

(Y) The text says, that it was at Bysanias that he caused the three last to be put to death, and buried; but it is not easy to find the situation of that place; only one may conjecture, that it was in the land of Gilead, where he is said to have taken his winter quarters. Josephus calls the place Basan (18).

(Z) This noble piece of architecture stood on an eminence, which commanded the whole country round about; and being in itself raised to a great height, was seen at a great distance at sea, and served for a land-mark. It was made of white marble, curiously carved and polished. Simon caused also seven pyramids to be built round it, viz. two for his father and mother, and four for his four brethren, and the last for himself. The whole was surrounded with a stately portico, whose arches were supported by marble pillars, each of a whole piece. The top of it was adorned with shields, armour, ships, and other such embellishments curiously carved. All which were still to be seen, not only in Josephus, but in Eusebius, and St. Jerome's time (19).

Syria,

- a Syria, and to assist him in the recovery of his kingdom from the usurper, upon condition that he confirmed him in all his dignities, and his country in all their privileges and immunities. He backed his offers with a rich crown of gold, and some other presents; and Demetrius, glad at heart to accept the conditions, sent him a letter under the royal signature, by which he granted all his demands, together with a general amnesty and oblivion for all past hostilities, and constituted Simon sovereign prince of the Jewish nation, and freed his land from all foreign yoke. From this time Simon took upon him the name and authority of prince and high-priest of the Jews, which dignities having been confirmed to him and to his descendants on the next year, by an act of the sanhedrin, all public acts were ordered from thenceforward
- b to be made in his name (A).

- Simon's* main business now was to strengthen himself in this new dignity; to which end, he set about repairing and fortifying all his garisons afresh, especially that of Belbuzra, which being on the confines of Judæa, had been formerly made the chief magazine of the enemy, and was like to be one of the first places they would attempt. He therefore took care to secure it with good walls, towers, and ammunition, and with a garison of the stoutest Jews. About the same time he sent Jonathas the son of Abfolom with a good army to besiege Joppa, which being taken, he drove out all its inhabitants, filled it with men of his own nation, repaired its fortifications; and liking the situation of it, built himself a house, and settled there. The place from this time became the head sea-port to Jerusalem and all Judæa, being distant about forty miles from Jerusalem, and opening a trade to all the Mediterranean coasts and islands. *Strabo*¹ tells us, it was a port of the Jews in his time, and it has continued so ever since, notwithstanding its being a dangerous one, by reason of the great rocks that lie before it^m; though in other respects, very pleasant, being situate on a beautiful plain, and having Jamnia on the south, Cæsarea on the north, and Ramab on the eastⁿ. About the same time Simon went with another army to reduce the city of Gaza, or, as some more probably guess, that of Gazara (B), which had revolted ever since Jonathas's death. He battered it some considerable time with his engines, and was just on the point of storming it, when the inhabitants appeared on the walls, men, women, and children, with their cloaths rent, and implored his mercy with

(A) In pursuance, and by virtue of this grant, the Jews from that time ceased to date their contracts and other instruments, as formerly, by the reigns of the Syrian kings, and dated them by the years of Simon and his successors (20). This change was made by the general assembly of the Jews, both priests and elders, wherein the supreme government and high-priesthood were bestowed on Simon upon account of his great exploits, and extraordinary merit, which are there enumerated (21); and with this further addition, that those dignities should be installed on his posterity, as we observed in a late note. Moreover a copy of the grant, which was inscribed, King Demetrius unto Simon the high-priest, and friend of kings, and to the elders and nation of the Jews (22), was ordered to be engraven on tables of brass, and to be hung up in the sanctuary, and the original to be deposited among the archives of the nation.

This grant, which continued some generations in his family, was dated on the eighteenth day of the month Elul, answering in part to our August, in the hundred and seventy-second year of the Seleucide, and the third of Simon's pontificate. It is said to be given at the general assembly held at Saramael, which the margin of our English version supposes, with Varatius and others, to mean Jerusalem, by transposition of the letters. The vulgate reads it Afaramel, which, if right, may be properly enough supposed to be put according to the Greek way of writing Hebrew words and names, for chazar-millo, or the court or porch of Millo. Millo was the deep valley between old Jerusalem, and the city of David, which that monarch, and after him Solomon, caused to be filled up at a vast labour and charge, and was therefore called by that name from the Hebrew root, which signifies to fill; but whether this conjecture be right, or what the meaning of Saramael or Afaramel is, is hard to guess.

(B) Dean Prideaux justly suspects the former to have slipped in by the inadvertency of the Greek transcriber, instead of the latter (23), which is the Gazer or Gezer often mentioned by the sacred historians (24); and was likewise called Gader, Gedara, Gaderoth, and by Strabo Gadaris (25), who places it, as the book of Maccabees (26) doth Gazara, near Afsh, or Axotus, and Eusebius about two miles from Nicopolis (27).

For, first, as the learned dean above-mentioned rightly observes, Gazara, and not Gaza, is mentioned among the towns taken by Simon (28). Secondly, Gazara is often mentioned, as in the hands of Simon in this and the foregoing chapter; but Gaza only in this place. Lastly, he is said to have built him a house in that town (29), after he had taken it; and yet we find his son dwelling in Gazara, and made governor of it; so that upon the whole, it is most likely, Gaza was only a slip of the pen.

such doleful cries, as prevailed upon him to spare their lives, and to send them away ^a to shift for themselves where they could. He entered the town, and purified it of all its idolatrous monuments, put a strong garison of Jews in it, and caused a house to be built for himself, to which he often retired, either for relaxation, or to keep the neighbourhood in order ^o.

ON the next year, the fortress of Acra, which had been invested, as we hinted above, near two years, without any supply from without, being now reduced by famine, began to capitulate, after it had been held by the Syrians about twenty-five years, to the great nuisance of the Jewish nation. Simon, who wanted to be rid of ^b them at any rate, gave them leave to march out peaceably, whilst he and his troops entered it with palms in their hands at the sound of their trumpets, and other instruments, accompanied with songs, and other demonstrations of joy. At first he ordered it to be lustrated, and cleansed from all the heathenish idols, and other superstitious trash, intending probably to put a Jewish garison in it. But having thought better on it, he called a grand council, and proposed to them the demolishing of both it and of the hill on which it stood. He reminded them, among the other mischiefs it had caused hitherto, of its having been a constant refuge for all the discontented and renegado Jews, and of the danger of its becoming so again, in case it should be taken from them ^p. This proposal met with a general approbation; ^c the work was immediately set about, and carried on with indefatigable assiduity, during the space of three years, every man taking his turn in it, till the mountain was brought down to the level of that of the temple, that it might never more be in a condition to annoy it (C). All this while Simon employed another set of hands in repairing and fortifying the outer wall, and other parts of the temple, building of new apartments, particularly a palace for himself, where he dwelt from thenceforth. In memory of the surrender of that fortress, Simon ordered a festival to be kept yearly; and that he might the more fully vacate on the religious and civil affairs of the nation, appointed his son John general of all his forces, and ordered him to fix his residence at Gazara ^q, as was observed in a late note. It was in this year that ^d the great sanhedrin, and the whole assembly of the Jews, confirmed to him all his dignities, and intailed them on his posterity in consideration of the eminent services he had done to his country; which are therefore recapitulated (D) in the preamble to their decree, which we have had occasion to mention a little higher.

WE have seen in a former chapter [†], how Demetrius, driven from his dominions, had been taken and kept prisoner by the Parthians, whilst Tryphon's tyranny caused a general defection from him to Cleopatra. This princess, despairing ever to recover

(C) This circumstance of demolishing the fortress, and the hill, which we have mentioned out of Josephus, and those who have followed him, is not only omitted, but seems even contradicted by the first book of Maccabees, which affirms (31), that Simon fortified and garisoned it with Jews; and in the very next chapter, that Antiochus sent Simon a challenge to surrender it to him (32), which was three years after.

However, since that fortress was actually demolished, and the hill itself lowered to the level of the temple, it is likely, that Josephus has only antedated it by some years.

(D) Among other things that are there mentioned to his great honour, it was not a small one that Judas enjoyed a perfect peace during the whole time of his government, whilst Syria and other neighbouring kingdoms were almost destroyed by the wars which were there raised by competitors to their crowns, by traytors, and hostile depredations; so that it is there observed, that the Jews lived quietly every man under his vine and fig-tree, enjoying without fear the fruits of their labours, and beholding with pleasure the flourishing state of their country; their trade increased by the reduction of Joppa, and other maritime places; their territories enlarged; and their religion and liberties secured; their towns and other fortresses well garisoned; their army under good discipline; the land free from heathen enemies, and Jewish apostates; their friendship courted by all the nations about them, and even by the Romans and Greeks, and themselves free from all foreign yoke, and from danger of invasion (33).

His panegyrist adds, that he was no less zealous for the service of God, in exterminating apostasy, superstition, idolatry, and every thing else that was contrary to his laws; that he was a great protector of the true Israelites, and a friend to the poor; that he restored the service of the temple to its ancient splendor, and multiplied its sacred utensils; so that we need not wonder, if the Jewish sanhedria thought no dignity or honour too great for a man of such uncommon merit.

The Jewish chronologers tell us moreover, that in his days, and about this time, flourished those two great lights of their synagogue, Simoon Ben Shetach, and Jehudah Ben Tabnai, directors of the divinity schools at Jerusalem; and that the former was president, and the latter vice-president of the sanhedrin (34).

(34) Sepp. Juchasin,

- a her captive husband, sent to invite his brother Antiochus out of his retirement, to make a push for the Syrian crown. Upon his coming therefore to her, he sent a very obliging letter to the Jewish high-priest, in which he confirmed to him all his dignities, revenues, and authority, and to his nation all the freedom and immunities which had been formerly granted to them by his brother, or which they were now in actual possession of. To this he added, besides many great promises, a power of coining their own money in Judæa, which John immediately made use of (E). But when that prince had established himself on his throne by the marriage of Cleopatra, and the death of *Tryphon, Simon, whether he suspected the sincerity of his late promises, or was willing to make his friendship to him appear more considerable, sent a fresh embassy to Rome, to renew and strengthen his alliance with that nation. Among other valuable presents which he sent, one was a shield of gold, which weighed a thousand Minae, amounting, according to the lowest value of the Attic mina, to sixty thousand pounds of our money. His deputies were received with the usual honours, and procured letters from the senate to the kings of Syria, and Egypt, Pergamus, Capadocia, and other states, to notify their alliance with the Jews, and to threaten them with an immediate war, who should venture to commit any hostilities against them, and ordering them, if any Jewish criminals, apostates, or other Jewish outlaws had sheltered themselves in their dominions, to send them bound to the Jewish high-priest, if demanded by him.
- c THAT to the king of Syria was indeed directed to Demetrius, it being written before that prince's falling into the hands of the Parthians; but had it been directed to Antiochus, it is likely he would have had as little regard to it, as he had to that which he had sent to the Jewish chief. For even whilst he was besieging of Tryphon in Dora, whither Simon sent him two thousand chosen men, with warlike stores, ingines, and other ammunition; instead of accepting of them, he sent them all back, together with a threatening message to Simon, insisting upon his surrender of Joppa, Gazara, and the citadel of Jerusalem, which he said did belong to the crown of Syria, or else to pay him five hundred talents for each, and five hundred more for the ravages which the Jews had done in his dominion. Athenobius, one of that monarch's favourites, was the person who was dispatched upon that errand, and came accordingly to Jerusalem, and beheld with wonder the richness and splendor of the high-priest's court, at the same time that he informed him of his master's demands (F). Simon, nothing terrified at this message, answered him coolly, that he was in possession of nothing but what was the inheritance of his ancestors; except indeed the fortresses of Joppa and Gazara, which he had been forced to seize, to suppress the continual ravages and devastations they made in Judæa: that for these therefore he was willing to pay the king a hundred talents; but as to the fortress of Acra, he could by no means think that he had any right to demand it from him. Athenobius did not stay to make any reply, but went off abruptly, and returned to Antiochus, who was still carrying on the siege of Dora, and to whom he returned the answer which the Jewish pontiff had given him. He likewise related to him the pomp and grandeur of his household, the great quantity of silver and gold vessels used at his table, and other

(E) Several pieces of this Jewish coin are still preserved by the curious: the inscription of some of them is, The shekel, or half-shekel of Israel; in others, the first or second, &c. year of the deliverance of Israel, of Sion, of Jerusalem, &c. Others again are inscribed Simon prince of Israel. What is remarkable in these inscriptions is, that they are not in the new Assyrian character, adopted by Ezra, but in the old Samaritan; for which no other reason can be assigned, if they be authentic †, except that Simon was willing to preserve the ancient form of those that had been coined before the captivity, as well in the character, as the metal, and figure and weight.

Accordingly, these like the old ones, have on the one side a cup or pitcher, supposed to have been the pot of manna, and on the other a branch, or budding rod of Aaron, or a palm branch; some a vine, others a bunch of grapes, or a wheat-sheaf; some have two doves, others two towers, or the front of an edifice, supposed to be that of the temple.

Those we have left of him are all of silver; whether he coined any in gold, is not certain; the king's letter mentions neither metal, but permits him in general to coin his own money.

(F) Thus says the book of Maccabees (35); but Josephus, who takes no notice of this message by Athenobius, relates the story somewhat otherwise, and tells us (36), that Antiochus having writ to Simon to send him men and provisions for the siege, did alter his mind before they were come, and sent Cambyses presently after to invade Judæa.

such marks of the Jewish wealth, which he knew would not fail to incense that monarch against him; for, as Josephus observes, he was very covetous, and consequently ungrateful, and could not fail envying him so much riches and grandeur; and just so it happened. Antiochus forgetting at once his letter, and Simon's services, ordered Cendebeus, one of his nobles, to invade Judæa with a powerful army, whilst himself went with another in pursuit of the traitor Tryphon *.

Cendebeus having received the government of all the coasts of Phœnicia and Palestine, and being at the head of a powerful army of horse and foot, began his expedition with fortifying the town of Cedron, or, as the vulgate perhaps more properly calls it, Gedor †, a place advantageously situated; and putting a strong garison in it. In the mean time he himself marched towards Jamnia and Joppa, from whence he made many inroads into Judæa, took a great number of prisoners, and laid waste all that part of the country †. The news of it soon reached John, who, as we hinted above, was made general of the Jewish forces, and kept his residence at Gazara. He went immediately to Jerusalem, to acquaint his father with it; and Simon being by this time too old to head his Jewish troops, called his two brave sons, viz. this John, and his brother Judas, to whom he committed the command of them, charging them on his blessing, to imitate the valour of their brave uncles, and to venture their lives in defence of their religion and liberties (G). On these two setting out at the head of twenty thousand choice foot, besides some horse, they incamped on the first night at Modin; and on the morrow, as they advanced towards the plain, they came in sight of the enemy, and drew so near each other, that only a brook parted the two armies. That of John at first expressed some reluctance to cross it; but he, ashamed to see their backwardness, flung himself first into it, and moved forward; which so animated his men, that they immediately followed him. As soon as they were got over, he ranged them in order of battle, with his cavalry in the centre. An obstinate onset immediately ensued, in which the enemy being seized with a sudden fright at the sound of the sacred trumpets, did immediately give way. Many of them were killed and wounded, and the rest fled, some to the sconces, which they had in the plains of Azotus, where about two thousand of them perished in the flames, John, now surnamed Hyrcaus (H), having caused them to be set on fire. The rest with Cendebeus fled as far as Cedron, the place lately fortified by him, and John pursued him all the way thither; after which he faced about, and came and rejoined his brother Judas, who having received some wounds in the action, had been forced to stay behind. The two brothers having by this defeat cleared those parts from the Syrian troops, led their victorious army back to Jerusalem, without any considerable loss †. After this Judæa continued quiet and free from invasion, till the murder of their worthy high-priest, which happened about three years after, and brought Antiochus again with an army against that metropolis. The manner in which this perfidious act was perpetrated, is as follows.

Simon had then a son-in-law named Ptolemy, the son of Abadus, whom he had made governor of Jericho, and its territories, and who was grown exceeding rich in that government; but such was his ambition, that nothing less could satisfy him, than his being master of all Judæa. This wretch took the opportunity of Simon's taking a progress about the country with his two sons Judas and Mattathias, to invite them

(G) Here again Josephus (37) differs from the book of Maccabees, and makes the good old priest to forget his old age, and to sally out at the head of his troops, with as much vigour and resolution, as if he had been but in his prime; so fond is he to raise the character of his own ancestors.

(H) The fourth book of the Maccabees, of which we have given an account in a former note †, tells us, that John received the surname of Hyrcaus on account of his defeating a famous general of that name, and killing him with his own hand, which some think may be the Cendebeus, whom he here defeated, who might be also surnamed Hyrcaus, either because he was a native of Hyrkania, or on some other account (38).

Josephus Bengorion says, it passed from the eldest son of Simon, who was called Hyrcaus, to this brother John (39). Others think he had it given him on account of his beating the Hyrcausians (40), all without any certainty; since neither the first book of Maccabees, nor Josephus, give us any reason for it; besides we have seen that all the sons of Mattathias had their particular surnames; some of them more uncommon, and as little to be accounted for as this of Hyrcaus.

- a to his castle of Dog, where he had prepared a sumptuous entertainment for them. The old pontiff, who suspected nothing less than what was designed against him, was easily persuaded to accept of the invitation; but after they had feasted and drunk pretty freely, some ruffians, whom he had privately posted, rushed upon the three guests, and murdered them. His design was to have cut off *Hyrca*n also, who was then at Gazara; and to this end he dispatched some messengers to invite or bring him to him: but, happily for him, one of his father's retinue had escaped the slaughter, and had brought notice to him of what had passed; so that *Hyrca*n was before-hand with him, and cautioned his messengers to be taken, and put to death (1). *Hyrca*n, thinking himself now no longer safe there, made the best of his way to Jerusalem, b whither Ptolemy arrived as soon as he. Both offered themselves at different gates, and demanded admittance; but *Hyrca*n was received out of respect to his worthy father, whilst his murderer, and the men that came with him, had the mortification to be repulsed. *Hyrca*n was immediately declared prince and high-priest in his father's stead, and put himself at the head of his army, fortified himself in the mountain of the temple, and provided every way for his own safety, and for that of the city and country. On the other hand Ptolemy seeing himself disappointed of his designs on *Hyrca*n and Jerusalem, and having in vain endeavoured to bribe some of the heads of the Jews over to his interest by sumptuous promises, was at length reduced to the necessity of writing to Antiochus, to acquaint him with what he had done, and c to beg of him to come to his assistance; promising him at the same time to reduce all Judea under him, provided he made him governor of it. Antiochus, whom the late defeat of Cinobus had still more exasperated against the Jews, did easily embrace his offer, and was actually coming with a powerful army to his assistance; but whether through fear, or for whatever other reason, the rebel did not think fit to stay till his arrival, but fled to Zeno, tyrant of the city of Philadelphia. What became of the wretch afterwards, we cannot find. The author of the fourth book of Maccabees adds to what we observed in the last note, that after he had killed the mother and two brothers of *Hyrca*n, he fled, and retired into some place where he could not be come at, whilst *Hyrca*n was detained at Jerusalem to perform the priestly function, it being then the d feast of tabernacles. All that we know is, that no further mention is made of him

Simon treacherously murdered.

(1) Thus far goes the first book of the Maccabees, which concludes its epocha of forty years with this escape of *Hyrca*n, and refers us for the remainder of his life and actions to a book of chronicles (41) long since lost; so that we must now fill up the sequel of the Jewish history for the most part out of Josephus; in the following of whom care shall be taken to discover such errors of his, as are either accidental or otherwise, by comparing him with himself or other historians, till we come to the sacred ones of the New Testament; so that whatever we find in him, either that bears not an authentic face, or clashes, or has been confuted by other authors, will be either thrown into the margin, or, if of small moment, quite set aside.

To begin then with some of the improbabilities with which he continues the history of this high-priest, he tells us (42), that as soon as he was installed in his new dignities, he put himself at the head of the Jewish army, and went and besieged Ptolemy in his castle of Dog or Dagon, where he still kept alive Simon's wife and his two sons, contrary to the book of Maccabees, which says, that he assassinated the two latter with their old father, and mentions nothing of the wife.

He goes on, and tells us, that as *Hyrca*n went on with the siege, Ptolemy caused his mother and two brothers to be brought upon the walls of the castle, and there had them severely scourged, threatening at the same time to cast them headlong down, if he did not desist; and that the old lady observing her son to relent at the sight of her danger and cruel usage, made signs for him to go on with the siege, and to take no thought of her safety or life; and that her son, being unable to see them so cruelly tortured, did as often slacken his hand.

At length, continues he, the sabbatic, or seventh year being come, which was a year of rest as well as the seventh day, and *Hyrca*n upon that account being obliged to raise the siege, gave the murderer an opportunity to escape beyond Jordan; so that having put to death his three prisoners, he retired to Zeno surnamed Coryllus, who had usurped the government of the city of Philadelphia.

The fourth book of the Maccabees tells us much the same story, and only differs in two circumstances from Josephus. The first is, that Gaza, and not Jerusalem, was the place where *Hyrca*n was received and preferred to the assassin; and the second, that the feast of the tabernacles, and not the sabbatic year, obliged that pontiff to repair to Jerusalem to perform the function of his office; during which solemnity Ptolemy found means to escape far enough out of his reach.

This account, did it not contradict the first book of Maccabees, which expressly says, that the father and the two sons were murdered at the same time (43), would be much more probable than that of Josephus, at least with regard to the suspension of the siege; since there is no law that obliged the Jews to abstain from war, especially a detentive one, during the sabbatic year: if there had, how could they have continued a nation without a miracle? And yet Josephus not only affirms it to have been the cause of *Hyrca*n's raising the siege of Dagon, but of Antiochus's taking the advantage of it to invade Judea, and besieging its metropolis. This siege of Dagon is therefore justly called in question by several learned men (44).

Antiochus, allured into Judæa, partly at the news of the brave Simon's death, and of the riches of his successor, and partly by the fair offers which the traitor Ptolemy had made to him, entered Judæa on the ensuing year with a powerful army, and went directly to besiege Jerusalem, driving *Hyrca*n all the way before him, till he had shut himself up with his men into that metropolis. To inclose him the more effectually, Josephus tell us ^a, that he caused two deep and spacious trenches to be dug round the city, and divided his army into seven camps; so that all possibility of ingress or egress was intirely stopped. He reared likewise one hundred towers; the fourth book of the Maccabees says one hundred and thirty, which were three b stories high, upon which he placed his men to annoy those that defended the walls, whilst he was battering them from below. Josephus adds, that his army suffered some time for want of water, and was at length relieved with a good lasting rain. On the other hand, the besieged made a vigorous defence, and, by their frequent sallies, did greatly annoy the besiegers (K). As therefore no relief could be expected from without, either of men or provisions, *Hyrca*n bethought himself at first of a way of ridding himself of all useless mouths, by putting them out of the city; by which means they, being pent up between the wall and the enemies ditch, must infallibly have been starved in a little time, had they not been taken in again. What raised the compassion of those within the walls, was the approaching feast of tabernacles, which was usually solemnized with great joy and feasting, and could not but have been very much disturbed by the cries of their perishing brethren without. *Hyrca*n c then sent to Antiochus to desire a truce of seven days, that they might quietly celebrate that festival; which was not only readily granted, but that prince being thereby stirred up to some sense of religion, sent them a considerable number of victims, with their horns gilt, together with several rich vessels of gold and silver ^w, filled with precious perfumes, and some money and other necessaries, which were, by *Hyrca*n's orders, thankfully received by the priests at one of the gates of the city, and thence conveyed into the temple (L). This unexpected instance of the king's piety and liberality gave him some hopes that a peace might probably be obtained from d him with the same ease. He was not mistaken, and Antiochus, whether tired with the brave and constant defence of the besieged, which is not unlikely, if the account we have just now given in a note out of the fourth book of the Maccabees is not exaggerated, or moved by some other reason, granted it to him, upon the conditions following:

THAT the Jews should deliver up their arms; that the city wall should be demolished; and that John should pay him a certain tribute for Joppa, and other towns he held out of Judæa. The king insisted hard upon two other conditions, namely, that they should receive a Syrian garison into their metropolis; and secondly, that the fortress of Acra should be rebuilt. The first of these they bought off at the price of five hundred talents, three hundred of which were to be paid instantly, and the rest at some distance of time. They likewise engaged to put into the king's hands a sufficient number of hostages to secure him of their future allegiance, that they might be wholly free from any commerce with strangers. As for the second, *Hyrca*n, who remembered what a grievous thorn in their side the late fortress had been to them, would by no means agree to the building of a new one; and the king, according to his usual clemency, remitted this also. And yet Josephus tells us, that when this peace was transacting, the city was reduced to the last extremity, having quite exhausted all their provisions; and, which is still more surprizing, that the besiegers were so well informed of it, that they earnestly pressed the king to make use of so favourable e an opportunity to destroy and extirpate the whole Jewish nation, which they f

(K) To what we have related of this siege out of Josephus, the fourth book of Maccabees adds, that as Antiochus was ordering the sapping of the walls, he observed, that the foundations were of timber; upon which he caused them to be set on fire, which soon brought down a great part of the wall; but that the besieged coming instantly to defend the breach, not only hindered the besiegers from entering the town, but drove them back, and made a stout sally after them, in which, besides a great number of the Syrians, which they killed, they destroyed most of the enemies towers.

(L) In this, and the following particulars relating to the peace, Josephus and the fourth book of Maccabees agree, tho' they seem to differ in those which relate to the siege, and the defence made by the besieged.

a traduced to him in the bitterest terms, as the pest of mankind, and sworn enemies of all other nations; so that, all things considered, it seems as if providence had interposed in their behalf, and had mollified that monarch's heart towards them. And a heathen author owns * with Josephus, that it was owing to his surprising goodness and generosity, that the whole nation had not then been intirely destroyed, and that they obtained a peace upon such easy terms.

HOWEVER that was, the peace was signed on both sides, and the proper hostages sent to Antiochus, among whom was *Hyrca*n's brother; the city was dismantled; the money paid; and the siege raised: but *Hyrca*n was forced to make use of a strange expedient to procure the three hundred talents stipulated. It seems their treasury was then at so low an ebb, that it could not furnish him with that sum; so that John b was forced to open a hidden treasure, which had been laid up by some of the kings of Judab; Josephus says the tomb of David c, from which he took out three thousand talents; a thing which had never been attempted before by any of his predecessors, nor was after him by any, except by Herod (M). With this fresh supply he paid Antiochus, and undertook, what had never been done before, to take a number of foreign troops into his service. This peace was followed with an alliance with Antiochus, after which that monarch was invited into Jerusalem with his chief officers, where he was received and feasted in a sumptuous manner, and after mutual assurances of friendship and assistance, the king set out for Syria, and *Hyrca*n about repairing the breaches and damages which had been made during the siege. This c peace was made on the ninth month after Simon's death (N). *Hyrca*n was punctual in his promises to that prince for some years after, and did him several signal services in his war against Pbraartes, spoken of a little higher *, and bore a great share in the victories which that prince gained against him. Some authors think c, that it was in this war that John got the name of *Hyrca*n, on account of some signal victory he

(M) The story of a hidden treasure, whether laid up by David, or by any of his successors, is justly suspected by the judicious, as a fable invented by those two authors, without any foundation; only that of the Maccabees delivers it as a common report; whereas Josephus affirms it both of *Hyrca*n and Herod without hesitation.

That both David and Solomon heaped immense riches, we have formerly seen; but that they caused any part of them to be hidden under ground, much less in their own tombs, is no-where said, either by the sacred or apocryphal writers; but the contrary may be fairly deducted from them. For, if they had left any such hidden treasure, is it likely that their wicked successors, who made no scruple to rifle the temple of its sacred utensils and ornaments (45), would have left it untouched? Is it likely that good king Hezekiah would have chosen to take all the silver and the gold vessels of the temple, and even tear off the gold with which the gates, pillars, and other parts of that sacred building were covered (46), rather than to break into this immense, but useless treasure?

Again, is it probable, had there been any such depository, that so many Affyrian and Chaldean monarchs, as had formerly rifled both city and temple, would not have got some knowledge of it, and gutted it of all its riches? And if they had till then been preserved by some kind of miracle (for nothing less could do it) how should *Hyrca*n dare to break in upon them, and not rather, like the good king above-mentioned, have rifled the temple of some of its valuable ornaments, which, by what we have seen hitherto, were by this time grown very numerous and costly, by the generosity not only of his predecessors, but of foreign princes?

We have lately seen, that there was a treasury or bank in the temple, part of which consisted of donations for the support of the poor, partly of the portions and dowries of the fatherless and widows, and partly of the substance of the richer sort, who deposited their wealth there for security *, besides that which was allotted for the maintenance of the divine service (47). Now, if we consider, that they were so continually harassed with wars, invasions and oppressions, it is not improbable that they kept these riches in some proper subterranean places, known but to a few trusty men at the head of affairs, and kept the whole as much a secret as possible; if therefore *Hyrca*n was now hard put to, to raise money, is it not more probable, that he borrowed it out of this bank, till better times enabled him to repay it?

But when Herod did totally rifle it for his own use, if ever he really did it, might he not trump up this plausible story, that it had been deposited there by David, or his successors, against times of need? And might not that cunning monarch colour this wicked deed with the specious pretence, that *Hyrca*n, a person of unexceptionable character, had done the same thing upon the like emergency †?

(N) Josephus (48) tells us, that, in the first year of *Hyrca*n's pontificate, a priest of the family of Joarib, named Matthias Aphias, was married to a daughter of the late Jonathan, by whom he had Matthias Curtus, who begot Josephus, who was his grandfather.

In the second year of the same *Hyrca*n, came from Jerusalem into Egypt, Jesus the son of Sirac, a learned Jew, who there translated the book of Wisdom written by Jesus his grandfather, into Greek, for the use of the hellenistical Jews (49). We have already spoken of that work and its author in a former note, to which we refer (50).

gained over the Hyrcaanians. However that be, Josephus tells us ^a, on the authority of N. Damascen, that Antiochus shewed him so much regard, as to halt two days on account of the feast of pentecost, because it beginning that year on the day immediately following the sabbath, it was not lawful for the Jews to march on these two days. Antiochus was soon after defeated and killed, as has been elsewhere related [†]; and Hyrcaan, in his return to Jerusalem, took Aleppo, and laid it under a tribute ^c. After this, finding that the kingdom of Syria was rent with intestine disturbances, and their cities naked and defenceless, he marched thither with a good army, resolved to seize upon such of them as lay most convenient for him. The first he took was that of Madeba, which cost him a six month's siege. From thence he went to that of Samega, which he subdued, with several others both in Arabia and Phœnicia ^d. ^b From this time we may date the total deliverance of the Jews from the Syrian yoke; for neither he nor any of his descendants paid either homage or obedience to those monarchs ever afterwards, but lived free and independent from them ^e. From thence he turned his arms against the Samaritans, and took Shechem and mount Garizim, and the temple formerly built by Sanballat, and demolished it, after it had stood two hundred years; together with all the edifices, altars and monuments which had been built there by Jezabel, and put several of the Samaritan priests to death (O). The following year Idumea was likewise conquered by him ^f, where he caused proclamation to be made throughout that province, obliging all those that would not be circumcised to depart out of the land; but the Idumeans chusing rather to forsake ^c their old idolatry than their country, submitted to his conditions, and were from that time incorporated into the Jewish commonwealth (P).

In the year following Hyrcaan sent Simon the son of Dositheus, and Apollonius the son of Alexander, on an embassy to the Roman senate, to renew the alliance they had lately made with Simon his father, and sent some valuable presents by them (Q). These met with an honourable reception at Rome, and a ready compliance with all their demands. The senate, besides the renewing of the alliance, granted the Jews the possession of Joppa, Gazara, and some other places, which Antiochus had taken from them, and ordered the ambassadors a sum out of the public treasury, to defray

(O) These two last particulars, which we have out of the fourth book of the Maccabees, Josephus says nothing of; but only mentions the demolishing of their temple, which was from that time never attempted to be rebuilt; however, the Shechemites built themselves an altar there, on which they offered their sacrifices, according to the Mosaic law, and have continued to do so ever since.

(P) From that time downward to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, they continued in the Jewish religion; so that the word Idumean signified no more than incorporated Jews, in contradistinction to those that were so by natural descent (1); and from their total dispersion, the former name has been intirely absorbed in the latter.

With respect to these Idumean proselytes, it will be proper to observe here, that Herod, who obtained afterwards the kingdom of Juda, was of that race. From his reign therefore the Jewish writers began to style it מלכות הגרים malkuth hagerim, the kingdom or reign of proselytes or strangers; which not being observed by Scaliger and Munster, they have translated it the kingdom of the Hagarens; but our learned Usher has sufficiently confuted that mistake (2); and we shall further shew, when we come to the reign of that prince, that he was really one of these Idumeans, incorporated into, and thereby intitled to all the privileges of a natural Israelite. There was indeed to be this difference in the true Edomites, that they could not intermarry with them till the third generation, according to the law of Moses (3); but as we have shewn these Idumeans to be of a different race, or rather a mixture of other nations, how that matter was regulated by the Sanhedrin, we know not.

We have heretofore observed [†], that the word Edomite and Idumean, which often occurs in the rabbinic writings, is not that of any nation, but the name by which they call the Christians, against whom they write, and is indeed one of the civilest; but they oftner use those of goi, heathen, and Nozri or Nazarite, and sometimes that of Samaritan and Cuthean; which caution we here repeat, to prevent those that read them being mistaken by any of those feigned names.

(Q) Among these the fourth book of Maccabees mentions a large dish and a shield, amounting to fifty thousand pieces of gold. That author mentions some other particulars, which are not in Josephus; such as, that the ambassadors were made to sit down with the Roman consul; that they were allowed the free exercise of their religion; and that the letter which they brought from the senate to Hyrcaan, did give him the name and title of king, which that pontiff took upon him, and bore it from thenceforward. The letter is there related at full length; but as it contains nothing particular except that inscription, we shall refer the reader to that book for it.

a their charges homewards. They likewise sent letters to all the governors of the provinces through which they were to pass in their return, to see them treated with all the marks of honour due to their character. The senate likewise ordered, that all the complaints they had exhibited against the Syrians should be redressed; declared null and void all that Antiochus, or his successor, had done, or should do, contrary to their late league with the late Jewish high-priests; that the Syrians should reimburse to them all the losses sustained by them, and appointed commissaries to come and see the purport of their decree fully executed. The ambassadors had likewise desired letters from the senate, directed to all the princes and free states with whom they were in alliance, to recommend the Jewish interest to them; but there being at b that time other important matters on the tapis, the affair was deferred for further deliberation; and they returned to Jerusalem highly satisfied with what they had.

This embassy having so well succeeded, Hyrcaus, on the next year, sent a new one with fresh presents, to thank the senate for their last favour, and to obtain a ratification of all their former decrees in their behalf; all which was readily granted, and the ambassadors returning, brought this new act, which the reader may see at full length in Josephus (R). By these alliances John saw himself more and more strengthened in his dominions, whilst the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt were still troubled with continual wars. Alexander Zebina having by this time mounted the Syrian throne*, was glad to make him his friend; but being soon after killed, and succeeded c by Antiochus Grypus, this last did so resent it, that he was preparing himself to invade Judea; but was happily prevented by his brother, who was then levying an army at Cyzicum, and coming against him. Hyrcaus left them to fight it out between them, without concerning himself on either side, chusing rather to enjoy his sovereign authority peacefully, which gave him an opportunity of heaping up immense treasures, by the tributes which he received both from his own now flourishing land, and from those countries which he had lately subjected to his dominions. At length some hostilities, which the Samaritans committed against the Mareffans (S), who were then in friendship with him, gave him a fair handle for renewing the war, which he had lately begun against those of the city of Shechem. He went therefore

A second embassy sent to Rome.

* Vol. III. p. 611, & seq.

(R) Here Josephus has again committed a manifest blunder, by inserting this decree in the wrong place (4), and instead of another then granted by the senate upon another occasion, and at the recommendation of Julius Caesar, to Hyrcaus the second. This has been fully proved by several learned men, whom the reader will find in the margin (5); and he may further convince himself, by comparing the contrariety between the decree itself, and the occasion upon which the Jewish historian there quotes it, with respect to the following particulars:

1. He says it was obtained for the rebuilding of the city wall demolished by Pompey; but there is not a word in the decree about the wall, but only of renewing and confirming the former alliances.
2. The decree was dated on the ninth year of Hyrcaus, who could not be the second of that name; for if it had been obtained to this last by Julius Caesar, it must have fallen in the seventeenth, not of his reign, for that he had been dispossessed of by Gabinus, but of his priesthood, which was all the dignity that was left to him, as Josephus himself owns in another place (6); and if his reign were to be dated, not from his restoration by Pompey, but from the death of his mother, it must have been the twenty-third, and not the ninth of his reign.

Again, there is a manifest difference between the dates of the preamble to, and the decree itself. The one dates it the ninth of Hyrcaus, in the month Parthenius, answering to our July, and the other the ides (or thirteenth) of December. From all which it is evident, that Josephus has, by a mistake, inserted here one decree for another; and that this belonged not to any year of Hyrcaus the second, but to the ninth year of Hyrcaus the first.

Another strong proof of this is; Naumenius the son of Antiochus, who is mentioned in the decree as one of the ambassadors sent by Hyrcaus to procure it, is the same who had been sent about seventeen years before, on the like errand, to Rome by Jonathan, as we have lately seen; he might therefore be still young enough to be sent on this new embassy in the ninth year of Hyrcaus the first; but must have been long dead and rotten before the decree obtained by Caesar in favour of Hyrcaus the second, the being near eighty years distance between them. To all this may be added, that the decree here inserted is that of an alliance made by proper ambassadors between the Roman senate and a free state, such as the Jewish was in Hyrcaus the first's time; whereas that obtained by Caesar for Hyrcaus the second, was not an alliance by embassy, but a favour conferred on the Jews, in consideration of the services they had done the Roman general in the Alexandrian war; at which time they were no longer a free, but a conquered nation, as the sequel of this history will soon shew.

(S) The city of Mareffa, or Marefa, which stood at about two miles distance from Eleutheropolis, had been some time before taken by him, and since retaken by the Syrians, under whom it now was; but still in alliance and friendship with the Jews (7).

with his two sons Aristobulus and Antigonus, at the head of a powerful army, and with all the proper engines for the siege of Samaria, which had been since rebuilt and fortified (T). These encompassed the city with a wall, and a deep ditch, of about eighty furlongs, or four thousand paces circuit; by which they soon reduced the city to such scarcity of provisions, that they began to eat all manner of unclean beasts, such as cats, dogs, and other carion. In this extremity they found means to send and implore the assistance of Antiochus Cyzicenus, who was now on the Syrian throne *, and who came accordingly with a great army to their relief †.

Samaria besieged.

In the mean time the grand expiation day being at hand, Hyrcan was obliged to go to Jerusalem to perform the office of it, and left his two sons to carry on the siege. Upon their hearing that Antiochus was coming against them, Aristobulus was dispatched with part of the army to meet him. A bloody engagement ensued, in which the Syrians were totally routed, and pursued as far as Scythopolis; and Antiochus escaped with great difficulty. After this defeat, the siege was renewed with such vigour, that Antiochus was again applied to; but he not caring to hazard a second battle, contented himself with sending six thousand men to make a diversion in Judea, in hopes to oblige the Jews to raise the siege; neither were these his own troops, but such as he had with some difficulty obtained from the king of Egypt. We have already seen the ill success of this expedition in a former volume, as well as the betraying of Scythopolis to Hyrcan by Epicrates, and the surrender and utter demolition of Samaria †. From this time Hyrcan became more and more powerful, and made himself master not only of all Palestine, but added also unto it the provinces of Samaria and Galilee; all which he enjoyed to the end of his life, without any molestation from without, or discords from within his dominions. His reign was no less remarkable on the account of his great wisdom and piety at home, than his conquests abroad. Never did the Jewish religion or commonwealth appear in greater lustre since the return from captivity; but that which raises his glory above any of his predecessors or successors, was, if we may believe Josephus †, and the fourth book of Maccabees †, his enjoying three dignities, which never all met in any but him; namely, the royal dignity, the high-priesthood, and the gift of prophecy. Of the last of these we shall give two or three instances out of those authors in the margin (V); but the second, or high-priesthood, tho' he had exercised it in such a manner as ought to have rendered him doubly venerable, yet in the end proved the source of such persecutions from the proud and hot-headed pharisees, as quite imbibbered the latter end of his reign, if not shortened his days. It is under his regn that this sect, as well as those of the sadducees and essenians, of which we have already spoken something, are supposed to have started up. This therefore may be thought a proper place of speaking of them more at large, as well as of that of the caraites, which sprung up afterwards; but as each of those four sects had many favourite tenets, quite opposite to the spirit and doctrine of the gospel, and its divine author, and proved so many invincible obstacles against its reception, we shall defer speaking of them till we

(T) It will be proper here to remind our readers, that these Samaritans were not now of the old race and sect so much hated by the Jews; for these, we have seen a little higher, had been either destroyed, or driven out of that metropolis, by Alexander the Great, for the murder of his favourite Andronicus; immediately after which he repopulated the place with Syro-Macedonians, or a mixture of Syrians, Macedonians and Greeks.

These being settled there, did encompass the town with a double high wall, a deep ditch, and other fortifications; those therefore are mistaken, who think, that the Jewish hatred against the former sort of Samaritans was the occasion of this war; for these were all heathens, and consequently strangers to the disputes and intailed enmity between those two.

(V) Josephus affirms him to have had very extraordinary visions and revelations, more particularly about his own children. He tells us for instance, that on the day in which his forces defeated those of Antiochus, himself was then offering up incense in the most holy place, where he heard a voice telling him of the victory gained by his sons.

As he was very fond of those two brave youths, he was no less importunate with heaven to know which of them was to succeed him; but, to his great mortification, he saw in a vision a third son, not yet born, who was pointed at as his successor. This grieved the good old man so much, it seems, that when Alexander was soon after born, he sent him to be privately brought up in Galilee; but this did not hinder the vision being verified by the sequel; of which he was made however so sensible before he died, that he foretold the reigns of his two eldest sons Aristobulus and Antigonus to be but short, after which Alexander would succeed them.

There are some other singularities related of him, which have still more the air of fables, and therefore not worth mentioning; only this one is very remarkable, if true, that the stones of the breast-plate, and the carbuncle on his shoulder, quite lost their lustre after his death, and never recovered it since.

- a come to that glorious epocha. By this means the reader will have 'em so fresh in his mind, and, as it were, in one view, that, instead of wondering at the Jews rejecting so universally the person and doctrine of the Messiah, he will rather look upon it as a kind of miracle, that so many of that blind and prepossessed nation should so readily embrace them.

- But, to return to our subject, *Hyrca*n had always shewed himself a zealous stickler for the pharisees; they had hitherto monopolized his favours, and enjoyed the most considerable posts under him, whilst the other two were despised and kept under by him. But an untimely piece of condescension towards them, or perhaps rather of vanity, from which the best of men are not always exempt, gave one of the heads of that imperious sect, named Eleazar, an opportunity to cast a reflection against him, which touched him in the most sensible part. It was no less than calling in question his legitimacy, at least as being less pure and undefiled than the Mosaic law requires in a high-priest; and this he did by pretending, that his mother had been formerly a slave, intimating thereby, that either she was not of Jewish extraction, or else, that being so, she had been taken captive by the enemy, and forced to prostitute herself for a maintenance. The story being, as Josephus assures us, absolutely false, and only trumped up by that proud pharisee to mortify the good old prelate, we shall throw it in the margin (W), and only add, that Eleazar's base suggestion, and the partiality of his brotherhood in assigning him a condign punishment, did so exasperate the high-priest against the whole sect, that from that time he gave himself up wholly to that of the sadducees, who were not a little glad to aggravate the affront as hatched against him by the whole pharisaic body, tho' one only of them had had the courage to blab it out. From thenceforth therefore there grew the bitterest enmity between him and that revengeful sect, who ceased not to raise troubles and seditions against him during the short time he lived, and against his sons after him. *Hyrca*n was then in the twenty-eighth year of his pontificate when this quarrel happened, and he died in the very next year, greatly lamented by all but the pharisaic crew, who left no stone unturned to blacken his memory, and to get into the same credit and authority they had formerly enjoyed under him (X)^k.

(W) *Hyrca*n's desire to ingratiate himself still farther to this imperious sect, which he observed to grow daily more and more the darling of the people, by reason of their specious pretence to a greater degree of sanctity; made him one day, after he had given some of the heads of them a most sumptuous entertainment, ask them, if they had any thing to object or to find fault with against his government, that he might rectify it; since he had always made it his chief study and delight to act with the utmost regard to God, and according to the rules and maxims of their sect.

Whilst therefore the rest of the company were extolling his piety, zeal, valour and conduct up to the skies, the surly and turbulent Eleazar started up, and, with his wonted ill-nature, told him, that if he was really desirous to deserve the praises which his brethren had so lavishly given him, he ought to divest himself of his high-priesthood, and be content with the civil government of the nation. Being asked the reason of so strange a proposal, he answered him, That they were well assured, upon the testimony of ancient persons still living, that his mother had been taken captive in the wars, which rendered him incapable by the law of Moses † to succeed to the pontifical dignity.

This malicious suggestion, it seems, was refuted by all the company; but much more by the old pontiff, who thereupon resolved to take some signal satisfaction for the calumny cast on his mother and himself. He had then a favourite friend named Jonathan, a zealous Sadducee, who took occasion from it to intimate to him, that Eleazar was but the tool and mouth of the Pharisaic sect; but that the slander must have been concerted by the whole party. To convince him of it, he advised him to consult the brotherhood concerning the punishment of the calumniator, and he would soon find, either by their lenity or severity towards him, whether they had any hand in the calumny.

*Hyrca*n took his advice, and asked the heads of that sect, What punishment they thought Eleazar deserved for raising such an impious and unjust slander on the prince and high-priest of their nation? expecting no doubt but they would have condemned him to death; but, to his surprize, they told him, that as calumny was no capital crime, the severest punishment he could inflict on him, was that of scourging and imprisonment.

There wanted no more to convince the pontiff of the truth of what Jonathan had suggested to him; so that from that time he became an irreconcilable enemy to the whole sect, forbad, under severe penalties, the observance of their commandments and traditions, and became a zealous patron of the opposite sect of the Sadducees. On the other hand, the Pharisees became mortal enemies, not only to him and his family, but to the whole Sadducean party, and never ceased plotting against them till they had gained the saddle again; which they did in some few years after, as the sequel will shew.

(X) Josephus is very inconsistent in the years of this prelate's reign, if there be not some error crept into the copies we have of him, and in the Latin version of Rufinus; for in one place (8) he gives him thirty-three, and in two others (9) thirty-one; yet Eusebius out of him gives him but twenty-nine (10), and so doth St. Jerom in his Latin version of him,

*Hyrca*n is affirmed by Josephus to have built the stately tower, or rather castle of a Baris (Y), the same which served afterwards for a palace for the Asmonean princes, and was some time after rebuilt, enlarged and fortified by Herod, and called by him Antonia, in honour of the emperor Marc Antony. This castle was built upon a steep rock, fifty cubits high from the valley that ran beneath it to the top on which the building stood, and was inaccessible on all sides, except that towards the temple, with which it was even. It was of a square figure, two furlongs in compass; that is, half a furlong, or three hundred feet on every side. The rock stood without the outer square of the temple, and upon the same mountain with, and on the north-side of it, running parallel with its outer wall, but incompassed with that which Simon had built to stop the communication between the temple and the fortrefs of Acra. b Here *Hyrca*n built an apartment, where he deposited his pontifical robes and ornaments, whenever he divested himself of them to vacate on his other affairs; which method was afterwards observed by his successors. Here he kept his court, and spent most of his time; and so did they after him ¹, till Herod observing the strength of its situation, turned it into a fortrefs; in which however the priestly attire was still kept, even after the Jews were subdued by the Romans, and under the custody of the commander of that garison, called by St. Luke the captain of the temple ^m. This officer kept them in his custody under lock and seal, and delivered them up to the high-priests upon all solemnities in which they were required; immediately after which they were put into his hands again, as we shall see in the next section. c

*Hyrca*n left three sons, according to the fourth book of Maccabees (Z), or five, according to Josephus ⁿ, who gives us however the names but of four of them; namely, Aristobulus, who was also called Judas, and surnamed Philellen, by reason of his fondness for the Greeks; 2. Antigonus; 3. Alexander and Abjolom, who was the youngest. What was the name of the fourth he no-where tells us. Aristobulus succeeded his father in all his dignities in right of primogeniture, according to the Mosaic law; and having a great affection for his brother Antigonus, he admitted him to share the government with him for some short space; after which, upon some suspicion or dislike, he caused him to be put to death. The other three he kept close prisoners during his short reign, which lasted but one year, which he yet stained d with his own mother's blood; for that princess having claimed a right to the sovereignty, by virtue of *Hyrca*n's will, her unnatural son not only shut her up in a prison, but there barbarously starved her to death. Soon after this he assumed the title of king, and began to wear the royal diadem, which, if we may believe Josephus, had never been done by any of his predecessors ^o, who had till then contented themselves with the title of governors, or at most with that of prince (A). him, and elsewhere (11), and rightly too; for, as the learned Usher observes in the place last-quoted, Simon, *Hyrca*n's father, died in the 177th year of the Grecian kingdom, and in the 11th of month Sebat (12), answering to the 4579th of the Julian period; and his wife Alexandra, who reigned after his sons, died, as the sequel will shew, in December 4644 of the same period; so that the distance is 65 years, and about 9 months; from which if we subtract the 37 years which Josephus allows to her and her sons, the remainder will be 28 years, and 9 months.

(Y) St. Jerom, in his comments on those sacred books, which were written after the Babylonish captivity, such as those of Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah, and on some other prophets (13), observes the word Baris to be of Chaldean extraction, peculiar to Palestine, and to signify a house or castle inclosed on every side. In the same sense the Septuagint have used it likewise; and as that word in the plural is Bapsis, which likewise signifies heavy, their interpreters have sometimes took it in the latter sense without any reason, and puzzled thereby several places of scripture, which were plain enough in the former signification, particularly the ivory palaces mentioned by the psalmist (14).

(Z) This author adds (15), that *Hyrca*n was so excessively fond of his two eldest sons, that he would name neither to the succession, but left it wholly to providence to direct it. On the other hand he bore as great an aversion to Alexander, who had been pointed out to him as his successor in a vision, of which we have spoken in a late note, but yet without attempting any thing against him to prevent it.

Josephus, on the contrary, tells us, that he left the government to his wife during her life, tho', by the cruelty with which her eldest son used her, one would rather think, that she had forged some such will against him.

(A) We have seen however in a late note ^{*}, that *Hyrca*n took the royal name and dignity upon him long before. Strabo says (16), that it was Alexander, Aristobulus's successor, who first took that title upon him.

- a had settled his affairs at home, he marched at the head of his army to invade Iturea; ^{Invas'd Iturea.} but being taken ill in the midst of his successes, he was forced to be brought back to Jerusalem, and to leave his brother to complete the conquest of that province (B); which he soon after did, causing all the Itureans either to be circumcised, and incorporated with the Jews, or else to depart into some other country ^P.

WHILST he was carrying on this successful war, there wanted not those at court, ^{Antigonus murdered.} who envying his happiness, endeavoured to prepossess the sick king with strange suspicions against him. The queen more particularly seemed to have conceived some irreconcilable hatred against that prince, and to have been the chief engine of his ruin; which happened soon after, when Antigonus innocently furnished her with the means of working it more effectually. For as soon as he had finished the conquest of Iturea, he marched directly to Jerusalem, it being then the feast of tabernacles; and being in haste to repair to the temple, to offer up his thanks for his success, and his vows for his brother's recovery; he went directly thither in his armour, without staying to shift his cloaths, and accompanied with a number of his men. This was immediately interpreted to the timorous king as a manifest attempt upon his life, to which he gave but too easy credit. However, to satisfy himself more fully about it, he sent him orders to put off his armour, and to come immediately to him, which, if he complied with, would sufficiently justify him; but if not, would fully prove his treasonable intent. The king was then at his castle of Baris, mentioned a little higher, ^c where he ordered some of his guards to be privately posted in the subterranean gallery, through which Antigonus was to pass, and who were charged to murder him, if he presumed to come armed to him. But the mischievous queen corrupted the messenger, and made him go and tell the young prince, that his brother having heard his armour highly commended, desired to see him in it immediately; so that when Antigonus came to pass through the gallery, the guards fell immediately upon him, and killed him (C). The king however was soon undeceived, and could not think upon his brother's murder without reflecting on the more cruel one, which he had lately committed on his own mother; the remorse of which increasing his disease, he fell into a violent vomiting of blood. A servant happening soon after to spill some ^d of that blood, which he was carrying away in a basin, upon the very spot where that of his brother Antigonus was still to be seen; some of the by-standers, thinking he had done it wilfully, gave a great cry, which was heard by the king. He sent to ask the meaning of it, and found them unwilling to acquaint him with it; which made him still more desirous of knowing it. At length he forced the fatal secret from them, which threw him into an excess of grief and despair, which he vented in words to this effect: Since the privacy of the place could not hide from God's all-seeing eye the detestable deed I have committed, but must now vomit up my own blood, as it were, by drops, to atone for that which I have so inhumanly shed, would not a speedy death be much more desirable to me? He gave up the ghost soon after,

(B) This province was so called from Itur the son of Ishmael, whom our English and some other versions wrongly call Yetur. It was situate on the other side Jordan, on the north side of the half tribe of Manasseh, between that and the territories of Damascus; so that it made one part of Cœle-Syria, and did lie on the one side of Judæa, as Idumæa, formerly conquered in the same manner, did lie on the other. It had the province of Battanea on the east, and the Trachonitis mentioned by St. Luke (17) on the south (18). The Reubenites, Simeonites, and Manassites, are said in the chronicles to have invaded these territories (19), and to have subdued the Itureans.

(C) The gallery here spoken of was, it seems, under one of the towers of the castle, called upon some account or other Siraton's tower; and so verified, according to Josephus, the prediction of one Judas, of the sect of the Essenians, concerning this prince's death. This man, who was then at Jerusalem, had foretold some time before, that Antigonus should be killed on that very day at Siraton's tower; but as he understood it of another more famed on the sea-coast, and at a distance from this, he was not a little surprised to see that prince come to the temple, looking upon it as a demonstration of the falshood of his prediction, since the day being already far advanced, it was impossible for him to reach it, it being above six hundred furlongs from Jerusalem.

This threw him into such a fit of raving, that he vented his complaints for the supposed deception in a very indecent manner, and Judas like, cried out, it had been better for him to have been dead, before he had been found a false prophet. Whilst he was in the height of his murmuring, news were brought of Antigonus's murder, and the name of the tower convinced both him and the rest of the truth of his prediction (20).

having reigned but one year (D), and was succeeded by his brother Jannæus, or Alexander, whom the queen Salome, called by the Greeks Alexandra, released out of prison with his other two brethren, and caused him to be proclaimed king, as being the eldest of the three, and of a milder disposition than either of them.

He was however forced to begin his reign with the death of his fourth brother, who had made some treasonable attempt against him; but was much kinder to Abjolom the youngest of all, whom finding contented to lead a private life under him, he took under his protection as long as he lived; and so privately did this prince live, that we hear no more of him, till above forty-two years after, when having engaged in the war against the Romans, he was taken by Pompey, and sent prisoner to Rome. Alexander being a subtle and warlike prince, and Syria being then torn by civil wars between the contending brothers, Antiochus Cyzicus and *Antiochus Gryphus, and therefore in no capacity to oppose him, he led an army in the very first year of his reign against the city of Ptolemais; but met with worse success in that siege than any of his predecessors had done, being forced to raise it to succour his own territories, which were invaded by Ptolemy Latyrus, who took from him the city of Azochis in Galilee, and carried off ten thousand captives, and gave him soon after a dreadful overthrow near the banks of the Jordan, as we have seen in a former chapter†. This defeat, in which he lost thirty thousand men, besides those that were taken prisoners, and which was a just reward for his treachery to that prince, would infallibly have opened a way for the latter into Judæa, Alexander being now in no condition to have stopped his progress; had not Cleopatra come to his assistance. It was indeed that princess's interest not to let Latyrus grow too great, and be thereby enabled to come and wrest the crown from her; but there was another spring that moved her to what she did. The Jews of Alexandria were highly in her favour, and Chelkias and Ananias, two of the most considerable, being the sons of Onias the high-priest, who built the Jewish temple at Alexandria, were at the head of affairs: and these could not behold Judæa in such imminent danger from an exasperated enemy, without using all their interest with that queen to prevent it. We shall not repeat what has been said in a former chapter concerning the success of her arms against that competitor. Alexander reaped so far the benefit of it, that it obliged Latyrus to set aside the invasion of Palestine for some time; and Cleopatra being come to Ptolemais, which had surrendered to her, the Jewish monarch came to acknowledge her favour to him by presents suitable to her dignity. He was received outwardly like a prince in distress, and who had no other refuge than her friendship; but that which ingratiated him most to that politic princess was, his being an enemy to her son Latyrus, who was by that time returned into Palestine, and had taken his winter quarters at Gaza.

DURING Alexander's stay with Cleopatra, some of her friends advised her to take so favourable an opportunity to make herself mistress of Judæa; which would at once increase her dominions and strength, and give her a superiority over her competitor. But Ananias the Jew lately mentioned, who was one of her head generals, dissuaded her from such an attempt, alledging that it would be very ungenerous and unjust to dispossess of his dominions, an ally, who was come to implore her friendship and assistance; that it would lessen her character in the eyes of the world, and above all, make her detested by all the Jews. These reasons, joined to the influence which that general, who was Alexander's kinsman, had over her, did not only divert her from her design, but procured an alliance between them, which was concluded in the city of Scythopolis; after which Alexander returned to Jerusalem, where being now pretty secure of any danger from Latyrus, he recruited his broken army, and crossing the Jordan, went to besiege Gadara, and took it at the end of ten months. From thence he marched to Amathus, another strong fortress on that side the river, into which Theodotus the son of Zeno, tyrant of Philadelpia, had laid up an immense treasure; and took it in a much shorter time than he had that of Gadara; and with it all

(D) Aristobulus had so far ingratiated himself to the Greeks, of whom he was excessive fond, that they were great admirers of him; and Josephus quotes one of their authors (21), who gives him the a Apolodotus's treasure. But he did not keep it long; that prince having got together a numerous army, fell suddenly upon him, as he was returning from the siege, killed him ten thousand men, routed the rest, recovered all his wealth, seized on Alexander's baggage, and carried off a considerable plunder from his men¹. This defeat however did not discourage Alexander from pursuing his warlike views, only it afforded great matter of triumph to the pharisees, his implacable enemies, who took occasion from thence to vilify him to the people, and to use all possible means to make his crown sit uneasy on him.

As soon as Alexander had recruited his army, he stayed not in Jerusalem to quell the pharisaic faction, but left them to make the most of his late disgrace, whilst he went to vent his resentment on the treacherous Gazeans, who by inviting Latbyrus against him, and furnishing him with auxiliaries, had been the cause of his late overthrow. He immediately besieged the towns of Raphia and Anthedon, since called Agrippias by Herod: these two places stood at a few miles distance from Gaza, by which means having in some measure blocked up this last, he on the next year set about besieging it, with a powerful army. The city being then under the command of Apolodotus, a man of great valour and conduct, made a stout defence against him one whole year, and in one fall were like to have routed him and his army; and much longer it might have held out in all likelihood, had not the brave governor been treacherously murdered by his own brother Lyfimachus, and the place betrayed by him to the besiegers. Alexander upon his entering it made great show of clemency to the Gazeans, but soon betrayed his rancour and cruelty against them, by abandoning them to the fury of his men; who thereupon made such horrid slaughter of them, as was like to have proved a dear revenge to him; for the Gazeans standing desperately on their own defence, killed him almost as many of his men as he did of theirs. Having at last glutted himself with the blood of those unfortunate wretches, he vented the rest of his resentment on that great and ancient city, by reducing it into a heap of ruins; after which he returned with his army to *Jerusalem*². The fourth book of Maccabees adds³, that he took afterwards the cities of Emath and Tyre, but Josephus says nothing of it.

d But whilst he had been abroad with his army, the pharisees, who, as we hinted before, bore a mortal hatred to him and his whole family, had taken such means to exasperate the people against him by evil surmises and slanders, which they privately instilled into them, that it broke out at last into an open affront, which came little short of a rebellion. They chose the feast of tabernacles, on which solemnity they go to the temple with palm and other branches in their hands, especially that of a kind of citron, which they call attrog, with the fruit upon it (E); and when he was performing the priestly office at the great altar, probably on the last day of that solemnity, they pelted him, not only with those attrogs, but with the most injurious reflections, and opprobrious language, crying aloud, that such a slave as he (F) was unworthy of either the pontifical or regal dignity. This insolence, which seemed the

(E) This attrog, which the Jews imagine to have been the forbidden fruit, which our first parents eat in paradise, very much resembles a citron or lemon, except that it has on the rind some unevenness, (such as we observe sometimes in the Seville orange) and which they fondly believe to have been originally impressed upon it by Eve's planting her teeth upon it, from which time they think that fruit has retained the print of it on both sides.

Where-ever therefore it is to be had, they carry it during this festival in their hands to the synagogues, as they did then to the temple, and are very curious in the choice of such only as best represent that fatal bite; and as our Jews here, and in Holland, Germany, &c. are forced to have it from some parts of Greece, none but the richer sort are able to purchase it; and it sometimes happens, either through contrary wind, ships being taken, or cast away, that there is such a scarcity of them, that the price of them advances to a guinea a sprig. Those who are curious enough may see them on that festival in their synagogues, it seldom or never happening but some quantity is brought over against that time. But when it doth, they are forced to substitute some other odoriferous tree instead of it; but the poorer sort content themselves with branches of willows.

On the seventh day, which closes the festival, they break their branches, or throw them away; and we suppose it was on this day that the mutinous crowd did pelt the high-priest with those attrogs, they being so common at that time in Palestine, that the meanest people might purchase them.

(F) By calling him a slave, it is plain, they harped upon that scandalous suggestion of Elazar mentioned in a late note, of his mother having been a slave. But the true foundation of the pharisaic grudge was his treading in his father's steps, not only in caressing the opposite sect, but in continuing the penal laws against those who should observe the traditions and customs introduced by the pharisees. This was such a crime against them, that nothing but his blood could expiate, and they did not scruple to tell him so soon after, as we shall see in the sequel.

fore-runner of something worse, did so exasperate the pontiff, that suspending his office for a while, he ordered his soldiers to fall upon the mutinous mob; which they did with such speed and fury, that they killed six thousand of them, and dispersed the rest¹. As soon as the tumult was quelled, he caused the court of the priests to be inclosed with a wooden wall, to prevent such insults being offered to him for the future, and at the same time provided for his further safety, by taking into his pay six thousand auxiliaries out of Pisidia and Cilicia, being afraid to trust his person any longer to the guard of those of his exasperated nation, who, as he found now to his great grief, were not to be quelled by the greatest severities, nor mollified by the greatest lenitives. So that being quite wearied out with their continual clamours, he marched out of Jerusalem at the head of his army, crossed the Jordan, and went and destroyed the city of Amathus, without meeting with any opposition from Theodotus, who contented himself with carrying off his treasure and garrison, leaving the city to his mercy; so dreadful was become the name of Alexander by this time to all the nations round about. From thence he marched against the Arabians, whom he subdued; after which he laid the Moabites and the mountaineers of the land of Gilead under tribute. Soon after this, as he was carrying on the war against Obedus king of the Arabians, he fell into an ambush near Gadara, where he was forced by a large drove of camels into a streight so narrow and craggy, that it was with the greatest difficulty that he escaped, and regained his own metropolis (G). Here he found, to his great mortification, that the news of this last defeat, had not only reached the place, but had given a new life to his enemies, who began to exclaim louder than ever against him. His endeavours to quell them, as he had done before, did now but increase the tumult, till it broke out into an open insurrection against him. He was however too wise and brave to be either surpris'd or terrified by it, but quickly gathered a number of forces to make head against them. A civil war immediately ensued, which lasted six whole years, during which above fifty thousand of the rebels lost their lives, besides those he lost on his own side (H), and the innumerable calamities it brought on the Jewish nation.

Alexander however, though he still got the better of them, was so weary with destroying both his people and country, that he spared no means, no offers or promises, to bring matters to a pacification. But as he had to do with a crew of rebels, and they of the pharisaic leaven, every advance he made did but harden them the more. At length being resolved, if possible, to bring them to a better mind, he sent some of his friends to know what would satisfy them, promising to grant them whatever they should in reason and justice demand. To this they unanimously cried out, that he must cut his own throat, telling him at the same time, that he ought to think highly of them, if they thought his death a sufficient recompense for the blood he had shed, and the mischiefs he had brought upon his nation². This answer made him lose all hopes of an accommodation, and look out for some more effectual means to suppress their horrid insolence, whilst they on the other hand sent to Damascus, to beg of Demetrius, surnamed Eucharus, to come to their assistance³.

Demetrius came accordingly into Judaea with an army of three thousand horse, and forty thousand foot, who were partly Jews, and partly Syrians; and Alexander came against him with another, consisting of six thousand Greek auxiliaries, and twenty thousand Jews; each of them tried for some time to gain over the troops of his competitor, Demetrius to debauch the Greek auxiliaries to forsake the Jewish king, and this latter to bring over those Jews that were in the Syrian army. But all their efforts proving vain, they came at length to a decisive battle, in which Alexander was de-

(G) Josephus mentions these wars so confusedly, that it is impossible to guess at what time they happened, or how long they lasted. It seems as if he had lumped them thus together at the sag end of a chapter (22), to shew his readers what a war-like prince Alexander was, and that his neighbours led but a weary life during his reign. Perhaps it would have been better for him to have continued them longer, since his return to Jerusalem proved the cause of fresh tumults, which ended at last in an open rebellion.

(H) The fourth book of the Maccabees tells us, that this intestine war was between the pharisees and sadducees; and that Alexander having declared himself against the former, had put fifty thousand of them to death, within the space of these six years; which did so exasperate the rest of them, that they would hearken to no accommodation, but sent to invite Demetrius king of Syria to come to their assistance against him (23).

- a. seated, and forced to flee to the mountains for shelter, with the small number of men that stuck close to him. This is the account which Josephus gives us of this action, wherein he again clashes with the fourth book of Maccabees, which makes the advantage to have been vastly on Alexander's side, as the reader may see in the margin (I). But be that as it will, the former tells us that he was reduced by this defeat to such a low ebb, that he seemed irrecoverably lost, when an unexpected accident turned again the balance on his side. Those Jewish troops, whom he could not with all his art, and fair promises, withdraw from the enemies army, before the battle was fought, were now, upon his losing it, taken with such a fit of compassion, that they came all over to him; so that Demetrius, fearing lest the defection should still increase, left Judæa, and marched against his brother Philip. This retreat gave Alexander an opportunity of getting his army together, with which he marched against the rebellious Jews, and beat them in every engagement he had against them; though without being able to bring them to submission, or in the least abate the fury of their resentment against him, till a decisive battle put an end to the war. In this last action Alexander cut off the greater part of their army, and drove the rest, at least the chief of them, to Bethome, where he closely besieged them, and on the next year made himself master of the place; and here it was that he began to let loose the reins of his fury against them, in such barbarous manner, as can hardly be read without horror, if our historian has not exaggerated the matter. He caused eight hundred of the principal of them to be carried to Jerusalem, and there to be all crucified in one day, and at one place; and as if this had not been punishment sufficient to appease his resentment, he caused their wives and children to be brought and butchered before their faces, whilst they were hanging each upon their cross. But what swells the account of his barbarity almost beyond all credibility, is, that he caused a banquet to be prepared for himself and his concubines, near enough to this scene of horror, from whence he might glut his eyes with their sufferings. Hence the historian adds *, that he had the name of Tracidus or Thracian given him, that nation being infamous above all others for their horrid barbarities; and was indeed a name rather too good for him, if he was really guilty of all these cruelties.
- d. AFTER this dreadful havock the rebels did quite disperse themselves, and eight thousand of them disappeared on the very night following, and never more molested him during the remainder of his reign, so that from that time forth the pharisaic faction never dared to lift up their heads as long as he lived. Soon after this, the king of Syria intending to invade the territories of Arabia Petrea, marched his army through part of Judæa, which was the only passage he could have to come thither. Alexander, who suspected him to have some design against him, endeavoured in vain to obstruct him, by drawing a deep trench twenty miles long, that is, from the town of Capfersaba, now Antipatris, quite to the sea of Joppa, and fortifying it with wooden towers at convenient distances. Antiochus forced his way through them, and penetrated into Arabia, where he lost his life, as we have seen elsewhere *; and Alexander being rid of that fear, marched his army over Jordan, to recover some of those places in Arabia, and the lands of Moab and Gilead, which he had formerly taken, but had been forced to surrender during the civil wars, to prevent the Arabian king's supporting his rebellious subjects. This brought Aretas, now king both of Arabia and Cele Syria, into Judæa, where he defeated Alexander; but having soon after made a treaty with him, he retired with his forces, and left him to pursue his other conquests. Alexander accordingly marched against the city of Dion, and took it by assault †. Pella was taken next ‡,

(I) This author tells us (24), that Alexander defeated the Syrian king, and pursued him quite to Antioch, where he kept him besieged three whole years; that at length Demetrius, having ventured out with his army against him, was killed; and that Alexander after this second victory came back to Jerusalem, where he was well received by the people; that he went afterwards and subdued the Idumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, and Arabian mountaineers; but all this seems exaggerated, and Josephus's account perhaps more justly preferred to it, who is seldom less liable to suspicion, than when he speaks against his own nation. Yet it must be remembered here, that Josephus was a zealous pharisee, and Alexander an inveterate enemy to, not to say in some measure a persecutor of, that old sect; and how far this consideration may have lowered the pharisaic leaven in that historian, and have made him represent that prince as less successful than he really was, and guilty of such cruelties as he was a stranger to, may be easily guessed.

after which he went and besieged Essa, alias Gerasa, into which Theodotus had secured all his treasure; and having built a treble wall about it, took it by storm, and carried off all the rich plunder he found in it. The inhabitants of Pella having refused to be circumcised, he forced them, according to the custom of the Asmonean princes, to leave the country, and their city was demolished. Alexander marched from thence and took Gaulana, Seleucia, the valley of Antiochus, and Gamala, and stripped Demetrius, who commanded in those places, of his principality, because he had been guilty of some foul crimes and malversations. This expedition took him up three whole years, after which he returned triumphant to Jerusalem, and brought Demetrius prisoner with him thither, where his late conquests gained him the loud acclamations of his subjects. But giving himself from thenceforward to drinking, and other debaucheries, he was seized with an obstinate quartan ague, which stuck to him till the day of his death, which happened about three years after. All this while, neither his distemper, nor his pleasures, which he still pursued, could alleviate his invincible thirst after conquests (K). Perhaps also was he in hopes to overcome the one by the other; but it happened quite otherwise, and his strength being quite exhausted by fatigues and debauch, he died in his camp before Ragaba, a fortress in the territories of the Geraseni beyond Jordan, which he was then besieging, in the twenty-seventh year of his reign.

He left two sons at his death, Hyrceanus and Aristobulus, but bequeathed the government of the kingdom to his wife Alexandra, during her life, and then to which of her two sons she should think fit to leave it. The queen, who was then with him at the siege, seeing him to be past recovery, addressed herself to him, all in tears; and in a most pathetic speech, represented to him the extreme danger she and her children were going to be exposed to, from the inveterate grudge which the pharisaic faction did still bear to him, and to all that belonged to him; and who being the idol of the people, would not fail to make her feel the effects of their bitterest rancour, by raising up new seditions against her, as they had formerly done against him, and perhaps to the total extirpation of his race. As her fears were but too well grounded, they could not but awake those of her dying husband, who, luckily for her, happened to have still presence of mind enough to bethink himself of an expedient, which would effectually put her out of all danger from that revengeful sect. Having therefore thought some time upon it, he spoke to her to this effect: "You know, said he, but too well the cause of our mutual enmity; and since your security and happiness must rise or fall, according as you make them your friends, or your foes, when I am dead, be sure to conceal the secret from my army, till they have taken the fort; and then lead them triumphant to Jerusalem, carry my body along with you, and as soon as you are come thither, send for the principal leaders of that factious sect, and lay it before them, and tell them that you wholly submit it to them, either to give it a burial, or to throw it in the high-way, for the injuries I have done them. Assure them at the same time, that as to you, you are so intirely devoted to them, that you design to place them again at the head of affairs, and that you will do nothing without their advice and consent. Give them immediately some marks of your favour and friendship, and then you need not doubt, but they will not only extol me to the skies, and give me a royal burial, but will likewise support you, and my sons after you, in the peaceful enjoyment of your kingdom". He just lived to give her this salutary counsel, and then expired in the forty-ninth year of his age.

Alexandra

- a Alexandra was too wise not to follow his injunctions, if they were really his, and not a pretence trumped up by that politic prince. However, it had the desired effect; and the pharisees, glad to see themselves again at the head of affairs, were beyond measure lavish of their praises and honours to the deceased king. They extolled him for a great conqueror and patriot, they bestowed a magnificent funeral on him, and applauded above all his wisdom in bequeathing the government to his queen. He did certainly right in that, seeing his eldest son Hyrchanus, who was then about thirty years of age, was a prince of a sluggish disposition, without ambition or spirit. Him therefore the queen thought fit to nominate to succeed his father in the pontifical function, not so much out of respect to his primogeniture, as because he was less likely to interfere with the affairs of state than the younger brother; who being of a more enterprising genius, was for that very reason secluded; and confined to a private life. But though she had so carefully secured her prerogative from any attempt from her two sons, yet was she far enough from enjoying it so absolutely and quietly as she expected. For the pharisees, as they grew more and more powerful, grew also more and more insolent and untractable, insomuch that the fear of their raising a new rebellion forced her to consent to many of their demands, much against her will; as well as her interest.

- c THE first thing they obtained of her was a total revocation of all the edicts which Hyrchan the first, and the late king, had made against their constitutions and traditional doctrines; the next was an amnesty for all their faction, together with the release of such of their brethren as had been confined since the late civil war, and the third was the recalling of all those who had been either banished, or forced to fly the country, since the conclusion of it, and their being readmitted into the possession of all their forfeited estates. By the first of these, the pharisaic traditions grew again into credit, by which means they became more and more numerous; and that sect being at full liberty to impose them on the people at their pleasure, they not only became an intolerable burden to the people, but by degrees quite obliterated the written word, of which they were pretended to be the true sense and explanation; and by the other two decrees, they so increased and strengthened their party, that the queen was now afraid to deny them any thing; whereby they became still more exorbitant in their demands, till they let her see plainly that they designed to leave her only the name of sovereignty, and the power to command her subjects to obey them. She retained indeed six thousand auxiliary troops in her pay, by which she kept at least her neighbours, and conquered provinces in awe, and received from time to time fresh hostages from them. But as the pharisaic crew looked upon this as the effects of their friendship to her, they claimed all the merit of her peaceful reign to themselves, and soon gave her to understand that nothing less than the total extirpation of the Sadducees, who were the only ones that stuck close to the late king, should purchase the continuance of their friendship and assistance. They began with insisting upon her punishing all those who had counselled him to crucify the eight hundred rebels lately mentioned, with immediate death. Accordingly Diogenes, one of the chiefs of the Sadducees, and a confidant of Alexander, was presently dispatched, and after him a great many others, against whom they laid the same accusation, right or wrong, that is, against as many of that sect, as they thought had been too attached to that monarch's service d.

- f THESE prosecutions were continued several years, though much against the queen's mind, who could not but feel some lively remorse to see so many of her husband's most zealous friends daily butchered; but the pharisees still insisting, that to put a stop to these severities, would be to stop the course of justice, contrary to the laws of God, and the security of every good government; the fear of a new insurrection, the dreadful effects of which she had so lately felt, made her still look upon those executions as the lesser evil of the two. At length some of the most considerable persons of that persecuted party, having got young Aristobulus at their head, came to the royal palace, to beseech the queen that she would put an end to their misery. They reminded her of their great services and invincible loyalty to her late husband, and that it was in consideration of it that he had bestowed on them those marks of his favour and esteem, which exposed them now to the fury of their enemies. They conjured her not to suffer the late king's best and most loyal friends to be thus daily sacrificed to the rancour of his ambitious and bitterest enemies, in a time especially of a profound peace, and under her government, who had been a witness of all the difficulties and hardships they had suffered with and for him. They concluded with their earnest prayer, that if she could not suppress the pharisaic rage against them, she would at least give them the liberty of sheltering themselves from it, either by retiring into some foreign countries, or by her placing them in such of her garisons, where they might be out of the reach of their enemies. Aristobulus at the same time backed their petition in such manner, as sufficiently shewed his disgust to such cruel proceedings. The queen, though doubtless highly affected with their distress, dared not grant the first part of their petition for fear of exasperating the pharisees. To grant them the second, that is, to permit them to depart the kingdom, was in fact depriving herself of so many faithful subjects, whose friendship might one time or other be of service to suppress the arrogance of that tyrannic sect. Upon mature deliberation therefore, she agreed to the last expedient proposed, of placing them in the several garisons of her kingdom, whence she might at any time fetch them when occasion served, and where they might be either safe from their enemies, or at least in a condition to stand in their own defence. She excepted however those of Hyrkania, Alexandria and Macheron, in which she had deposited her most valuable treasure, lest by shewing too great a confidence in them, she should give umbrage to their enemies the pharisees (L). How she took her son's intercession on their behalf, our historian doth not tell us; but intimates, that she sent him soon after with an army into Syria against Ptolemy Meneus, who infested all the neighbouring countries, and that he returned soon after without effecting any thing worth notice *.

ABOUT the same time news came to her, that Tigranes king of Armenia was come into Syria with an army of fifty thousand men, and had besieged Ptolemais, and that his design was to march from thence into Judaea. This news threw the whole kingdom into the greatest consternation, it not being in a condition to make head against such a powerful invader. She therefore hastened some ambassadors, laden with the richest presents, to beseech him to spare her dominions, and to grant her his friendship.

(L) The fourth book of the Maccabees (25) takes no notice of their being sent into garisons; but only tells us, that she gave them liberty to retire into what cities of Judaea they pleased; and that the Essenians, no less hated by the pharisees, joined themselves to them.

In this year our learned Usher observes (26) was born Herod, since king of Judaea, of whom we shall have a great deal to speak in the sequel; for he was twenty-five years old when he was made governor of Galilee in the year before Christ 47.

Concerning his father Antipas, or, as he grecified his name, Antipater, authors have given us various accounts, according as they were well or ill affected towards his son. Thus N. Damascen, who had received great obligations from him, and published his history in Herod's life, derives his pedigree from one of the principal Jews that returned from the Babylonish captivity; for which flagrant flattery Josephus, who must have been better informed, doth sharply reprove him, and assures us (27), that Antipater was of a noble Idumean family, and had been made governor of Idumea by Alexander Jannæus, and continued so under his queen Alexandra; so that according to this last historian, he was of Idumean race, but by religion a Jew, the Idumeans having long since been proselyted, and incorporated into the Jewish church and state, as we have seen before.

But a modern jesuit (28), who has pretended to prove Josephus's history to be a mere forgery, makes Herod to have been an Athenian; his proofs are, that he is called in some medals a benefactor to Athens, and that there actually was one of his name in that city in Caesar's time. He has advanced several other singularities concerning that prince, which we may have occasion to mention, when we come to speak of his reign.

But none have more debased his origin than Julius Africanus, who in his letter to Aristides mentioned by Eusebius (29), makes Antipater to have been the son of one Herod an Ascalonite, who was vestry-keeper of Apollo's temple in that city; and withal so poor, that when his son (this our great Herod) was taken prisoner by some Idumean robbers, he was not able to redeem him, so that he was brought up among those banditti, who were however of the Jewish religion; and this notion, it seems, was readily adopted by several of the fathers (30).

One thing seems beyond contradiction, namely, that one of the main causes of the invincible hatred which the whole Jewish nation bore against that prince, in spite of all his grandeur, generosity, and munificence, was his not being of Jewish extract; so that what Damascen, and after him the Arabic history, printed at the end of the Paris polyglot, affirm of his noble descent, from a Jewish stock, must be false and groundless.

His opposite pedigree from a sexton of Apollo's temple, is at best founded on a tradition, attributed to Christ's kinsmen, according to the flesh, without the least authority, and seems to be trumped up to debase the whole Herodian family, which was universally hated; and can consequently never outweigh the testimony of Josephus, who wanted neither means nor inclination to inform himself of his genealogy, and whose authority is still universally received in spite of all the cavils which the jesuit above-quoted has raised against it.

- a Both presents and embassy were received with marks of the sincerest kindness and affection, not so much out of regard to that prince's, as to his own affairs, which had by this time taken a different turn; his territories being now threatened with an invasion from the Romans, who had already penetrated into Pontus and Cappadocia, where Lucullus was then ravaging all that country. So that he was forced to go and defend his own territories, instead of invading those of his neighbours^t.

- THE queen was scarcely rid of this danger before she fell into new ones. A fit of ^{The queen's} sickness, which seized her about this time, dangerous in its nature, and much more so ^{sickness,} on account of her great age, made her youngest son believe that her death was near at hand, and that it was therefore high time for him to think of securing the crown for himself, which his elder brother was unfit for. To this end he went out of Jerusalem one night accompanied by one single confident, with a design to go and bring over to his interest those friends of his father, who had the custody of the several fortifications, of which we have lately spoken. This secret he intrusted with none but his own wife, whom he left behind with her children, till he came to the castle of Agaba, where Gabestus, one of his father's chief confidants, who commanded there, received him with no small joy. He immediately declared to him the design of his coming, and the reasons he had to fear, lest, if his mother died before he had made sure of the crown, not only he and his whole family, but all their friends in general should again fall under the tyranny of the pharisaic sect, through the indolence and stupidity of his elder brother, who would doubtless suffer himself to be wholly governed by them. As his fears were but too well grounded, he easily gained Gabestus, whose example ^{Aristobulus} was soon followed by all the governors of the other fortresses, who all declared for ^{seizes the} him. The queen missed her son from the first night, but did not suspect him of any design, till the alarmed pharisees brought her word that these fortresses were gone over to his interest, by which means he had got in some measure the whole strength of the kingdom into his hands. As to the army, and even the people who were heretofore so ready to idolize their sect, they were sensible they had used them of late with such severity and insolence, that instead of expecting any support from them, they had great reason to fear they would upon the very first occasion go over to Aristobulus, and embrace the milder government of the Sadducees ².

- THEY had brought *Hyrca*n with them to the queen, when they came to acquaint her with the dismal situation of their affairs, and both he and they were very pressing with her to advise them what to do in such a dangerous case. The queen, who found herself a dying, had just strength enough to tell them that her condition would not now permit her to think of their safety, and that she left it wholly to them to see to it themselves. She added, that they wanted neither soldiers, arms, nor money to make head against her other son, and that she appointed *Hyrca*n her successor. She expired immediately after, in the seventy-third year of her age, and the ninth of her reign, to the inexpressible grief of the pharisaic faction, who now could ^{The queen's} expect nothing else but a severe retaliation for all their cruelties to the late king's ^{death.} friends; but to the great joy of all the rest of the kingdom, who now hoped to see an effectual end put to the pharisaic tyranny, by her brave son Aristobulus (M).

(M) This defection from *Hyrca*n, whom she had nominated her successor, to her younger son, who was in some measure in open rebellion against her, did not proceed from any disrespect the people had for her; for she appears to have been a princess of great wisdom and conduct; and could she have suppressed the pharisaic tyranny, would have left an unblemished character behind her; and even this circumstance of her giving too much way to it, appears to have been rather her misfortune than her fault.

Some authors (31) have absurdly confounded this queen with Salome the wife and afterwards the widow of Aristobulus, the elder brother of the late Alexander, and who, as we observed a little higher, out of Josephus, was also called Alexandra; so that they have supposed her to have been the same person, and that being left a widow, Alexander the next brother had been obliged, according to the Mosaic law, to marry her, and to raise up seed to his brother.

But this has been fully confuted by our learned Prideaux in the place above quoted, since *Hyrca*n, who is every-where allowed to have been the son of Alexander, is there proved to have been five years old before Aristobulus died, for *Hyrca*n being according to Josephus above eighty years of age when he died, which happened in the year before Christ 30, eighty-one years will carry us back to the year before Christ 111, whereas Aristobulus did not die till the year 106.

WHILST therefore the hopes of such a happy change brought daily both army^a and people over to him, the pharisees found no other expedient to provide for their own safety, than seizing on his wife and children, and confining them in the castle of Baris, to be kept there as hostages against him; but when they found that this did not stop his progress, but that he took the royal title and state upon him, and daily gained strength, they raised an army against him; and Aristobulus, who desired nothing more than a decisive battle, well knowing the valour and fidelity of his army, and that he had little to fear from that of his brother, soon gave him an opportunity of joining issue with him. A battle was accordingly fought near Jericho, in which most of *Hyrca*n's forces went over to his brother, so that he had no way left but to retire to Jerusalem, and to shut himself up in the same castle, where they had^b confined Aristobulus's wife and children. The few forces that stuck by him followed his example, and took sanctuary within the verge of the temple, where they had not been long ere they came over to his victorious brother. Things being brought to this desperate state, *Hyrca*n was glad to accept of a peace upon any terms; and Aristobulus granted it to him, upon condition that he divested himself of his regal and pontifical dignity, and wholly resigned them to him, and contented himself with a private life, with the enjoyment of his private fortunes. *Hyrca*n, who, as we have observed more than once, was a man without ambition or spirit, made no difficulty to yield to those conditions, and to divest himself of a government he could keep no longer, after a three months troublesome possession of it (N)^c.

THIS deposition did not however hinder *Hyrca*n's retaining still a powerful party, which consisting chiefly of pharisees, who had nothing to hope for, but a great deal to fear from his successful brother, were still busily plotting to raise up their old idol over him. This was gladly observed by Antipater the father of Herod, whose nation and pedigree we have spoken of in a late note. This person, though in all likelihood indifferent as to the distinction between pharisee and sadducee, being as we there observed, an Idumean proselyte, was in as great danger of feeling the resentments of Aristobulus, as any of the former sect. His peculiar skill and address, backed by

(N) So says the text in Josephus; but our excellent Usher has clearly shewn from the six years which elapsed between the consulate of Q. Hortensius and Q. Metellus, in which *Hyrca*n began his reign, and that of C. Antonius, and M. T. Cicero, in which his brother Aristobulus was deposed by Pompey, that there must be an error crept into Josephus, who allows but three months reign to the former, and three years and six months to the latter.

But the learned prelate has not so well succeeded in correcting that mistake, by supposing that *Hyrca*n reigned three years and three months (32), and that the former of the two numbers had been dropped by the carelessness of the transcribers; but this seems quite contrary to the tenor of Josephus, who makes his reign and deposition to have followed much closer than this supposition will admit of.

Another great antiquary (33) has taken a different way to solve the difficulty, by supposing that *Hyrca*n was divested of his regal dignity after the first three months; but that he preserved the high-priesthood three years longer, that is, till his flight to Aretas, of which we shall speak by-and-by; and that the three years and six months allowed to his brother by the Jewish historian, are to be reckoned only from the time that he assumed the pontifical dignity. But this is again contradicted by Josephus, who makes Aristobulus to have divested his brother of both dignities, and to have taken them upon himself at one and the same time, and *Hyrca*n to have been reduced to a private state.

Dean Prideaux, in the place above quoted, supposes therefore, that the original had six years and six months, it being more reasonable that a numerical letter should be changed by the carelessness of the scribe, than a whole word, that is, that he should mistake a three for a six, rather than a month for a year, as in the supposition of archbishop Usher.

From the objection that Josephus in another place (34) gives him but three years reign, and that not in numerical letters, but in words at length, which might be therefore looked upon as a confirmation of the former; the same judicious author rather confirms his own hypothesis in as clear a manner as the subject can admit of. To give his answer at length would swell this note too much; we shall therefore content ourselves with hinting at the main stress of his argument.

He observes, that this last place has three years, and the same number of months, whereas the former has three years and six months; from whence he supposes, that some critic, finding this difference between those two places, and not suspecting this last to have been corrupted, that is, three to have been put instead of six years, has altered the other place according to it, in order to reconcile the Jewish historian; and so instead of six years, and just as many months, as he found it written, he made it three years, and as many months, as he found it corrupted in the other place.

This supposition, which cannot but appear very probable to those who are acquainted with manuscripts, and with the inadvertency of transcribers, as well as the boldness of critics in correcting them, takes away at once all the difficulties, reconciles Josephus to himself, and fills up the six years space between *Hyrca*n's reign, and Aristobulus's deposition, according to the consulates under which each of them happened according to the same historian (35).

So that when he came to see his brother on the throne, he had all the reason in the world, not only to despair of further advancement, but to dread his resentment. This determined him to join with the discontented pharisees, whom from that time he still took care to fill with fears and jealousies, from that prince, whom he styled an usurper; and who, he told them, would never think himself secure, till he had cut off his brother, and with him, all that had
- b been in his interest. By these insinuations he soon drew them into his design to dethrone him, and set up his brother again; but his great difficulty was to prevail upon Hyrcau to join with them. That prince being of an easy and indolent disposition, could not be persuaded that his brother would attempt any thing against his life; neither had he any ambition to recover his lost dignities, or, if he had, it was easily cooled by the danger of attempting it, which he viewed in the most dismal light. When therefore Antipater perceived that fear was his predominant passion, he raised such a battery against it, by repeated assurances that his life was in manifest danger, and that he must resolve either to reign or die; that the weak prince was at length wrought upon to seek for safety and assistance from Aretas king of Arabia.
- c As soon as he had gained his consent, he offered himself to go and negotiate that affair; which he did with such privacy and dispatch, that he came back very soon after, took Hyrcau with him in the night, and by long journeys brought him to Petra, the metropolis of Arabia, where he presented him to the king. It is likely that Antipater, at his first interview with Aretas, had only engaged him to protect Hyrcau against his brother; but now they were both at his court, he began to open to him the other part of his design, and to convince him how much it would be his interest to assist him in the recovery of his kingdom, by assuring him that he should have all the places restored to him, which had been heretofore taken from him by the Jewish kings, which were very considerable (O), and which he must never hope
- d to recover, as long as Aristobulus was on the throne. He told him moreover, that Hyrcau had such a powerful party in Judæa, ready to join with his forces, that he looked upon the dethroning of the usurper as a very easy task. Hyrcau was easily persuaded to confirm all his minister had said, and to ratify all the engagements he had made to the Arabian king, who came soon after with them into Judæa, at the head of an army of five thousand men, where he was joined by those of Hyrcau's party. Aristobulus marched against him, and an obstinate fight ensued, in which he was totally defeated, and forced to flee into Jerusalem. Aretas pursued him thither, and entered that metropolis without opposition, drove him and his few men, most of them priests, into the precinct of the temple, and there closely besieged him,
- e whilst the rest of the people declared for the conqueror.

THE temple being thus besieged, and the approaching feast of the passover thereby likely to be wholly obstructed, many of the chief of the Jews retired into Egypt to celebrate it there. On the other hand, the besieged having neither lambs nor other victims for the sacrifices of that solemnity, Aristobulus applied himself to the besiegers to supply them with a competent number of them; which those at first promised, upon condition that they payed them a thousand drachms of silver for every head, and had the money delivered before-hand. But when the sum stipulated was let down to them by a rope from the top of the wall, they refused to send the victims; upon which the priests went to the altar, and instead of them, offered up their prayers

f to God, that he would speedily punish their perfidious contempt of his religion. To this guilt the besiegers added another, neither of which went long unpunished.

THERE was at that time in Jerusalem one Onias, a man in high esteem for his sanctity; and who was thought to have saved the land from a famine, by obtaining from heaven a comfortable rain, after a long and grievous drought. This good man seeing his unhappy country involved in a civil war, had retired into some of the neighbouring defarts, and hid himself there. Him they found out, and brought by main force ^a to the siege, and would have obliged him to curse Aristobulus and his adherents. He resisted a long time, till constrained at length by their threats, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and addrest it in words to this effect : O Lord God, sovereign Governor of the world, since these that besiege thy temple are thy people, and those that are besieged in it are thy priests, I beseech thee to bear the prayers of neither side. He had scarce pronounced these words, before the exasperated multitude let fly on him such volleys of stones as put an end to his life. This double crime brought a double punishment very speedily upon them : a vehement stormy wind did shortly after destroy all their fruit and grain, infomuch that a measure of wheat sold for eleven drachms, and other provisions in proportion ⁱ. But the most dreadful of all was, their falling ^b presently after under the yoke of the Romans ; a yoke which they never more could shake off, but groaned under the severe weight of it, till the utter destruction of their city and temple, and their total disperſion throughout the world, as will be seen in the next sections.

SECT. IV.

The history of the Jews from their being subdued by the Romans to the reign of Herod the Great.

The Romans invited by Aristobulus. Year of the flood 2934. Year before Christ 65.

ARISTOBULUS being thus straitly besieged by the Arabian king, and forsaken by all his party, was forced to have recourse to the Romans ; for Pompey having by this time overcome Tigranes, was retired into the Lesser Armenia, and from thence had dispatched Gabinus into Judæa ; and this last having received three hundred talents from Aristobulus, was gone back without acting for or against him. Scaurus came next from Syria into Judæa, and in his way was met by some ambassadors from the two contending brothers (P), each to implore his friendship and alliance, for which they offered him four hundred talents. Scaurus, who knew Aristobulus to be the more liberal, and the braver of the two, suffered himself to be gained by him ; besides, as he rightly judged, it would be the easier task to restore him, since he need but oblige Aretas to raise the siege, and depart out of Judæa, and Hyrca ^b would soon be abandoned by his party. He therefore wrote a threatening letter to Aretas, in which he told him, that if he did not forthwith withdraw his troops, he should be declared an enemy to Rome, and oblige Pompey to turn his army against him. Aretas, who had no mind to exasperate the Roman general, did readily obey, and led his army out of Judæa, Scaurus returned to Damascus, and Aristobulus being thus timely relieved, gathered up what forces he could, and pursued after the Arabian king. He overtook him and his brother Hyrca at a place called Papyrion, and gave him a great overthrow, in which he killed seven thousand of his men, and amongst them Cephalion the brother of Antipater ^a. Much about the same time Pompey being come to Damascus, received ambassadors from all the neighbouring states, especially ^c those of Judæa, Syria, and Egypt. These three last being but a kind of usurpers, were extremely desirous to bring the Romans over to their interest, and endeavoured to gain their general by most magnificent presents. Aristobulus for his part sent him a golden vine, upon a square mount, with the fruit on it, and deer, lions, and other beasts about it, all of the same precious metal. This curious piece had been formerly made by Alexander Jannæus, and was now sent by his son to Pompey, who conveyed it to Rome, where it was deposited in the temple of Jupiter, in the capitol. Strabo tells us ^b, that he saw it there, and that it was reckoned worth five thousand talents.

(P) The fourth book of Maccabees says (37), that only Aristobulus sent presents to Scaurus, and that Hyrca omitted it, which determined the Roman general in favour of the former, and made him come to his assistance ; but that he retired as soon as he heard that Aretas had raised the siege.

(37) Cap. xxxvi.

However,

- a However, the senate not being willing to acknowledge Aristobulus for king of Judæa, caused the present to be inscribed to his father Alexander, king of the Jews.

Soon after this the two contending brothers sent a separate embassy to Pompey, on his coming into Calo-Syria, each to implore his friendship and patronage against the other; Antipater in behalf of Hyrca, and Nicodemus in behalf of Aristobulus. Both were heard with seeming equanimity, and dismissed with fair promises, and the two brothers ordered to appear in person, and to plead their causes before him, and after a full hearing, he engaged to decide the controversy as justice should direct. Unfortunately for Aristobulus, his ambassador took it into his head to complain of Scaurus and Gabinus, for having received the former four hundred, and the latter three hundred talents from his master, by which he made those two generals, who had a great influence on Pompey, to become his enemies ^c; and the fourth book of Maccabees adds, that the Roman general did accordingly promise him to decide in favour of Aristobulus, but did underhand act in favour of his brother ^d.

EARLY on the following year Pompey came again into Syria, where he deposed several petty tyrants, took several fortresses, particularly that of Lyfiad, of which Silas a Jew had made himself master, and came at length to Damascus. Here he found the two brothers, who were come to plead their cause and pretensions before him, and had brought a great number of witnesses to their respective pleas. But besides these, there came also another set of Jews, to plead against them both, alledging, ^e that their nation had been for a long time governed only by the high-priests of the God of Israel, without the regal dignity; and that, though the two brothers were of the sacerdotal race, they had governed them contrary to their ancient laws, by taking the power and title of kings, and thereby reducing the Jewish nation into a state of slavery. Hyrca spoke next, and complained, that being the elder brother, he had been unjustly deposed by Aristobulus, and by him forced into a private state, with only the income of a few paternal lands, whilst he, not contented with the revenues of the whole kingdom, committed continual depredations on his neighbours both by sea and land. For proof of all which, he brought a thousand of the principal Jews, who had been gained by Antipater, to witness what he had alledged. To this Aristobulus replied, that he had indeed turned his brother out of the government; but that it was, because he was incapable of holding of it, and not from any ambitious views of his own; that Hyrca was a person of such unactive and sluggish disposition, and so despised by the people, that he had been forced to wrest the power out of his hands, lest it should be transferred into another family. He added, that as to the royal title, it was no other than his father Alexander had bore before him. The witnesses he brought to justify his pretensions, were a numerous set of young gentlemen so sumptuously cloathed, that they rather discredited him, and seemed to have been introduced to expose his vanity more than to back his cause. However Pompey, after a full hearing of all parties, wisely deferred giving his sentence, lest Aristobulus, against whom he designed to declare, should obstruct his intended expedition against the Nabatheans, and contented himself with dismissing them with a promise, that as soon as he had subdued Arctus, he would come himself into Judæa, and there determine their controversy. Aristobulus, who looked upon this delay as an ill omen, and did not perhaps care to see Pompey in Judæa, went away in a huff, first to Delion, and thence into Judæa, without so much as taking leave of him ^e.

THIS proceeding highly offended the Roman general against him, who thereupon sent for his troops, which he had in Syria, and with those which he designed against the Arabians, and the legions which he had with him, marched strait against Judæa. Aristobulus had not been idle, but had got a good army under him, and was himself at the castle of Alexandriou, a place of no small strength (Q), when Pompey entered Judæa. As soon as this last had reached Corea, he sent for Aristobulus to come to

(Q) This fortress had been built by his father Alexander Jannæus, and was from him called Alexandriou; it was situate on a high mountain, in the very entrance into Judæa, near to the town of Corea (38), which was the first place in Judæa on the Samaritan side, and upon the road to Jericho, on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin (39). Alexandriou was afterwards the burying-place of the Jewish kings, so that, though it was demolished by the Romans, it was rebuilt by Herod, and his sons sent thither to be buried, as we shall see in the sequel.

him; who would have willingly excused himself from it, but was at length prevailed upon by those that were about him to obey the summons, and prevent thereby a war with the Roman general. He came accordingly, more than once or twice, to him, and conferred with him about the dispute between his brother and him, sparing neither compliments, promises, nor presents, to engage him on his side. Pompey as often dismissed him with a shew of friendship, and suffered him to return to his castle. At length he proposed to him that he should put all his fortresses into his hands, and send orders to all his governors to resign them to him without hesitation. It was easy then for him to see now that the Roman general was in his brother's interest, and wanted only to put it out of his power to maintain himself against him. But though he had been long before suspecting this partiality, and had taken all possible methods to secure himself against it, yet was he forced, though much against his will, to comply with the proposal, being now in that general's hands. But as soon as he was got away from him, he fled with all speed to Jerusalem, with full resolution to defeat his design ^f.

*Pompey comes

Pompey was not long in following him thither, and upon his incamping in the plain of Jericho, received the agreeable news, that Mithridates had killed himself, and that his treacherous son had seized upon the kingdom; and in such haste was the army to know it, that the general, for want of a tribunal to communicate it to them, according to custom, caused one to be raised by laying a number of saddles one upon another, from which he acquainted them with the Pontic king's death, and received their congratulations with the usual signals of joy ^e. He pursued his march on the next day towards Jerusalem, whence Aristobulus, repenting now of what he had done, came out, and went to throw himself at his feet, and to beg of him to forbear any hostilities against the Jewish nation, promising him a considerable sum of money upon that condition. The general agreed to it, and keeping him in his camp, sent Gabinus with some troops to receive the money; but he was repulsed by the garison, who shut the gates against him, and refused to perform the agreement. This disappointment so exasperated Pompey, that he ordered Aristobulus to be clapt in chains, and marched directly with his whole army against the city (R). We have had frequent occasion to speak of the strength of this place, both with respect to its excellent situation, and of its other fortifications; so that being now so well garisoned and provided, it might in all likelihood have found the Roman general work enough to have taken it by siege; but unfortunately for it, those that should have defended it, were divided into two parties; that for Aristobulus were for standing out to the last against a general, who dared to keep their king in chains; but that for Hyrcau, which were the more numerous, were on the contrary for opening the gates to him, and prevent thereby the sad effects of a siege, and destructive war. The priests declared for the former, but the generality of the people were for the latter; so that Aristobulus finding himself overpowered, was forced to retire with his men within the precinct of the temple, breaking down all the bridges between that and the city, that were over the deep valley, which parted those two places; before Pompey could be admitted into the latter. ^e

He was accordingly invited soon after, and sent Piso, one of his generals, with a number of troops, to secure the place, and the royal palace, whilst those that were in the temple were busy in fortifying every part of it that could be of service to them to hold on the siege. Pompey at first sent to them some proposals of peace, but finding them resolved to stand it out, he set himself immediately to besiege them in form. He began with inclosing the place with a strong wall, to prevent either their flight, or their receiving any help from without; Hyrcau gladly furnishing him with all necessary things to carry on the work. Battering rams and other engines of war being brought to him from Tyre, he ordered the attack to be made on the north side of ^f

(R) The fourth book of the Maccabees differs a little from Josephus, and mentions nothing of this submission of Aristobulus to the Roman general; but tells us (40), that Pompey marched directly against Jerusalem, where observing the situation of the place, the strength of its walls, towers, &c. he resolved to try to gain Aristobulus by fair means; that he invited him to come to his camp, and promised him all the safety he could desire; that he came accordingly, and promised that general to deliver up all the treasure of the temple, if he would declare for him. But that the priests having refused to ratify their king's promise, made the disappointed general lay siege to the temple.

- a the temple, which was the weakest, though inclosed with strong walls, high towers, and other fortifications, and had a large deep ditch, and a spacious valley beneath it. As for the other sides of it, they were in a manner inaccessible, after the bridges had been broken down, by reason of their cragginess and steepness. The battering engines were accordingly raised on mounds and plat-forms, and began to play in earnest against the place, and to sling large stones into it, whilst the besieged were as industrious in levelling the one, and dismounting the other, as fast as they were raised by the besiegers. The siege had already took him up three months, and might in all likelihood have lasted much longer, if not perhaps been raised, had not the besieged been seized again with their old and fatal superstition about the breach of the sabbath, which Strange superstition of the Jews.
- b hindered them from making such a defence as they had formerly, and should now have done.

- W^e have had occasion heretofore to shew how destructive that notion had been to their forefathers, and how wisely it had been condemned by the brave Maccabees; so that from their time they had made no scruple to take up arms against an offending enemy; but now they were, it seems, taken with a qualm of conscience, that though it was lawful to stand in their defence on the sabbath, when an actual assault was made upon them, it did not therefore follow that they might do any thing on that day towards preventing those preparatives which the enemy made towards such future assaults. This scruple had such an effect upon them, that they never moved a hand
- c on that day to hinder either mounds and batteries being raised, or breaches being made on their walls; which being at last perceived by the besiegers, they took the advantage of getting all things ready for an assault on that day, without throwing either stones or any missive weapons that might force them on their own defence, so that the besieged let them go on with their other works without the least opposition; and such was their zeal for the divine service of the temple, that no annoyance from the enemy could obstruct it from being performed with the same regularity and calmness, as in time of the profoundest peace. By these means the besiegers made at length so deep a breach by playing down one of their towers, which in its fall brought down a considerable part of the wall (S), that they easily mastered the place. Cornelius Fausstus, the son of Sylla, at the head of a number of troops, mounted one end of the breach,
- d Furius the other end, and Fabius in the middle. A horrid slaughter immediately ensued, in which no less than twelve thousand of the besieged were killed by the The city taken. Year of the flood 2936 Before Christ 63. Romans, besides many more, who died by their own hands; in this action the Jews of the contrary faction acted with greater fury and cruelty against them than the heathen.

- WHAT was most surprising during this horrid scene of action, was the constancy Admirable constancy of the priests. of the priests, who never intermitted one moment the divine service of the temple, but continued to offer up their usual prayers, praises, and sacrifices, with the same calmness and assiduity, as if no such slaughter had been then acting in the sacred place; and at last suffered themselves to be butchered before the altar, with as much meekness
- e and constancy, as the victims they were then offering upon it (T). Pompey, though surprised at their religious constancy, caused all the prisoners that were found to have been most zealous against him to be put to death (U), whilst a great number of the rest prevented him by a desperate exit, some throwing themselves down the deepest precipices, and others setting their apartments on fire, burnt themselves in it. These were the fruits of Aristobulus's ambition, and of the two contending brothers calling in

(S) The fourth book of the Maccabees (41) says, that some of the Jews, who were on Pompey's side, scaled the wall, and having slain all the priests that opposed them, opened the temple gates to him.

(T) It is observable that the city was taken on the very day on which the Jews were keeping a solemn fast in memory of its having been formerly taken by Nebuchadnezzar, viz. on the 28th of the month Chisleu, answering to our December, according to the learned Usher (42), who takes the third month here mentioned to have been that of the sacred year; but it is more probable to have been the third of the civil year called Thammus, answering to our June, as dean Prideaux has shewn (43).

On the same day, twenty-six years after, it was likewise taken by Solius, by which the Jews became subject to the Herodian sceptre.

(U) Among these is supposed to have been Ab-salom, the uncle and father-in-law of Aristobulus. This prince, who was a younger son of the famed John Hyrcanus, had led a private life under the protection of his brother Jannæus, without meddling with public affairs, till he unfortunately gave his daughter to Aristobulus. For this marriage having drawn him into his son-in-law's party, he was taken prisoner, and in all probability put to death. At least no further mention is made of him from that time (45).

the Romans. These new masters, who seldom, if ever, lent their assistance but with a view of enslaving, soon altered the face of the Jewish affairs, according to their usual method. Hyrcan was indeed restored to the pontifical dignity, with the specious title of prince, though from thenceforth tributary to Rome; but he was wholly divested of his regal one, and forbid to resume either the diadem, or royal style, or to extend his territory beyond the old borders of Judæa. All the cities which had been taken by his predecessors in Cælo-Syria and Phœnicia, were taken from him, and restored to Syria (W), of which province Scaurus was left governor, at the head of two Roman legions, to keep the country in awe, whilst the conqueror prepared himself to return to Rome.

BUT before he left Jerusalem, he gave the Jews a more mortifying stroke than any we have yet mentioned. We have had frequent occasion to mention how jealous they were of having their temple profaned by strangers, whom they absolutely debarred not only setting a foot into that holy place, but even casting a distant look towards it. But Pompey was above humouring them in what he looked upon as a piece of Jewish superstition. Resolved therefore to satisfy his curiosity, and to view most sacred recesses of that building, he caused them to be opened to him; and attended with a number of his chief commanders, penetrated even into the most holy place, into which the high-priest alone was permitted to enter once a year, on the grand day of expiation †. He viewed with a curious eye the golden table, candlestick, censers, lamps, and other golden vessels, the great quantity of rich perfumes and spices used in the divine worship; and in the treasury he found about two thousand talents. But whether the sacredness of the place inspired him with an uncommon respect for those costly things, which he there saw, our author tells us, that he not only forbore to touch any of them, but that he immediately ordered the priests and officers of the temple to purify it, and to offer up their sacrifices according to custom. But this moderation of his did not hinder the Jews from resenting the indignity he had offered to that holy place, more than all the mischiefs they had suffered from him, and from ascribing all the misfortunes that befel him afterwards, to this sacrilegious attempt ‡. Many christians have been of the same mind, and men are indeed too apt to judge rashly in matters of this nature; but whatever may have been the cause of that great general's misfortunes, it is plain, that this victory over the Jews was the last he ever gained, and that from this time his affairs went from bad to worse, as we shall shew when we come to the Roman history.

turns into Judæa.

Pompey having thus subdued the Jewish nation, to prevent a future revolt, pulled down the walls of Jerusalem, and left Scaurus governor with a sufficient force. He set out for Rome soon after, and took with him Aristobulus, and his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, and his two daughters with him, as captives fit to adorn his future triumph. However; they were not, it seems, so closely guarded, but Alexander found means to escape, and to return into Judæa; where he soon drew a considerable party after him, which proved the source of new and more grievous troubles.

† See before, Vol. I. p. 617, & seq.

‡ JOSEPH. antiq. l. xiv. c. 8.

(W) These were, among many others of less note, those of Hyrcan, Seythopolis, Pella, Dion, Samaria, Marissa, Azotus, Jamnia, and Arcthusa in the inland, together with Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and the tower of Straton on the sea-coasts. This last was afterwards magnificently rebuilt by Herod, and by him called Cæsarea, as shall be seen in the sequel.

Among those cities which had been destroyed during the wars, that of Gadara was rebuilt by Demetrius, a native of it, and a freed-man, and favourite of Pompey (46), of whose excessive insolence Plutarch gives us several instances in the life of that general.

(X) The fourth book of the Maccabees says (47), that Pompey restored the kingdom to Hyrcanus, and sent Aristobulus in chains to Rome. As to Alexander, he tells us, that he could not be taken, but continued hid in Judæa, till he appeared at the head of a strong party; and as for Hyrcan, though he had the title of king, yet he was to pay a yearly tribute and acknowledgment for his crown.

This expedition and success of Pompey against the Jews is also related by several heathen authors, and excepting some difference in small particulars, almost to the same purport with Josephus. Cicero highly commends the respect that general shewed to the sacred utensils of the temple (48). Livy (49), Orosius, Eutropius, Strabo, Lucan, Plutarch, Tacitus, Florus, Dio, and Appian, as well as Plutarch, have made likewise mention of it. Only Appian (50) will have it, that Pompey caused Aristobulus and Tigranes to be put to death, which is not taken notice of by any other. On the contrary, Josephus and Dio tell us, that he spared them; and accordingly we shall find in the sequel, that Aristobulus found means to return into Judæa, and to raise new troubles there.

- a As for his father and brother, they were brought to Rome, and led in triumph among the many other princes whom Pompey had conquered. What became of Aristobulus afterwards, we have mentioned in the close of the last note. Among the rich spoils which Pompey carried with him, was the golden vine we have spoken of in the last section, the worth of which is said to have amounted to five or six hundred talents, and which he dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus ¹.

- As soon as Hyrcaan found himself rid of his rival brother, he relapsed afresh into his indolence, leaving the care of his affairs to Antipater, who, like a true politician, failed not to turn it to his advantage, and the aggrandising of his family. He foresaw however that he could not easily compass his ends, unless he endeared himself to the Romans; and therefore spared neither pains nor cost to gain their favour. Scaurus was soon after beholden to him for a supply of corn, and other provision, without which his army, which he had led against the metropolis of Arabia, must have been in danger of perishing. This service was followed by another, and Antipater, who was so well known to the king of Arabia, went and prevailed on that prince to pay three hundred talents to the Roman general ², and thereby save his country from being ravaged by him (Y). It is also very probable that Antipater was the person who procured those services from Hyrcaan to the Athenians, for which Josephus tells us ³, they made that honourable act of their senate, in which the pontiff is styled a great friend and benefactor to all the Greeks, and more particularly to the Athenians, and for which they decreed him a crown of gold, and a statue of brass, to be placed in the temple of Demus (Z) and the Graces ⁴. Thus did that politic minister lay the foundations for his future grandeur, by securing the friendship of the most powerful states. Herod his son followed the same maxims, especially with regard to the Romans and Athenians, and thereby completed what his father had begun, as the sequel will soon shew.

- In the mean time Alexander having got a strong party in Judaea, and an army of ten thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, began to seize and fortify several eminent fortresses, such as those of Alexandrión and Macheron, situate near the foot of the Arabian mountains, and from them made frequent incursions into Judaea. Hyrcaan was not in a condition to suppress him; on the contrary, having endeavoured to shelter himself from him by rebuilding the walls of his metropolis, which Pompey had caused to be demolished, the Romans, always jealous of their new conquests, had forced him to desist; so that he was forced to call them to suppress this new invader. Accordingly Gabinus, who was president of Syria, and was lately come into that province, sent Marc Antony with some troops against him, whilst himself and the rest of his army were preparing to follow him. Antipater sent likewise such forces as he had raised to join the Roman general, and these being followed by a number of Jews in the Roman interest, with Pitolaus at their head, Alexander was forced to retire into the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, where a battle was soon after fought, in which he was defeated, and lost three thousand of his men, besides those that were taken prisoners. He was thence pursued to Alexandrión, where he had refuged himself, and there besieged by Gabinus; but the place being strong, and well provided, that general ordered a

(Y) The fourth book of Maccabees adds (1), that Hyrcaan and Antipater accompanied Scaurus into Arabia with some forces, and that during that time Alexander took the opportunity of seizing on Jerusalem, rebuilding its fortifications, and of raising an army, with which he overthrew the high-priest on his return from the Arabian expedition: but if he got such advantages over his uncle, he did not keep them long; for according to Josephus, we find that pontiff in Jerusalem, and Alexander only plundering the countries round about, till suppressed by Gabinus.

(Z) The original has τῷ Δῆμῳ, which some versions render Demus, as we have above, though our English one render it of the people, &c. A learned critic conjectures, that there is an error crept in Josephus, and that it probably was the temple of the Muses and Graces, or perhaps the temple of Academus, and the Graces (2). For we are told by an ancient writer (3), that there was a temple in their academy dedicated to the Muses, in which Plato did set up the statues of the Graces; and we don't read that the Athenians had any other temple of the Muses besides that.

Archbishop Usher places this decree and presents in the ninth year of Hyrcaan's reign, from the death of his mother (4); he there rectifies an anachronism in Josephus concerning it, which the reader may see in that learned author.

number of his troops to invest the place, whilst he marched with the rest into Judæa,^a where he caused the cities mentioned in a former note to be rebuilt, according to Pompey's order. That of Samaria being one of them, he called it from his own name Gabiniāna; but Herod soon after changed it into that of Sebastē, as we shall see in its proper place. Whilst Alexander was closely besieged, he sent to desire peace of the Roman general, promising to surrender that fortress, and those of Macheron and Hyrca- canion. About the same time his mother, a wife and discreet woman, whose husband (Aristobulus) and her children were still kept prisoners at Rome, came to the Roman general; and partly by her address, and partly by her services to him, did insinuate herself so much in his favour, that she procured the peace offered by her son to be accepted, and him to be dismissed with pardon and impunity for what he had^b done. After this Gabinius ordered the three fortresses delivered up to him to be demolished, that they might be no longer an occasion of future revolts; and then led Hyrca- can, who had it seems, assisted him in the siege, to Jerusalem, where he reinstated him afresh into his pontifical dignity. He then divided the province into five several districts, into each of which he erected a separate court of judicature; the first at Jerusalem, the second at Gadara, the third at Amath, the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Sephoris in Galilee;^c by which the government was changed from a monarchy into an aristocracy, and the Jews, who had been till then governed by their own monarchical pontiffs, fell under the subjection of a set of domineering lords (A).

IN the mean time Aristobulus, towards the latter end of the year, found means to^c escape out of the prison, into which he had been remanded after Pompey's triumph, and to return into Judæa with his son Antigonus. Here he was soon joined by a considerable number of Jews, and among the rest by Pitolaus, who had till then been a chief leader of the Roman party. But a great number of them coming to him without arms, he was forced to dismiss them, and only reserved eight thousand stout men, with whom he went to secure and rebuild the castle of Alexandriou, which had been demolished by Gabinius; but this last sent Cisenna, Marc Antony and Servilius against him, who, in spite of the bravery of his small army, defeated him, killed five thousand of his men, and forced him to fly into the ruined castle of Macheron, with only a thousand men he had left, the rest having took their flight where they^d could. The Romans did not give him time to fortify himself, but came and besieged him, and after a two days' stout resistance, took him by assault, covered with wounds, and sent him and his son prisoners to Rome, where he was conveyed into his old prison. But Gabinius wrote soon after to the senate, and informed them of the promise he had made to Aristobulus's wife, upon the delivery of the Jewish fortresses; whereupon the rest of his family were ordered to be set at liberty, and he only was kept prisoner during the rest of his life. Gabinius being on the next year invited into Egypt to assist Ptolemy Auletes in the recovery of his kingdom, as has been related in another volume †, Hyrca-, or rather Antipater, proved very serviceable to that general, not only by furnishing him with necessary provisions of corn, arms and^e money, for his army; but also by writing to the Jews of Onion near Pelusium, which was the key of that part of Egypt, to forward the Romans to the best of their power. By this means Gabinius and Marc Antony easily succeeded in this expedition, which

(A) The Jews had till now been governed by two sorts of councils or courts of judicature under their sovereign. These councils or sanhedrins were of two sorts, the inferior consisting of twenty-three, and the greater one of seventy-two persons; and this latter was emphatically called the grand sanhedrin. Of the lesser sort there was one in every city, and two at Jerusalem, where there was a greater concourse of people and business. The grand one sat only at Jerusalem, and had a place appropriated to them in the temple. We have had frequent occasion to speak of this last in several parts of this history; and shall only add here, that it was the last resort to which all other inferior ones might appeal, and from whose sentence there could be no appeal. Both sorts were abolished by Gabinius, who erected in lieu of them a court in each of the five districts independent of each other, and endowed them with the sovereign power, from which no appeal could be made but to Rome.

The talmud however tells us (f), that they retained a kind of council of three to decide all their controversies about bargains, sales, and other such private matters; each of the contending parties chose a judge from among themselves, and these two chose a third, and the three used to decide those controversies among them; which was perhaps done chiefly to avoid the charge, trouble, or rather injustice and arbitrariness of the courts erected by the Romans.

a might otherwise have proved too hard for them. The fourth book of the Maccabees, in the place last quoted, tells us, that Gabinus having sent to desire Elycan to come and join him in Egypt, the high-priest sent his favourite Antipater with an army to him, who helped him to beat the Egyptians, and restore the king; after which, they returning into Judæa, the Roman general renewed his alliance and friendship with the Jewish pontiff, and then returned to Rome.

DURING this Egyptian expedition, Alexander taking the advantage of Cifenna's weakness, a rash unexperienced youth, whom Gabinus had left to command in Syria with a small number of troops; had got a considerable army, and was entered Judæa, which was by this time filled with banditti and free-booters, who plundered every-b where without controul. He fell on the Romans where-ever he met them, and killed a great number of them: the rest retired to mount Garizzim, where he came soon after, and closely besieged them. The news of this having brought Gabinus into Judæa, the first thing he did was to send Antipater to try by fair means to withdraw the revolters from Alexander's party; and this consummate politician acted his part so well, that he brought back a considerable number of them. But all his address could not persuade Alexander to come to any terms. On the contrary, this last, enraged to see such a defection of his men, resolved with the thirty thousand he had left, to put it to the issue of a battle. It was accordingly fought near mount Tabor, and he totally defeated, with the loss of ten thousand men killed on the spot, and the rest
c put to flight. Gabinus after this victory returned to Jerusalem, where he settled the Jewish affairs according to Antipater's mind, and left Judæa, and soon after the government of Syria (B), and was succeeded by Crassus 4.

THIS last upon his coming into his new government, found the whole province, and particularly Judæa, in peace, so that he was at leisure to pursue his favourite design of invading the Parthians; for which expedition he had obtained, though with some difficulty, a decree from the senate 1. As avarice was the chief passion that pushed him to it, he began with plundering the temple of Jerusalem, not only of the two thousand talents which Pompey had left there untouched, but of every thing he found valuable in it, to the sum of eight thousand attic talents more. Among these there
d was a large beam of massive gold, covered with another hollow beam, which went across the partition, which divided the holy from the most holy place. The veil that separated those two rooms was fastened to it, and over it they threw all the old veils, whenever they hanged a new one; so that this valuable piece, which weighed three hundred Hebrew minæ (C), was so well concealed, that none knew of it but the treasurer of the temple. A priest named Eleazar, then in that post, and being apprised of Crassus's plundering design, was imprudent enough to endeavour to save all the rest of the costly temple furniture at the expence of this; but did not discover it to him, till he had made him swear that he would spare the rest; but the greedy governor made no scruple to break his oath, and to plunder that holy place of every valuable

(B) We shall not so far anticipate the Roman history as to enter into the merit of this general, and the causes of his being deprived of his government. It will be sufficient here to observe, that though he was accused to the senate of great corruptions, extortions, and such-like crimes, yet Josephus (6) gives him a quite different character, and speaks of him as of a person who had fixed that post with great exactness, honour, and applause. But Pompey and Crassus were then consuls, and the latter, as we shall soon see, had got an invincible itch after the province of Syria, ever since he had heard what treasures the former had left untouched at Jerusalem. Those riches he thought would come in a good time to help him forward in his Parthian expedition. In this he only followed the motions of his insatiable avarice; and what crimes might not such a man trumpet up against Gabinus, in order to divest him of that government?

But whether the latter was really such as Josephus has represented him, or had really given cause for those accusations preferred against him, two things are sure; 1. that he was grown exceeding rich; and, 2. that he was forced to disgorge all his wealth to bribe his judges, and save his life, as the sequel will shew.

(C) The mina amounted to about two pounds and a half of our weight, so that the whole bar or beam weighed about eleven hundred and fifty pounds. The fourth book of Maccabees adds, that all the old veils, which were taken down, when a new one was hung up (and which were all extremely rich and beautiful) used to be thrown over it (7). Besides these and other costly utensils and ornaments of the temple, we may add the continual offerings sent to it by the Jews from all parts of Asia and Europe; but especially those which were presented to it, not only by the Jewish monarchs, but by those of other nations, of which we have given some instances in a former section out of the books of the Maccabees (8).

thing he could lay his hands on, without sparing the most sacred utensils belonging to a it. The whole amount of this sacrilegious plunder was so great, that Josephus, fearing it would scarcely be credited by other nations, is forced to appeal to the writings of Strabo of Cappadocia, and other records, not now extant *. What we have said at the end of the last note will further confirm his account, and the immense treasures of which that rapacious governor stripped that sacred place, though it amounts to above two millions of our money.

*Cassius's success
in Syria.

Christ 52.*

We have seen in the close of the last volume * the ill success of his expedition against the Parthians. That general having been defeated and killed, Cassius brought the shattered remnant of his army into Syria, to suppress the incursions which the now elated Parthians made into that province; and here he gave them so many overthrows, b that he soon forced them to send home for a fresh supply of troops. From thence he marched into Judæa, where he besieged Tarichæa, a city on the south shore of the lake Genezareth, where Pitolaus had shut himself up with the few remains of Aristobulus's faction; and having taken it, carried thirty thousand Jews prisoners. Pitolaus was put to death by the advice of Antipater, to prevent his raising new troubles in favour of Aristobulus (D). As for Alexander, Cassius contented himself with forcing him to be quiet, whilst he marched towards the Euphrates to stop the incursions of the Parthians.

THREE years after, Julius Cæsar having made himself master of Rome, and thinking that Aristobulus might be of service to him against Pompey, released him out of his prison, and sent him into Palestine †, with two legions under his command, to keep Syria in awe; but those of Pompey's party found means to poison him, and thereby frustrated the designs of that crafty general. His body was afterwards embalmed by some of Cæsar's partisans, and kept in honey in a coffin, till they could convey him into Judæa, there to be interred with his ancestors ‡. His son Alexander did not meet with better fate; the news of his father's return into Judæa had made him raise forces there, to join him on his arrival; but Pompey, who kept a watchful eye over him, sent orders to his son-in-law Q. Metellus Scipio, formerly his colleague in the consulship, and now president of Syria, to put him to death. Scipio caused the unhappy prince to be seized, and brought before his tribunal at Antioch, where d he condemned him, and caused his head to be struck off. Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, hearing of their death, sent to Alexandra the widow of Aristobulus, who was then retired to Ascalon, and offered to take her son Antigonus, and her two daughters, under his care, who sent them to him accordingly. His son Philippion married one of the daughters, named also Alexandra; but some time after, either for some misbehaviour, or perhaps out of love to that princess, Mennæus caused him to be put to death, and married her himself soon after §.

IN the mean time the war between Cæsar and Pompey, as well as those that followed between the former and the asserters of the Roman liberty, afforded the Jews, not only a long breathing, but also an opportunity of ingratiating themselves to that conqueror. He was now in Egypt waiting impatiently for those new levies which Mithridates the Pergamenian was bringing to him from Syria and Cilicia, where he had been raising them. But these not being sufficient to break through Pelusium, the strong key of Egypt on that side, he was forced to stop at Ascalon, till new reinforcements came to him. But what did him the greatest service at this juncture, and facilitated the taking of that city, was the coming of Antipater, at the head of three thousand Jews well armed, together with some other succours which he had drawn from Armenia, and Syria, and mount Libanus. He also brought letters from Hyrcaan, whether real, or forged by himself; exhorting the Jews of the territories of Onion,

(D) The fourth of the Maccabees adds (9), that Cassius came afterwards to Jerusalem, and there reconciled Hyrcaan and his subjects, who were then in open rebellion against him.

This is that Cassius who had formerly refused the command which the soldiers had offered him, out of hatred to Crassus; but now that general being dead, and the Roman army miserably shattered, he was forced to take the government of Syria upon him, in order to suppress the insolence of the Parthians (10). - a Deltba, and Memphis, to assist the Roman emperor with all their might. By these means the city of Pelusium was easily carried off by assault, Antipater himself being one of the foremost in scaling it, and a way thereby was made into Egypt. We have seen in a former volume the success of that expedition †; some have imagined that *Hyrca*n came thither in person at the head of fifteen hundred men ‡, but without any likelihood. That pontiff was wholly governed by Antipater, whose main view was the aggrandising himself, rather than recommending the Jewish pontiff to that conqueror; and *Hyrca*n being in himself a man of no genius or ambition, it is more probable he contented himself with the credit of sending such seasonable aid to Cæsar, whilst Antipater, like a consummate politician, took the advantage of ingratiating himself to him by his valour and gallantry, as well as by his good offices with his master. Accordingly, we find in the subsequent battle, which was fought in the place called the Jewish camp §, that Mithridates, who commanded the right wing, must have been totally defeated, had not Antipater, who had been victorious in the left, which he commanded, come to his rescue, and gained him that signal victory over the Egyptians, which enabled him to join Cæsar's army, and soon made that emperor master of all Egypt. In all these actions Antipater behaved with such valour and gallantry, that Mithridates did not scruple to own his late successes to be owing to him; and in a letter he wrote to Cæsar, he gave the Jewish commander such encomiums, that he conceived a more than ordinary esteem for him; and in token of it, before he left Alexandria, he gave him some considerable posts in his army, made him procurator or lieutenant of Judæa, and citizen of Rome, with all the privileges belonging to it, which places he held with great credit all the time of the war (E). Cæsar also confirmed *Hyrca*n in his priesthood, added to it the principality of Judæa, to be intailed on his posterity for ever; and to the Jewish nation their ancient rights and privileges; and ordered a pillar to be erected, whereon all these grants and his own decree should be engraven, which was accordingly done, soon after Antipater's return into Judæa. Cæsar being come into Syria, Aristobulus came to him, and preferred a severe complaint against *Hyrca*n and Antipater, for the injuries which he pretended they had done to him; and at the same time represented to him the misfortunes of his family, for having stuck close to his interest; and particularly the poisoning of his father by Pompey, and the beheading of his brother by Scipio. In consideration of all which, he concluded with a petition to the emperor, that he would restore him to his father's principality, of which *Hyrca*n had unjustly stripped him. But unfortunately for him, Antipater was then attending upon Cæsar, who defended his own and *Hyrca*n's cause so well, that they were both absolved with applause, and Antigonus repulsed as a factious and turbulent person, that could never be at rest. Antipater added farther, that as to Antigonus's father, he had been justly sent prisoner to Rome for being a constant enemy to the Roman nation, and that his brother had been deservedly beheaded for plundering and ravaging that of the Jews. Cæsar had too many obligations to *Hyrca*n and Antipater, not to admit of a much weaker vindication of their cause. But he was resolved to do more than the bare acquitting of them: he confirmed his former decree in favour of them, and of the Jewish nation, and caused it to be engraven on brazen tables in Latin and Greek, and to be hung up in the temples of Tyre, Sidon, and Askalon (F), as well as in the capitol at Rome.

(E) The fourth book of Maccabees (11) adds, that Mithridates being totally defeated in the action, was so closely surrounded by the Egyptians, that he must have been cut in pieces by them, had not Antipater come in a lucky minute, and rescued him and the victory out of their hands. But what the same author adds, that Cæsar gave him the command of his own troops, and took him with him into Persia, seems quite to clash with Josephus, who doth not so much as hint that he had the command of any of the Roman troops, neither doth it appear that Cæsar carried any war against the Persians.

(F) This decree, which at once abolished the aristocracy lately set up by Gabinus, and restored the Jewish state to its pristine sovereignty, has been preserved to us by Josephus (12), and runs to this effect:

"Julius Cæsar, emperor and dictator the second time, &c. Forasmuch as *Hyrca*nus the son of Alexander, a Jew, hath given us many singular proofs of his affection, both in time of peace and war, and particularly by the supply sent to me in the late war; in consideration of these his services, I do hereby confirm unto him and his heirs the perpetual government of the Jews, both as their prince and high-priest after the manner and rule

whither Hyrca sent soon after his ambassadors to renew the old alliance with that a nation ; which was by his order published in all the principal cities of the empire, that all the world might know that the Jews were acknowledged the friends and allies of Rome. These ambassadors, who were there received with great marks of honour, did likewise obtain a permissory decree for the fortifying of Jerusalem, and for rebuilding the wall which had been pulled down by Pompey (G) ^a.

Cæsar having left the government of Syria to Sextus Cæsar his near relation, was accompanied by Antipater as far as Tyre, where he imbarqued for Sicily. On his return to Jerusalem, Antipater took care in every place he came through to extol the Roman emperor and nation, and to exhort the people to peace and obedience ; representing to them with his usual eloquence, that whilst they behaved like faithful subjects, they b would be blest with a mild government, and enjoy their rights, liberties, and religion ; but that if they grew discontented and mutinous, they would soon find themselves forced to submit to a severer yoke, and that Hyrca, from a mild and pacific prince, might easily become their tyrant, and the Romans, from friends and protectors, would not fail to turn their bitter enemies. This was not said so much to keep the Jews in obedience to Hyrca, whose stupidity and indolence Josephus himself tells us was but too visible to all his subjects. But by thus over-awing them with the dread of the Romans anger, he plainly intimated to them his own credit and interest with them to be such, that they would never see his measures opposed, without interposing their own authority ; and therefore closed the whole with c these words ; For they (the Romans) will be obeyed ^b. By these speeches he gained two main ends, he kept a divided and factious people in awe, and took the advantage of his own established power, and of Hyrca's weakness, to aggrandise his family.

UPON his arrival at Jerusalem he set himself about putting Cæsar's decree in force, and settling or rather restoring the Jewish government to its ancient model, and ordering the repairs of the walls, and fortifications of Jerusalem. He made his eldest son Phasaelus governor of that metropolis, and Herod his second son governor of Galilee (H) ; whilst he and the high-priest took a progress about Judea to settle the government and peace of the kingdom. Herod soon signalised himself by the suppression d of a band of thieves, who had till then much infested that and the neighbouring provinces. He took their chief, named Hezekiah, with some others of his companions, whom he put to immediate death, and thereby dispersed the rest of their gang.

" among my trusty friends ; and ordain, that all
" the legal and pontifical rights and privileges be de" volved upon him and his sons for ever ; and that " in all controversies that shall arise concerning the " rights and discipline of the Jews, he or they be " the only judges : and further, that the Jews be " henceforth discharged from the burden of winter-
" quarters, and all public tribute".

About the same time the Athenians renewed their alliance with Hyrca, and sent their decree to Jerusalem, in which they acknowledge that pontiff's singular and constant friendship to all the Greeks, and to their own republic in particular. The reader may see it at length in Josephus in the place last quoted.

(G) The fourth book of Maccabees adds (13), that Cæsar did those ambassadors the singular honour of making them sit down in his presence ; and a little lower, that that emperor had decreed for himself and successors, that all the maritime part of the Syrian province from Gaza to Sidon should pay yearly to the Jewish temple the tribute they were wont to pay to the empire ; and that that of the town of Sidon amounted yearly to twenty thousand five hundred and fifty measures of wheat ; and that the cities of Laodice and others, which had been formerly in the possession of the high-priests, should be now sur-

All these grants, our author says, were bestowed on the Jewish nation in consideration of the eminent services which they and Antipater at their head had done the emperor in his Parthian expedition. But whether he really was sent thither by the high-priest, as is there affirmed, 'tis certain that this great change in favour of the Jews, was owing to the wisdom, conduct, and valour of Antipater ; and how much it contributed to raise his power and interest, not only in Judea, but in Rome, and other nations, the sequel will soon shew.

(H) Antipater had four sons by his wife Cypria, who were by this time grown up to maturity, and in great reputation for their wisdom and valour. We have mentioned the two first in the text : Josephus indeed allows the latter of them but fifteen years of age, but that must be a mistake, either of that historian, or rather of his copyists ; for both Ptolemy and Nicolas Damascen gave him twenty-five years, and our learned Usher has made it appear that he could have no less (14).

The third son was called Joseph, and the fourth Phorcas. He had likewise a daughter named Salome, who became afterwards infamous for the feuds and divisions which she created in her family, as we shall see in the sequel.

a This action failed not to recommend him, not only to the whole province, but more particularly to Sextus Cæsar, the new president of Syria. On the other hand his elder brother neglected nothing that could recommend him to the people of Jerusalem, over which he was governor; so that Antipater saw with pleasure himself and his sons become the darlings of the nation, without lessening, at least outwardly, any part of their respect to the high-priest, who seemed still to be at the head of all the national affairs, and to give his sanction to them.

b But it was this greatness, this excessive growing power of Antipater, which raised at length the envy and jealousy of the principal Jews. Herod's action was doubtless a noble one, and the country felt the benefit of it: but he had gone some unjustifiable lengths in it in putting the banditti to death by his own authority, and without any formal trial; and this they looked upon as an earnest of what he might do in time, if his enterprising genius was not nipped in the bud. This made them at length resolve to try to open the eyes of their indolent pontiff, and to prevail upon him to summon that young hero to come and answer to this and some other accusations before him and the sanhedrin.

*Hyrca*n, who had a great friendship for him, betrayed at this juncture an extreme partiality in excusing him of several crimes they alledged against him. They in vain represented to him how dangerous it was for him to suffer the son of a proselyte, who had already ingrossed all the power and honour, and left him only the bare title of sovereign, to arrogate to himself such an unlimited authority, as to put a number of men to death without trial, or even without asking his or the sanhedrin's consent. At length, since they could not work upon his fears, they tried to rouse his pity, by the daily clamours of the mothers of those whom Herod had put to death, and who ceased not to come daily to the temple to demand justice of him for so daring and unwarranted an affront on his dignity. *Hyrca*n was at length prevailed upon to send his summons to him to come and answer to the charge before him and the sanhedrin. Herod appeared accordingly, but in such a guise, and with such a numerous retinue, as gave them to understand, that he did not come as a private person, much less as a criminal to be judged by them. He was clothed in purple, and by his father's advice, had brought such a number of servants, as should be sufficient to defend him in case he was condemned, and yet not so numerous, as to raise any jealousy in the friendly high-priest. He also brought letters to him from Sextus Cæsar, with express orders to acquit him, and threatening him with his highest resentment in case of non-compliance.

c THESE letters seem indeed to have been calculated to intimidate the sanhedrin, rather than to recommend Herod's cause to the high-priest, who was already sufficiently in his interest. Accordingly, when he appeared before that high court, he struck such an awe upon them, that none of his accusers dared to open their mouths against him. At length Sameas, a man in great esteem for his wisdom and integrity, had the courage to stand up, and arraign him, not only for his former crime, but much more now for his unjustifiable boldness in appearing, contrary to the laws of all nations, not in the guise of an accused person, but in that of an arrogant and threatening commander, who came rather to frighten his judges, than to clear himself of his accusation. I do not at the same time, continued he, so much blame him for the insolent means he takes to secure his forfeited life. What surprises me is, to see both the high-priest and his judges thus tamely to permit it; but take notice of what I am now going to tell you, said he, turning to them; God is a righteous and powerful judge, and this very man, whom you now strive to acquit, in complaisance to *Hyrca*n, shall prove the ruin of both king and judges. How true a prophet he proved, the sequel will shew; for Herod was no sooner got into the possession of the government, than he put both the high-priest and all his cowardly judges to death, except Sameas Pollio, and for whom he retained a singular esteem ever after (1). Here *Hyrca*n observing that his Sameas's noble speech.

(1) Sameas, or as the Rabbins call him, Shammai, was, according to Josephus (15), the disciple of Pollio, another learned Jewish doctor in great esteem with Herod, not unlikely the same which the Rabbies call Hillel; for this latter having been a famous disciple of Sameas or Shammai, and having in process of time proved the antagonist of his master, and the founder of that famed school, which retained his name, it is a wonder Josephus should never mention him, whereas he speaks very honourably of Pollio in several places of his history.

St. Jerom (16) has imagined that the pharisees had their origin from the division of those two schools; but we have already seen how powerful that speech had made such an impression on the court, that the majority were like to be ^a against Herod, he adjourned the court till next day, whilst he sent private advice to him to flee for his life; which he accordingly did, and went to Damascus, where having gained the protection of the Syrian governor, he sent the sanhedrin word, that if they should take it into their heads to summon him afresh, he would disclaim their jurisdiction. This contemptuous message put the judges into a fresh fit of rage; they vented their resentments against the pontiff, and strove in vain to awaken him into a sense of his danger; he remained deaf and insensible to the last ^c.

IN the mean time Herod, having with a large sum of money purchased the government of Cælo-Syria of his friend Sextus Cæsar, raised an army with an intent to march against Jerusalem, and be revenged of *Hyrca*n and the sanhedrin for the affront they ^b had put upon him; but he was happily diverted from it by Antipater and Phasaelus, who reminded him of his great obligations to that pontiff, to whom both he and they were beholden for all the power and grandeur they enjoyed. Herod acquiesced for the present, and was satisfied with having given them such token of what he could do whenever occasion offered, and remained quiet in his province.

New privileges granted to the Jews.

ABOUT three years after this, *Hyrca*n having sent an embassy to Cæsar, who was by this time entered into his fifth consulship; to renew his alliance with him, obtained a fresh decree for the fortifying of Jerusalem, which Antipater immediately put in execution; and that metropolis was soon after raised to its pristine splendor and strength. Cæsar did moreover grant some further privileges to the Jews, in consideration, as he ^c expressed it, of the signal services they had done to him in Syria and Egypt. The reader may see them more fully in Josephus. As for *Hyrca*n, he gave him leave to govern in Jerusalem according to his pleasure, and confirmed to him the grant of all the towns and villages which had been possessed by his ancestors; that the lands and other privileges which the Romans had bestowed on the kings of Syria and Phœnice, on account of the alliance that had been between them, should likewise be bestowed on him and his successors; that he, they, and their ambassadors, should have the liberty of sitting down with the Roman senators in all public shews and games; and lastly, that when they had any petition to prefer to the senate, they should be introduced by the dictator, or by the master of the horse, and that they should have an ^d answer within ten days. In a word, such was that emperor's gratitude and friendship to the Jews, so many and considerable the immunities and privileges which he heaped upon their prince and nation, that they could hardly be said to feel the weight of the Roman yoke. His kindness extended even to those who lived out of Judæa; witness the edict which the magistrates of the island of Paros had made against their exercise of their religion, living according to their laws, and sending their yearly tribute to Jerusalem, to maintain the service of the temple (K); and which that monarch obliged them to revoke, as a piece of rigour and injustice, which he said was not to be suffered against the friends and allies of Rome, where all those privileges were indulged to them. ^e

BUT this happy state was soon at an end. Two remarkable accidents happened, one on the heels of the other, the one in Judæa, and the other at Rome, which brought on a series of distractions and feuds in both. In the former Sextus Cæsar was treacherously murdered by Bassus, and Cæsar himself at Rome by Brutus and Cassius, and their

that sect was long before Hillel or Shammai. Concerning this last the Rabbies tell us wonders, and if we may believe the father above quoted, they attribute the compiling of the Mishnah to him and his disciple Hillel, or, as he elsewhere calls them, Simæon and Helles (17).

We shall have occasion to speak to that point, as well as the rupture of those two famed schools, in a proper place. All we shall add concerning them here is, a Rabbinic proverb much in vogue among the Jews: Be courteous as Hillel, and intrepid as Shammai.

(K) We have often mentioned this yearly tribute, which every Jew, both of Judæa, and of the dispersion, was obliged to send. Besides this we must further observe, that as they were allowed to offer sacrifices no-where but in that ho'y place, it was usual for them to remit the money thither for such victims, as either their religion or extraordinary devotions directed them to be offered up there for them; and these were generally sent thither with the annual tribute of the temple; and in some wealthy places they sometimes amounted to such vast sums, as raised the envy and jealousy of those among whom they lived, and have been often seized by covetous princes and governors, who have converted them to their own uses.

- a associates, as shall be better seen in the Roman history. Marc Antony and Dolabella, who were then consuls, assembled the senate; and the ambassadors from Judæa, among others, were admitted to renew their alliance with them. Pursuant to which (some of the Asiatic Jews having been forced to inroll themselves in the Roman army) Hyrcan sent a complaint to Dolabella, reminding him that the Jews were wont to be exempted from the war by reason of their being obliged to observe the sabbath; and obtained a letter from the consul to the governor of Ephesus, enjoining him to see that the Jews were set free, and restored to the exercise of their religion and laws^a. By this time Bassus had seized upon the government of Syria, but was soon after driven out of it by Cassius, who immediately came thither after Cæsar's death, and took the command of the Roman troops upon him, who were then besieging the assassin of Sextus in the city of Apamea. Cassius having drawn him and Marcus into his party, raised the siege of the place, and got all Syria into his possession. He was however forced to levy new troops to reinforce his army; and hearing that Alienus, one of Dolabella's lieutenants, was marching through Judæa with four legions sent to that consul by Clopatra, he posted himself so advantageously, that he surrounded and intercepted him with a double number of his own forces, and took them all into his service. Having by this time got an army of twelve legions, which could not be subsisted without great expence, he was forced to levy very large tributes on that province, particularly on Judæa, which he taxed at seven hundred talents. Antipater, who knew the necessity that general was in of some immediate supply, and the consequence of gaining his favour by sending him a speedy one, committed the levying of one half of that sum to his sons Phasaël and Herod, and ordered the rest to be raised by one Malchus and some associates. Herod failed not to take this opportunity of ingratiating himself to Cassius, by bringing him the hundred talents which were assigned to his government; and as he was the first that complied with his orders, that general conceived a great esteem for him. His brother came soon after; but the rest of the governors not having followed their examples, particularly those of Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, Thamna, and some other cities of Judæa, Cassius ordered all their inhabitants to be sold by auction, and would have put Malchus to death, had not the high-priest redeemed him at the expence of a hundred talents, which he sent him out of his own coffers^b.

- Cassius* being soon after forced to march against Dolabella, left the government of Calo-Syria to Herod, as an earnest of his future friendship; but Malchus in the mean time, who bore a mortal hatred against Antipater (L), and saw him with an envious eye holding alone the reins of government, resolved to rid himself and the nation of him. Antipater having had timely notice of his treacherous design, did presently retire to the other side of the Jordan, and there raised some forces, and put himself in a posture of defence. Whereupon Malchus, finding his plot was discovered, came to him in a seeming friendly manner, and by oaths, protestations, and other crafty insinuations, such as the folly of such an attempt against his life, whilst his son Phasaël held the government of Jerusalem, and the warlike Herod that of Calo-Syria; easily persuaded him of his innocency, and a reconciliation was made between them. Antipater was even forced to make use of all his interest with Marcus, now governor of Syria, and who was well acquainted with all his private plots, to prevent his putting him to death. But Malchus was not to be wrought on by such an unparalleled generosity, whilst he beheld his rival's interest raised still higher by it. For about this time Cassius and Marcus, who had bestowed the government of Calo-Syria on his son Herod, had engaged his fidelity to them by a promise to make him king of Judæa, as soon as the war now begun against Marc Antony, and the young Octavius, since named Au-

(L) Malchus was a Jew; he and Antipater had been the main supporters of Hyrcan's interest; so that he could not behold his rival, who was of Idumean race, as we have hinted before, preferred before him without the deepest envy and regret; and this was the motive which made him conspire against him, not doubting, but if he was once removed, himself would be at the head of the Jewish affairs.

The fourth book of the Maccabees says indeed (18), that they were the heads of the Jewish nation who conspired against Antipater; and very likely Malchus had drawn a great number into the same black design; it being as great a mortification to them as to himself, to see their prince held in a kind of servitude by a stranger, who had ingrossed all the power into his hand.

gustus, was ended. This made him dread the excessive power of Antipater to such a degree, that upon the first opportunity, which was soon after offered, when he was to dine with the high-priest, he bribed that pontiff's butler to poison him in a glass of wine, whilst himself with an armed force seized upon the government of Jerusalem. Phasaelus and Herod easily perceived that Malichus was at the bottom of this villainy, notwithstanding his vows and protestations to the contrary; and Herod, who was of a fierce temper, was for immediately revenging the fact with open force; but his brother, who rightly judged that it would be much safer to dissemble for the present, and to punish the assassin by some private stratagem, without involving the nation into a civil war, easily brought him over to his opinion ^e.

ACCORDINGLY, these two brothers feigning to believe Malichus innocent of their father's death, the eldest went and busied himself with rearing a stately monument to him, whilst Herod went into Samaria, under pretence of suppressing some turbulent spirits there. He came some time after to Jerusalem, attended with a number of his men of war, to assist at the feast of pentecost; and Malichus, who was afraid of something worse, prevailed on *Hyrca*n to forbid him to enter that metropolis with such an escort, as would profane that solemnity. Herod despising his orders, entered the city by night, but forbore attempting any thing against his enemy, though he had received full power from Cassius to revenge his father's death on that assassin. But a much better opportunity offered itself soon after, in which Malichus was caught in his own craftiness. Cassius had taken Laodicea, and all the chief lords of Syria and Palestine hastened thither with their presents and congratulations; and Malichus having left his son hostage with that governor, designed to have taken that opportunity of getting him off, and to have gone back and excited a revolt in Judæa, whilst the Romans were taken up with their civil wars, and then to have made a bold push for the Jewish crown. Whether Herod knew his whole design or no, he rightly guessed that he would not fail to pay his compliments to the conqueror, and so he did accordingly, he accompanying the Jewish pontiff thither. Herod fell in with them in the way, and having first obtained from Cassius an order to the Tyrians to assist him in the punishment of Malichus, he invited *Hyrca*n and him to a supper he had prepared for them in the neighbourhood of Tyre, and sent his servants into that city under pretence of getting all things ready, but in reality to acquaint the officers and garison of that city with Cassius's orders. These sallied out accordingly, and having overtaken him, as many as could come at him at once sheathed their daggers into his body (M). *Hyrca*n upon hearing the news of his death, remained thunderstruck for some time. At length, having recovered himself, he asked, by whose orders he had been killed? and Herod having calmly answered, by Cassius's, he replied, that he could not but highly applaud the deed, since it had rid him of a very dangerous enemy ^b.

BUT Malichus had left a brother behind him as turbulent as himself, who, under the specious pretence of revenging his death, put Judæa again into a flame, whilst Cassius was gone to join Brutus in Asia. Felix, who at that time was left at the head of some Roman forces at Jerusalem, seems also to have been gained on that side. As for *Hyrca*n, he had not courage enough to oppose them, but acquiesced in what they did; so that Felix attacked Phasael on the one hand, whilst Malichus's brother went and took Massada, and some other fortresses of Judæa. Herod was then laid up with sickness at Damascus, and unable for a while to give his brother any assistance: but Phasael, who had still a considerable number of forces, found means to drive Felix and all his party out of Jerusalem, and from thence into some fortress, out of which he did not suffer him to come, but by capitulation. By this time Herod being

(M) The fourth book of Maccabees relates this punishment of Malichus somewhat differently (19), and says, that Cassius being informed of Antipater's murder, exhorted Herod to revenge it as soon as himself was come to Tyre, and *Hyrca*n and Malichus were come to pay their respects to him there. These being come accordingly to Tyre, as well as Phasael and Herod, Cassius commanded his men to do whatever these two last should direct them.

Having therefore invited them all four to a feast, as soon as they had taken their afternoon's nap, as was usual in those countries, *Hyrca*n being seated near Malichus, and the two sons of Antipater, Herod made a sign, upon which some of Cassius's officers fell upon Malichus, and murdered him. *Hyrca*n, at sight of it, fell into a swoon, from which being recovered, he asked, why they had killed the man? Herod pleaded ignorance, and *Hyrca*n was glad to hold his peace.

- a recovered, came to his assistance, and drove the remaining part of Malichus's faction out of their fortresses, and forced the brother to surrender Massada to him, and to capitulate for his life¹. The two brothers returned to Jerusalem, where they reproved *Hyrca*n's baseness in the severest terms; but were soon after reconciled to him by the marriage of Herod with Mariamne, the beautiful grand-daughter of that pontiff.

- In the interim another enemy started up on the sudden, namely Antigonus the younger son of Aristobulus, *Hyrca*n's brother. He was upheld by Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, to whom he was related, and on that account had been adopted by him (N). He had likewise gained Marion prince of Tyre, and bribed Fabius governor of Damascus into his interest; so that having gained a sufficient army, he put himself at the head of it, with an intent of reviving his father's pretensions to the kingdom; but he had scarce entered the frontiers of it, before Herod met him with a powerful army, and totally defeated him. This prince acted with his usual generosity towards the Tyrians, who had assisted his enemy, not only sparing their lives, but sending some of them home with rich presents, by which he gained the affections of that city; after which he returned triumphant to Jerusalem, where the people, and among the rest *Hyrca*n, who now looked upon him as one of his family, came and offered him the usual compliments of crowns and congratulations. His nuptials with Mariamne were not however celebrated till some years after, when he had by her three sons and two daughters, besides his eldest son Antipater, whom he had by a former wife of his own country, named *Dores*².

- c Brutus and Cassius having been defeated in the following year by Marc Antony and Octavius, the latter marched into Gaul, and the former came into Syria to settle the affairs of that province. Upon his arrival into Bithynia, where he was complimented by vast crouds of ambassadors from all the neighbouring states, the Jews came and preferred a severe accusation against Phasaël and Herod, as having ingrossed all the power and administration of Judæa, and left *Hyrca*n only the bare name of a prince. But Herod, who was there also, found in that general a steadfast friend, not only on account of former kindnesses which he had received from Antipater, whilst he served under Gabinius in Judæa, but much more on that of a large sum of money, with which he had taken care to bribe him, so that he would not so much as hear their accusers. Upon his coming to Ephesus, an embassy came to him from *Hyrca*n, desiring that the Jewish prisoners, whom Cassius had formerly sold by auction, contrary to their alliance with Rome, might be restored to their liberty and lands. Antony did readily grant their request, and sent an obliging letter to *Hyrca*n, which was soon followed with an edict to the Tyrians, and other neighbouring states, enjoining them to restore all those captives, according to *Hyrca*n's desire and the purport of the edict, which the reader may see in the margin³ (O).

(N) The reader may remember, that after Pompey had caused his father and brother to be put to death, Mennæus invited Alexandra into Chalcis, where he afterwards married her beauteous daughter, and for her sake took both the mother and her children into his protection (20).

As for that Marion, who joined with young Antigonus, he had been lately made prince of Tyre by Cassius; for that general being in great want of money for the carrying on of the war against the triumvirs, had divided the country of Syria into small districts, and sold them to the highest bidders, one of whom was this Marion, who had bought the principality of Tyre of him (21). These petty tyrants however were afterwards turned out by Marc Antony, upon his coming into that province.

(O) Marc Antony, emperor and triumvir, &c. to the magistrates, senate and people of Tyre, greeting:

Forasmuch as the gods have declared themselves the dire revengers of the late Cæsar's death, by the total defeat of his most detestable assassins Brutus and Cassius, and by granting the triumvirate such a signal victory, as promised nothing less than a solid and lasting peace to the Roman empire; and forasmuch as the Jewish nation, notwithstanding their

known and constant attachment to the Roman interest, has been greatly oppressed by Cassius, and great multitudes of them sold for slaves by him; we order the said Jews to be restored to their liberties, lands, and to all the privileges and immunities which had been granted to that allied nation by Dolabella, and charge all those cities, in which any such Jews are detained, whether bond or free, forthwith to discharge and restore them, pursuant to the strict tenor of this edict.

In another he writes to the Tyrians, that *Hyrca*n having complained to him, that they had in the late Cassius's time invaded some of his territories, he expected that they should be restored to him. Nevertheless, that if they had any reasons to offer against such a restitution, they should do it upon his coming into that province, when having heard the allegations of both parties, he should decree in favour of that which had right on their side.

These edicts be ordered to be copied out in Greek and Latin, and the original to be preserved in their archives, and the copies to be affixed in some public place, where they might be publicly read. He likewise sent some others to the same purport to the Sidonians, and to the cities of Antioch and Arad (22).

And Jeru-

BUT all these favours of the triumvir, though chiefly owing to his friendship to ^a the sons of Antipater, were not able to reconcile them to the generality of the Jews. For as soon as Antony was come so near them as Daphne, a city near Antioch †, he was accosted by a fresh embassy from Jerusalem, who preferred the old complaint to him against them. Messala undertook their defence, and was backed by Hyrca, who looking upon them now as part of his family, was come thither to second their defence. After a full hearing, Antony asked the pontiff which of the two parties he thought best qualified for the government, and being answered in favour of the two brothers, he likewise declared for them; and as a further mark of his friendship, made them both tetrarchs, put Judæa under their care, and wrote a letter to the sanhedrin in their favour. Fifteen of the most turbulent of their accusers were put into prison, and would have been put to death, had not Herod interceded for them. All this did only exasperate that faction the more, and produced a third embassy, which came to meet the triumvir at Tyre, and consisted of a thousand persons. But Antony, whom fresh presents, and large sums of money, had fastened still more to Herod's interest, sent orders to the magistracy of that place to assist him in the punishment of those factious mutineers, as he termed them; whereupon Herod met them out of the city, and advised them in a friendly manner not to push the matter further. Hyrca likewise tried in vain to forewarn them of their danger, in case they persisted in their design. They refused all advice, till the Tyrians rushing in upon them, made them repent of their rashness, when it was too late. A great number were killed and wounded, ^c and others taken prisoners, and the rest dispersed. This put an end indeed to the controversy, but not to the faction, which vented their resentment against Herod in such open manner, that Antony, in a fit of anger, caused all the prisoners to be put to death ^m.

Herod had no sooner weathered this storm, but another was raised against him by Antigonus. Ptolemy the son of Mennæus, had been succeeded by his son Lyfianias, and this last had prevailed upon Pacorus the son of the Parthian king, and his general Barzanes, who by this time had made themselves masters of Sidon and Ptolemais, to invade Judæa, depose Hyrca, and set Antigonus on his throne; in consideration of which, the latter was to pay him a hundred talents, and five hundred women (P). ^d Pacorus pursuant to this agreement, sent his cup-bearer, named also Pacorus, with part of his cavalry, to invade Judæa. Antigonus, who had got together by that time a great number of discontented Jews, who joined him from mount Carmel, had made himself master of the canton of Dryma (Q), where a great number of other Jews coming still to him, persuaded him to march on to Jerusalem, and attack Phasaël and his brother in the royal palace. He marched accordingly thitherward, attended with the Parthian cup-bearer; and these two being met by the two tetrarchs, were so warmly repulsed by them, that they were forced to retire into the temple. Herod, for the better security of that place, clapped a guard of soldiers in all the adjacent houses; but these were soon set on fire, and the soldiers burnt in them before any help could be brought. ^e Herod did not let this loss go long unrevenged, but gave them a sharp defeat, in which he made a great slaughter of their party. Thus they continued skirmishing one another till the feast of pentecost, which was impatiently wished for by Antigonus, in hopes that the great concourse of the Jews to that solemnity would join forces with him against the sons of Antipater. He judged rightly enough, for great numbers of them resorted unto him; but as the greater part of them had neither arms nor experience, Herod, who with his brother had retired into the royal palace, and defended it, the former from within, and the other from without; made a vigorous sally upon those of the enemy, who had posted themselves in the suburbs, and drove several thousands of them before him, some into the city, and others into the temple. ^f

- a THE two parties being at length tired with shedding so much blood, came to an agreement, that Pacorus, who was by that time incamped without the walls of the city, should be admitted to mediate a peace between them. This project, though set on foot by Antigonus, who wholly relied on the friendship of the Parthian general, was yet agreed to by Phasaël, who went out to meet him, and courteously lodged him in the royal palace. Here Pacorus taking the advantage of the confidence his kind host put in him, persuaded him to go on an embassy to Barzapharnes, who was then governor of Syria under the Parthian king, assuring him that it was the only means to settle his affair on a firm footing. Herod, who justly suspected the treachery of the Parthians, was intirely averse to the proposal; but Phasaël, more credulous than he, consented to it;
- b and taking Hyrcaan with him, set on the journey, attended with an escort of two hundred Parthian horse, and with Pacorus, who accompanied him all the way. Upon their arrival in Galilee (R), they were met with a guard of armed men, who were sent to conduct them to Barzapharnes, and Pacorus returned to Jerusalem. Their reception in all appearance was very courteous, and Barzapharnes lodged them in a house near the sea-side, where Phasaël was soon after informed by some friends of the contract which had passed between the Parthian king and Antigonus; 'twas then that he first became sensible of their treachery, and of his danger. However, though he was earnestly intreated to make his escape, and was offered transport ships to convey him away, yet he could not be prevailed upon to forsake either Hyrcaan's or his brother's interest;
- c for here he was likewise told, that Pacorus was sent back to Jerusalem to surprise Herod also. The best expedient therefore he could think on was to go to Barzapharnes, and to expostulate the matter with him; which he did in the severest terms, telling him at the same time, that if money was the motive of his treachery to him, he was able to bribe him higher to be honest, and come over to his interest. The Parthian had no other way to come off, but by forswearing the charge, and assuring him that nothing was falser than such a surmise; but as soon as he thought that Pacorus had made sure of Herod, he marched directly towards him, and ordered Hyrcaan and Phasaël to be seized, and clapt in prison.
- Pacorus* however had missed his aim, and Herod having had timely notice of the treachery, had found means to convey himself out of Jerusalem, together with his mother, his betrothed Mariamne, her mother Alexandra, his brother Pheroras, with all his servants, friends, and valuable things, and a numerous escort of his own men of war, and made the best of his way towards Idumea. He met with several stops in his journey (S), being forced to fight his way through the Parthians and Antigonians, who pursued him; but his valour and that of his guards got him clear of all, and in memory of a signal defeat, which he gave them at a place about fifty stades, or seven miles from Jerusalem, he afterwards built a stately palace, and called it Herodion ^a.
- WHEN he was come to Thressa, or, as Josephus calls it elsewhere, Reffa, a small town in Idumea, his brother Joseph met him at the head of a considerable reinforcement;
- e but when they arrived at Massada, the place where he designed to retire, it being a very strong and almost impregnable fortress, he found it too small to contain all his men, so that he was forced to dismiss nine thousand of them. Here he left his family and treasure under the care of his brother Joseph, and of a garison of eight hundred men; and having furnished it with all necessaries, he set out for Petra, the metropolis of Arabia, where Malchus had succeeded his father Aretas, a prince who had formerly been highly obliged to him. His design was to borrow as much money of him as would buy his brother Phasaël's freedom; and to that end he had brought his son with him, who was but seven years old, to leave him there as a pledge to the Arabian

(R) Josephus doth not tell us the place where Barzapharnes then was, but only that he was in Galilee, near the sea side; but in his wars of the Jews, he says (15), they met him at Ecdipon, which place was near the sea shore, and at a small distance north of Ptolemais; but the fourth book of Maccabees says, it was at Damascus, the capital of Syria (16).

(S) One of them was the overturning of the chariot in which his mother sat, by which she was so terribly bruised, that her life was despaired of; which sad accident went so near his heart, that he drew his sword with full intent to kill himself, but was happily prevented by some of his retinue.

The fourth book of the Maccabees (27) says, that Herod sent all his family and riches before him, but that himself stayed behind with his guards to prevent their being pursued.

king. But that ungrateful prince sent him express orders to depart out of his territories, pretending that he had been torbid by the Parthians to receive him; so that he was forced to dismiss some of his attendants, and to make the best of his way a

And Egypt.

In the mean while, his flight out of Jerusalem having been discovered by the very next morning, the first thing the Parthians did was to plunder his palace, city, and all the country about it. They spared however Hyrcaan's treasure, which amounted to three hundred talents, and some of Herod's riches that were left behind; but they made themselves amends by the plunder of Marissa, an opulent city, which they totally destroyed. Antigonus was next installed on the Jewish throne, according to their agreement, and Phasaël and Hyrcaan were soon after brought to him in chains. The new king however did not think proper to put the high-priest to death, but contented himself with incapacitating him for the pontifical function, by causing his ears to be cut off (T). As for Phasaël, he easily foresaw that he could not escape some cruel death; but being bound with chains, and unable to kill himself by any other way, he knocked his brains out against a stone. Our historian adds, that there was a report that his wounds not being mortal, Antigonus sent some physicians to him, under pretence of trying to cure, but in reality to poison them, and make sure of him. However, he had the pleasure before his death to hear that his brother was escaped, and got to Rhinocorura, and there it was that Herod heard of his death. The Parthians having thus far performed their contract with Antigonus, began their march homeward, and took the unfortunate high-priest with them, to prevent any fresh tumults being raised upon his account. b

By that time Herod was got from Rhinocorura to Pelusium, he received a message from the Arabian king, who was now ashamed of his baseness, with an apology, and new offers of his service; but he rejected them, and would have imbarqued for Rome, but the sailors obstinately refused to take him in; whereupon he applied himself to the magistrates of the city, who received him with great honour, and provided him another ship. During his stay in Egypt, he was courted by Cleopatra to continue there longer; the Maccabish book often quoted adds, that she offered to make him her prime minister, and general of all her forces; but he was fully bent upon going to Rome with all speed, and getting on board a vessel, which was bound to Pamphylia, a violent storm forced them to land at Rhodes, where he met with some friends and assistance, and passed thence to Brundisium, and came at length to Rome. Here he addressed himself first to Antony, and then to Octavianus, to whom he related all that had happened in Judæa, and the desperate condition his affairs were in; and partly by his intreaties, and reminding them of his father's friendship to Julius Caesar, and partly by the promise of a large sum of money, did so work upon them, that they resolved to assist him to the utmost of their power. Antony, on the score of the old kindnesses of Antipater, did even perform more than Herod expected or even desired of them. The utmost of his aim was, to have had Aristobulus the brother of his beloved Mariamne settled on the throne (U), and himself to have been at the head of the Jewish affairs under him, as his father had been under Hyrcaan; whereas the triumvirs did actually resolve to procure him the crown, though this was contrary to the Roman method, who, in cases of the like nature, did always pay such a due regard to the royal line of their dependent kings, as not to set up a stranger over them; but our triumvirs interest easily over-ruled that good maxim. c

The senate was accordingly convened, and Herod introduced to them by Massala and Atratinus, two noble senators, who there set forth the merits of Antipater's family to the Roman nation, and represented Antigonus as a turbulent and seditious person, and a known enemy to their nation, who had not scrupled to accept of the Jewish d

(T) The Mosaic law (18) required that the high-priest should be perfect in all his limbs, &c. so that upon the loss of any of them, he was to be immediately divested of that office, and another was to be chosen in his room.

Josephus adds, that Antigonus was not able to pay the Parthian king the five hundred women, because Herod had seized upon them, and carried them off into his place of retreat.

(U) This prince had certainly the best title to the crown, being the son of Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcaan, by Alexander the son of Aristobulus, the brother of that pontiff; so that the right of those two brothers were united in him.

- a crown from the hands of the Parthians. To this Antony added, how advantageous it would be to his expedition against Parthia, to have such a stedfast friend as Herod to be king of Judæa; upon which he was unanimously chosen by the senate, and Antigonus voted an enemy to them. As soon as the decree was passed, Herod was conducted with great ceremony into the capitol, Octavianus and Antony marching on each side of him (W), accompanied by the consuls and senators; where, after the usual sacrifices, the decree was deposited among the archives, after which Antony gave them a magnificent entertainment. Thus Herod became king of Judæa, by the friendship and interest of Antony and Augustus, in the consulship of Caius Domitius Calvinus, and Caius Asinius Pollio. The condition he had left his affairs in Judæa, and his family in Idumea, not permitting to stay longer than seven days after his inauguration, he set out again for Brundisium, and sailed from thence to Ptolemais, where he landed about the latter end of the summer, so that he spent but three months in this expedition both by sea and land P.
- Year of the flood 2959.

- b WHILE he was thus successful at Rome, Antigonus had so closely besieged the fortrefs of Massada, that, though it was well provided with all other necessaries, yet they were much distressed for want of water, insomuch that Joseph, who commanded there, was contriving means to make a desperate sally, and to break through the besiegers, in order to escape into Arabia, and get some fresh succour from Malchus, who, as we hinted before, was highly ashamed of his late treatment of Herod. But, happily for him, the very night he intended to sally out, there fell such a heavy rain, as filled all their cisterns again; so that he thought on nothing now but how to make a brave defence, till his brother came and relieved him, whilst he still made some bold sallies, and killed not a few of the besiegers. In the mean time Ventidius the Roman general in Syria, having driven the Parthians out of that province, came and incamped in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, under pretence of relieving Massada, but in reality to extort money from Antigonus: for as soon as this last had satisfied his greediness with a good round sum, he marched away, leaving, for formality's sake, some part of his men with Silo, a pensioner, whom Antigonus had been forced to make by dint of money, till he could get himself strengthened by the Parthians, whose assistance he was still in hopes of.
- Massada besieged by Antigonus.
- c Herod on the other hand was not idle, his thoughts were wholly bent upon relieving his distressed family; but especially his beloved Mariamne, a princess, who was indeed very well worth all his care and concern, whether we consider her as descended from a long series of illustrious kings and high-priests, or a person of exalted virtue and merit, and adorned with the most endearing charms of body and mind. As soon therefore as he was arrived at Ptolemais, he got an army together of Jewish and other troops, which his generosity still increased as fast as he went, insomuch that a very little time had brought almost the whole province of Galilee into his interest. At the same time his friend Antony sent orders by Dellius to Ventidius to assist him with all his forces; so that he was now strong enough to march against Antigonus, and to relieve Massada. He stopped however to lay siege to Joppa, a place of too great importance to be left behind in the hands of the enemy. Silo took this opportunity to withdraw his forces from him, and was like to have paid dear for his desertion. For Antigonus fell upon him, and had infallibly defeated him, had not Herod come to his rescue. Joppa being soon after surrendered, he marched directly to relieve his besieged friends, and in spight of the many ambushes which Antigonus did lay in his way, and the treachery of Silo, who extorted money from both sides, and did all he could to obstruct instead of assisting him; he reached Massada, forced the enemy to raise the siege (X), and was joyfully received by all his family q.

Herod marches
salem.

By this time Herod's army was greatly increased, not only by the garison of Massada,^a but by other reinforcements, which came voluntary from other parts, and enabled him to go and form the siege of Jerusalem. He took Rbessa in his way, and being come before the metropolis, he caused a general amnesty to be proclaimed, extending to all, none excepted, that had joined with Antigonus, and came over to him within a limited time. To this Antigonus answered, addressing himself to Silo, and the rest of the Roman soldiers, who were come to assist Herod in the siege; "that " it was a shameful injustice in the senate to set a private person on the throne, who " was an Idumean, or half Jew, contrary to the Jewish laws, and right of succes" sion; that if they resented his receiving the crown from the Parthians, there were " still enough left of the royal and sacerdotal race, who had deserved, to the full,^b
" as well of the Romans as Herod, and on whom they might more justly bestow it". The contest between the two rivals rose at length to such a height, that Antigonus caused some volleys of arrows to be shot upon the enemy, and forced them to retire. Here arose a fresh mutiny, supposed to have been underhand encouraged by Silo; his soldiers complaining aloud of the want of money, provisions, and better winter quarters; Herod was forced to send out for fresh supplies for them, which came afterwards in such plenty, that there was not the least pretence left for a revolt. The city of Jericho did however fall a sacrifice to the Roman greediness; they plundered it of all its riches, which amounted to an immense value; after which Herod was forced to send them into winter quarters in Samaria, Idumea, and Galilee, whilst Antigonus, to^c curry favour with Antony, obtained of Silo, as a great favour, that part of the Roman army might be sent into Lydda, which still held out for him.

THE season by this time being too far advanced to begin the siege of Jerusalem, Herod having well glutted and quartered his Roman auxiliaries, sent his brother Joseph into Idumea, with a thousand foot, and four hundred horse, whilst he went and secured his family in the city of Samaria; from thence he went and took some fortresses in Galilee from Antigonus, and among others that of Sephoris, which had been abandoned by the garison, and where he found great store of provisions. From thence he sent a detachment into the territories of Arbela, which was sadly infested with gangs of banditti; but as they could not ferret them out of their lurking-places, he marched^d against them with his whole army, and was as boldly encountered by their whole force. An obstinate fight ensued, in which his left wing began to give way; but he came so timely to their aid, that he gained a complete victory; by which he became master of all Galilee, except those rocky parts into which the defeated banditti retired. He rewarded his troops with a noble donative of a hundred and fifty drachms to each private man, and so proportionably to those of a higher rank, and then sent them into winter quarters. Silo left him soon after to follow Ventidius into Parthia, and Herod, who could hardly stay for the return of the spring, to put himself into action, resolved, if possible, to rid himself and the country of the remaining gangs of banditti. The inaccessibleness of their lurking-holes made it almost impracticable; but^e Herod having caused a number of iron chests to be made, and filled with soldiers, which let them down with iron chains, he made great execution amongst them, till night obliged them to withdraw, when he caused a general pardon to be proclaimed to all who should come and surrender themselves. But this having reduced but a few of them, his soldiers by next morning went and set some combustible matter on fire at the mouth of their caverns, put all within in a flame, and smothered those it could not burn; and

(so called by his father Asinius Pollio, the then Roman consul, in memory of his taking Salona, a city in Dalmatia) and which gave occasion to the fourth eclogue of Virgil, in which that poet has given such a noble description of the golden age, which this child was to restore to the world; that he is justly supposed to have stolen it, not so much out of the pretended sibylline oracles, as from the prophecies concerning the reign of the Messiah, the true prince of peace. For as they were translated by that time into Greek, they may be reasonably supposed to have been read by him, and perhaps further explained to him by the Jews, who, if we may believe Cicero (32), were very numerous at that time at Rome.

That Virgil proved a false prophet with respect to his wonderful child, the event has shewn, since he lived but nine days. But that the more miraculous child Jesus, who was born forty years after (33), has left us such a divine set of laws, as fully answer the glorious description which the prophets have given us of his reign; and which, duly and universally observed, would easily eclipse all that the poets have sung concerning their fabulous golden age, cannot be denied, our enemies themselves being judges.

- a yet such was their obstinacy, that they chose rather to perish than accept of a pardon. A notable instance of which the reader may see in the margin (Y).

Herod thinking by this time that he had pretty near reduced their gang, left the country under the command of Ptolemy, at the head of as many forces as he thought would suffice to keep it in awe; and took the road to Samaria, where he had left his family, with a design to go, and either begin the siege of Jerusalem, or bring Antigonus to a battle. He was no sooner gone, but those whom he had lately drove over Jordan, returned again, slew Ptolemy, and ravaged the country afresh; so that he was forced to come back with fresh forces, with which he so effectually destroyed them, and their lurking-places, and fined those towns so severely, which had given

- b them either shelter or relief, that he quite rid the province of that destructive vermine ^r.

THE Parthians having been defeated soon after by Ventidius, as shall be seen in the next chapter, that general by order of Antony sent Machæras with two legions and a thousand horse to assist Herod in his war against Antigonus; but this last having gained him over by a large sum, Machæras would needs march towards him under pretence of examining the strength of the place. Herod having tried in vain to dissuade him from it, began to suspect him of some treachery; but held his peace for the present. Not so did Antigonus, who seeing the Romans draw near the walls of Jerusalem, conceived such jealousy of them, that he caused his men to let fly some volleys of

- c arrows and stones against them, which so exasperated him, that he returned to Emmaus, and turned his arms against the Jews there, slaying indiscriminately all that came in his way, and among them a number of Herod's friends. Herod, who was then on the point of going to pay his respects to Antony at the siege of Samofata, threatened to complain of it to him; but Machæras hastening after, prevailed upon him to be reconciled, and to leave his brother Joseph, and a number of forces with him, to carry on the war during his absence; on this condition however, that they should undertake nothing that was hazardous till his return. In his march to Antony's camp, he was forced to fight his way through some bands of free-booters, or, as the fourth of the Maccabees calls them^s, wild Arabs, who had attacked him in the rear, which would
- d have been all cut off, if he had not come back to their assistance, and defeated the thievish gang. At his arrival before Samofata, he was received with all the marks of honour and esteem by the Roman triumvir, and did him many gallant services at that siege. In requital of which, when the city was taken, Antony left Sosius governor of Syria with the command of the Roman forces, and orders to assist Herod with them whenever he required it.

Herod on his return found his affairs strangely altered for the worse; his brother Joseph having forgot his orders, had made an incursion against Jericho, with his own troops, and five legions, which he received from Machæras; but the Roman horse being unfit for such rocky ground as he was then incamped upon, the enemy surprised

e and defeated him, after a noble defence, in which himself was killed by Pappus the Roman general. Antigonus caused his head to be cut off, and carried in triumph with him; but his brother Pheroras redeemed it soon after at the price of fifty talents. The consequence of this defeat was the total revolt of Galilee, where the wealthiest of Herod's party were barbarously flung in great numbers into the lake of Tiberias. Idumea was also on the point of revolting, when Herod appeared at the head of a fresh army, and in a little time reduced those two provinces again. At Jericho, where he gave an entertainment to his friends, he was twice in danger of his life, the first time by the fall of the banquetting-house, which the guests had but just quitted; and on the next day by a party of six thousand Antigonians, who came and assaulted his van-guard, f and where he received a wound. His army still increasing, and Machæras stoutly defending himself against Antigonus, a battle was soon fought between the two anta-

(Y) Our historian tells us (34), that an old man being hid in one of these caverns, his wife and seven sons, who were with him, did earnestly beseech him to suffer them to surrender themselves; but he placing himself at the mouth of the cave, stabbed them one after another, as they attempted

gonists, wherein Herod gained a complete victory, and made a horrid slaughter of a the enemy: Pappus being found among the dead, he ordered his head to be cut off, and sent to Pheroras. His eagerness to revenge his brother's death, made him pursue his flying enemy with such uncommon swiftness and cruelty, that had he not been prevented by a violent storm, he might have gone strait to Jerusalem, and have taken it with ease, Antigonus being by that time so reduced, that he was upon the point of abandoning it; but by that time winter coming on, and the soldiers not being able to bear the fatigues of a siege, Herod put them into winter-quarters, and set about getting ready all things necessary for beginning it early the following spring ^c.

WHILST these preparations were making, Herod went to Samaria, and there consummated his marriage with Mariamne, whom he had betrothed four years before; but b had been hindered from marrying through the many troubles he was entangled in, though he had an extreme desire to see this union once happily accomplished (Z). By this time he had got a reinforcement of thirty thousand men, and Sosius, who had been sent to his assistance at the head of eleven legions, and six thousand horse, besides some auxiliary troops hired from Syria, was marching through Phœnice to join him, and with this numerous army, they went and besieged Jerusalem (A). The besieged on the other hand were no less numerous and resolute for a vigorous defence, the city being filled with Jews, who flocked thither from all parts of the kingdom. But these wanted military experience, and trusted either to their strength and courage, or to the sacredness of the temple, which they seemed confident would be defended by c some miraculous providence against an Idumean usurper, and an army of idolatrous Romans. They did likewise annoy the besiegers by frequent private sallies, in which they spoiled great quantities of their provisions and forage. But on the fortieth day of the siege, the Romans, in spite of the stout resistance from within, found means to scale the outward wall, and to make themselves masters of it; and on the fiftieth they got within the second, when some of the galleries about the temple being set on fire, Herod threw all the odium of it on Antigonus. The lower city being taken, the besieged betook themselves to the higher, and to the temple, where they suffered very much through famine, it being the sabbatic year ^d. However, they built a new wall instead of that which was beaten down, countermined the enemy, and fought sometimes above and sometimes under-ground, and with more despair than true courage. At length, after a five months close siege, by so numerous an army (B), Herod finding them as obstinate as ever, ordered a general assault to be made, which both his and the Roman troops performed with such vigour, that they forced them at length to surrender. Antigonus himself came down from a tower, where he had defended himself as long as he could, threw himself at Sosius's feet, and in the most abject and submissive guise implored his mercy. But the elated Roman, instead of expressing the least concern for that unfortunate prince, upbraided him with cowardice and effeminacy, calling him in the feminine gender Antigona, and ordered e him to be put under a strong guard. The Romans at the same time having dispersed themselves through all the quarters of the upper city, made a terrible slaughter of the Jews, and plundered and ravaged every place they came near, to be revenged, as they expressed it, for the length and fatigue of the siege. The very sanctuary was in danger of undergoing the same fate, had not Herod prevented it, partly by fair, partly by threatening words, and even by mere force. He sent at the same time a severe message to Sosius, complaining, that if this plunder and butchery were not

(Z.) We have already given the character and descent of this excellent prince, and Herod had great reason to hope that this marriage would effectually reconcile him to the Jewish nation, whom he knew to retain an affectionate zeal for the Asmonean family, of which she was descended by the two brothers, Hyrcan and Aristobulus, as we hinted in a former note. This he thought would likewise facilitate the surrender of Jerusalem, by withdrawing numbers of the besieged Jews from the faction of Antigonus.

(A) Josephus tells us, that the Roman legions did not consist of a certain number, but amounted, some to four thousand, some to five thousand, and some to six thousand; but however, if we take them at the lowest, and join to them the Jewish and Syrian forces, this army must have amounted to above sixty thousand men.

(B) All this while Herod still behaved with great moderation towards the Antigonians, not only promising them his pardon, and kind reception, but at their desire, supplying them with all necessary victims for their daily and other sacrifices, not doubting but that he might in time mollify them into a surrender, but all proved in vain (34).

a stopped, the Romans would leave him king only of a bare wilderness; and that as for himself, he should look upon his success as the most unhappy thing that could befall him, if it must be attended with the profanation of that sacred place, the access to which was permitted to none but to the Jewish priests. To all this Sofius answered, that he did not well know how to forbid his troops the plundering of a place that had been taken by assault; so that Herod saw himself under a necessity of saving both temple and city from all further devastation, by a large donative out of his own coffers.

b Thus was this city taken after a siege of near six months (C), and with its surrender, ended the reign of the Asmoneans, after it had continued a hundred and twenty-nine years from Judas Maccabeus taking the Jewish government upon him (D). Antigonus, the last male of that race that bore the regal title, was clapped in irons by Sofius, who having presented a crown of gold to the temple, left Jerusalem, and took the unhappy prince with him, and delivered him to Antony; by whom he was, at the earnest solicitations of Herod, put to a shameful death (E), in the third year of his reign ^a.

(C) Reckoning from Herod's first setting down before it; for it was not till some time after that Sofius joined him with his troops, and carried on the siege jointly with him.

(D) Josephus reckons but a hundred and twenty-six years (35); but he must be understood only from the time that Judas was established in his government by his peace with Antiochus, three years after he had taken it into his hands.

It is true, however, his successors did not take the title of kings, as we have seen in the course of this section, till Aristobulus, or rather till Alexander Jannæus; but that family still enjoyed the peculiar privilege of joining the pontifical with the regal or supreme dignity.

(E) The Jewish historian observes, that Antony would willingly have reserved Antigonus for his future triumph, but that Herod, who feared every thing from his rival, if he should ever have an opportunity to plead his own cause before the senate, ceased not to importune that general to put him to death, and obtained it at last by a large sum of money. But he caused that unhappy prince to be executed in so shameful a manner, as he given just occasion to several ancient authors to condemn it as a piece of injustice and cruelty, never till then allowed of by the Romans (26).

For having caused him to be condemned as a private criminal, and without regard to his illustrious descent, the sentence was executed accordingly at Antioch, where having been first tied and whipped at a stake, his head was cut off, after having been all along flattered with promises of life. This punishment Strabo in the place above-quoted observes, had never been inflicted on any crowned head; but Antony thought it necessary by such an ignominious death to render him contemptible to the Jews, to prevent their raising any new tumults against his generous friend Herod (37).

SECT. V.

The history of the Jews from Herod to the birth of CHRIST.

a THE taking of Jerusalem, and the death of Antigonus, having now fixed Herod ^{Herod's cruel} upon the Jewish throne, he was soon obliged to bend his thoughts on two im- ^{beginning.} portant concerns; the one to replenish his coffers exhausted, partly by the large sums with which he had been forced to buy the friendship of the Roman generals, and even Antony himself; and partly by the profuseness with which he rewarded his own and the Roman troops for their past services, and especially for saving the city and temple from plunder and ruin: the other was to suppress the opposite Jewish faction, which, in spite of his rival's ignominious death, retained an invincible attachment to the Asmonean family, and an irreconcilable hatred to his own. These two points, which could not be gained, the one without a great deal of oppression, and the other b without much cruelty and blood-shed, we must look upon as the two main springs of all his actions, and the causes of his uneasy reign. Accordingly, upon his having got possession of that metropolis, he caused all the gold, silver, and other valuable things he found in it, to be carried into his own palace, by which he amassed immediately an immense treasure; but as a great part of it had been already promised to the Romans, and was actually given to them, he reimbursed himself by the forfeiture of the estates of the Antigonian faction, causing the wealthiest of them to be seized, and forty-five of the principal of them to be put to death (A). And such

(A) We took notice in the last section, that Herod spared that very Sameas, who had appeared the most

was his jealousy in this respect, that he caused guards to be planted at their gates, ^a to examine, as they were carrying them to their graves, whether they were really dead, and whether any riches were conveyed off with their bodies; in which case they were seized upon, and sent into his treasury. Upon the whole, his necessities and profuseness were so great, that he spared no extortion to supply them; inasmuch that this being the sabbatic year, in which there was neither planting nor sowing, and all the country round about having been so terribly plundered and ravaged, both before and during the siege, nothing less than a grievous famine was expected to have filled the whole land ^a.

Herod had still another rival left, who, though at a great distance from him, and kept, as it were, a prisoner in Parthia, did not suffer his mind to be at ease, till he had ^b quite rid himself of him. This was Hyrcan the deposed king and high-priest, whom Pacorus had carried thither with him in chains. But when Pbraartes came to be informed of his high birth and dignity, he generously took off his chains, and permitted him to live in Babylon, where he was highly respected, not only by the great numbers of Jews who dwelt in that city, but likewise by all those that lived beyond the Euphrates, who all looked upon him as their rightful prince, and high-priest. Their veneration for him was raised still higher, when they understood that Herod had filled the pontifical chair with an old acquaintance of his own, named Ananel, ^a a descendant of one of those priestly families that settled at Babylon after the captivity, and whom that politic prince caused to be fetched from thence merely on the score of ^c his meanness and obscurity; that being without friends or interest in Judaea, he might be contented with his sacerdotal function, without interfering with the regal prerogative.

Hyrcan might then have thought himself happy in his exile, being thus respected by the Parthian king, and by all the Jews of the dispersion: yet such was his love for his country, or rather his fatal confidence in the new Jewish monarch, that as soon as he heard of his being on the throne, he conceived a great desire of spending the

Jew, who had been a great stickler for Hyrcan against him; and these were not the only two instances of Herod's clemency. We have elsewhere seen other marks of his generous forgiveness; and it is likely, that if he could have supported his new regal dignity without those violent means, which the obstinacy of the Jews, and the emptiness of his coffers forced him to, it would have been much more agreeable to his temper, which was really generous even to profuseness.

However, we must own, that these two great men, whom he not only spared above all the rest, but took into his special favour and confidence, had, notwithstanding all the incense which the rabbies give them for their courage and intrepidity, taken care to make their peace with him, during the siege, by exhorting the besieged to open their gates to him.

For whilst the Antigonian faction were encouraging the superstitious Jews with crying the temple of the Lord, and making them expect some miraculous deliverance, these two politicians, foreseeing that the city could not hold out much longer against such a vigorous siege, and under the excessive want of all provisions, did with a kind of prophetic confidence assure them, that all resistance was vain, since the thing was from the Lord, who for their sins was now bringing them in subjection to this foreigner (38). So that had Herod been of a more vindictive temper than he really was, yet this piece of service could not have failed of reconciling them to his favour.

There was indeed some ground for what they affirmed in favour of Herod, if what Josephus (39) says be true, that one Menahem, a cotemporary of theirs, and an Essenian, endowed with the spirit of prophecy, had long before foretold his rise to the crown; the story runs thus:

Herod being met one day by this Menahem, then a boy, whilst himself was amongst his school-fellows, was accosted by him in a serious manner, with a Hail, king of the Jews; and was assured by him that providence had determined to raise him from his Plinian extraction to that supreme dignity. The young prophet at the same time bid him remember, when he was come to it, that it was his duty to govern with justice and equity, though, added he in the conclusion, I foresee that you will take quite different methods, and thereby bring a miserable end upon your head.

Herod however did not think any more of it till he had got the crown; but then calling to mind his prediction, he sent for him, to inquire how long he should reign, not doubting but that he, who had foretold him the one, might as easily tell him the other. Menahem not answering directly to the question, was asked again, whether he thought that he should reign ten years; Yes, yes, answered the Essene, twenty or thirty, and there stopped; and Herod being satisfied with that number, urged him no further.

Menahem was then, it seems (40), vice-president of the Sanhedrin, under Hillel, the same, as is supposed, whom Josephus calls Pollio; but Herod having drawn him into his service, appointed Sameas to succeed him in that office. From that time, not only Menahem, but his whole sect, grew in great favour with that monarch. We shall find a proper place to speak more fully of the Essenes, when we come to describe the different sects which reigned in our Saviour's time among the Jews.

- a remainder of his life with him. His friends, to whom he communicated his thoughts, tried in vain to dissuade him from it, by representing to him the folly and hazard of putting himself in that monarch's power, especially since he could hardly expect either greater honour or happiness at Jerusalem, than he enjoyed at Babylon. But could arguments have prevailed with him, Herod would have left no means untried to have frustrated them, and made sure of him. He began however with sending him a kind invitation to come and bear a partnership with him of his power and grandeur, and reap the fruits of his gratitude for his former kindness. But lest this invitation should fail, he backed it with an embassy to Pbraartes, in which he begged of him to give the pontiff leave to return to Judea. Santacalla, who was charged with this embassy, was ordered to make some considerable presents to the Parthian king and court, and succeeded so well in his negotiation, that Hyrcau, in spite of all the remonstrances of his friends to the contrary, left his safe asylum for Jerusalem, where Herod at first received him with great friendship and magnificence, and forgot nothing that could possibly conceal the treacherous design he was hatching against his life ^b.

- WHILST this was doing, Herod was not a little disturbed with domestic jars. Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcau, and mother of Aristobulus and Mariamne, a woman of a haughty spirit, could not bear with any patience, to see an obscure Babylonish priest preferred before her son to the pontifical dignity, from which Hyrcau was now disabled by the loss of his ears. She was ever expostulating with him the injury done to her son, and insisting, that the pontifical dignity belonging in right of succession to him alone, as being descended by father and mother from Alexander Jannæus (B), none but he ought in justice to be invested with it. But Herod, who was conscious that the young prince had an equal right likewise to the regal dignity, which he now usurped from him, was afraid to grant her the one, lest she should find some means in time of seizing upon the other. This obliged her to write to Cleopatra, not doubting but her interest with Antony might greatly influence that general in favour of her son. It was impossible for her to carry on that correspondence so closely, but Herod had some intimation of it; and fearing the worst from those two intriguing princesses, he was forced for the present to consent to have Ananel deposed, and Aristobulus invested with that dignity, pretending that he had only given it to the former, till the latter was come to be of an age fit for it (C).

THIS condescension of Herod, backed with so plausible an excuse, wrought a kind of reconciliation between them, but which was nothing less than sincere on either side,

(B) Aristobulus, as the son of Alexander, and grandson of Hyrcau and of Aristobulus; the sons of Alexander Jannæus, had the right both to the regal and pontifical dignity united in him. For he was grandson to the former by his mother Alexandra, who was his only child; and by his father Alexander, he was grandson to Aristobulus. By his descent from the latter, he had a right to the high-priesthood, which was fixed to the male line; and by his descent from both, he would have had the only title to the crown also, had not the Romans transferred it to Herod (41).

(C) This is the third person that had hitherto been deposed from the pontifical dignity since the Jews return from the Babylonish captivity, and Herod was so sensible of the illegality of it, that when Antony sent to desire him to put Aristobulus into Ananel's room, he excused himself from it at first, by remonstrating to him, that such depositions were contrary to the Mosaic law; according to which, it is certain, that dignity could not end but with the death of its possessor, unless some illegal defect happened to disqualify him †.

The first instance we read of this irregular proceeding is, that of Jafon's or Jesui's supplanting his brother Onias, and by a larger sum of money buying that dignity of Antiochus, in prejudice of the incumbent (42). The other was that of Hyrcau by his nephew Aristobulus, who wrested that dignity from him by main force. But these depositions became afterwards so frequent, that there was hardly any other way of coming into that office, but by the expulsion of the incumbent.

The fourth book of Maccabees says, that Antony having sent a pressing command to Herod to send Aristobulus to him, Herod not daring to venture that young prince out of his sight, halted to make him high-priest before he read that general's orders; and then sent him word, that he being now invested with the pontifical dignity, it was unlawful for him to stir out of the Jewish dominions (43).

Josephus agrees in part with that author (44), but adds, that Antony having received the pictures of Mariamne and Aristobulus, which their mother by the advice of Cleopatra, had sent to him, that their extreme beauty might make a favourable impression on that effeminate general; Antony not daring to send for Mariamne, desired only Aristobulus to be sent to him. But Herod not daring to trust so beautiful a young person, who was then but sixteen years old, with one so infamous for his incontinency, was forced to excuse his refusal, with pretending that the young prince was so great a darling of the Jewish nation, that it would infallibly involve it into a civil war, should he comply with his request.

especially on Herod's, who still suspected the intrigues of the mother, and the merit ^a of the son, whose high birth, and blooming virtues, joined to a graceful person, attracted the eyes and hearts of the Jewish nation. Upon some pretence therefore or other, he quarrelled with Alexandra, forbade her to meddle with any public affairs, and at last caused her to be confined to her palace, and to be closely watched. In the mean time, Cleopatra having sent her and her son an invitation to come to her, she was easily persuaded to accept it, since she could now only look upon herself as Herod's prisoner, from whose jealousy she had every thing to fear. The difficulty was how to conceal their flight from his watchful spies: she intrusted her design only to two faithful servants, one of whom was to procure her a ship to carry them off, and the other to provide two coffins, one for her son, and the other for herself, to convey ^b them in that manner to the ship. But unfortunately one of the two servants inadvertently mentioned the matter to a third, whom he thought to have been in the secret, who immediately took hold of this opportunity to ingratiate himself to Herod, and made a full discovery of the design. Herod stayed only till the mother and son were conveyed some part of the way in their coffins, and then caused them to be arrested, and brought back. His fear however of Cleopatra's resentment, prevented his expressing his own against them; and since he found it unsafe to punish them, he put on the mask of clemency, and was outwardly reconciled to them, but from that moment resolved to get rid of the young prince.

AN accident happened soon after, which determined him to hasten his death. ^c The feast of the tabernacles, one of the three grand festivals, was come, which was usually solemnized with the greatest magnificence [†]; when the new high-priest, who was then about seventeen years of age, appeared at the altar in his pontifical ornaments, and officiated with such majesty and grace, that the people thought they beheld all the merit and grandeur of his ancestors revived in him. They could not forbear filling the temple and city with their praises, which raised the tyrant's jealousy to such a height, as made him resolve to put his murdering design in execution with utmost speed. Accordingly, as soon as the solemnity was over, he went with him to Jericho, where Alexandra had invited them to a sumptuous entertainment. The weather being hot, Aristobulus was invited to bathe in a fine fish-pond in that neigh- ^d bourhood, where some of Herod's hired creatures were swimming; and where, as soon as they had him in their hands, they kept him still under water, till he was dead. This bloody deed was glossed over with the specious pretence of its being done in sport, by accident, and without any design on the pontiff's life; and Herod not only seemed to believe it, but took all the pains he could to have it thought so by the rest, by putting himself into the deepest mourning for him, ordering a stately monument to be erected to his memory, and his funeral obsequies to be performed with utmost magnificence. This was the end of young Aristobulus, which filled the city and kingdom with inexpressible grief; he died in the eighteenth year of his age, having scarce enjoyed his dignity one whole year, which upon his death returned to Ananel. ^e

Acquitted.

ALL these grimaces of Herod to disculpate himself of the murder, were easily seen through by the people, and only rendered him more odious to them, and much more so to his own family. Alexandra, at the first news of her son's death, could scarcely be kept from laying violent hands on herself; but upon cooler thoughts, she prevailed on herself to conceal her resentment against the tyrant, that she might the more easily compass his ruin. She wrote to acquaint Cleopatra with his treachery, and that princess, moved rather by her ambition and avarice, than by a sense of pity or of horror for the crime, ceased not to solicit Antony to punish the murderer, in hopes that after his death, she might easily obtain his kingdom for herself. Antony being at length pre- ^f vailed upon, sent orders to Herod to come and clear himself before him at Laodicea, whether he was then a coming, and Cleopatra along with him. Herod was obliged to obey, though much against his will; but took care to bribe his judge so high, that upon his appearing before him, he was most basely absolved, and Cleopatra's avarice compensated with the province of Cælo-Syria, instead of that of Judæa.

Herod however, not knowing how it would go with him in Syria, had before his departure given express orders to his uncle Joseph, whom he left governor during his absence, that in case he was cast for his life, he should put his beloved Mariamne to death. The violence of his passion for that princess extorted this inhuman coma mand from him. He knew that the fame of her beauty had long since captivated the Roman triumvir, and the thoughts of leaving her in the possession of such a rival, even after his death, were more dreadful to him than any death he could inflict on him; and his uncle was forced to rid him of that anguish by the promise of a punctual obedience. When he was gone, Joseph, who waited daily on her, either on affairs of state, or to pay his respects to her, took all opportunities of extolling Herod's extreme passion for her, and at length was indiscreet enough to disclose the fatal orders he had left with him, as an irrefragable proof of the greatness and sincerity of it. But the queen looking upon it rather as an argument of his jealousy and inhumanity, conceived from it a more invincible hatred against him. In the mean time there was a b rumour spread through the city, whether by Herod's enemies, or by some of his subtle agents, that Antony had put him to a cruel death; which cast the whole court, but especially Alexandra and Mariamne, into a great consternation. Alexandra had by this time been informed with the bloody orders left with Joseph; to prevent the execution of which, she went to him, and strove with all her eloquence to persuade him to leave Jerusalem, and to go and put themselves under the protection of the Roman eagles that were planted in the neighbourhood of the city (D). Their deliberations were quickly broken off by letters from Herod, which informed her, that he had not only gained his cause, but that Antony was daily heaping fresh marks of his affection upon him, and that he should soon return to Jerusalem more strengthened than

 c ever in his kingdom. This news made them lay aside their design; but as they had not carried it on so closely, but Salome had received some intimation of it, she failed not to inform her brother of it upon his arrival. Some injurious reflections which Mariamne had cast on the meanness of her birth, had exasperated her so far, that she had vowed a most dreadful revenge; and she took this opportunity of completing it, by accusing her of having held too great a familiarity with Joseph during his absence, though he was both her own uncle and husband (E).

Mariamne did easily clear her innocence, upon her first interview with the king; but whilst he was entertaining her with the protestations of his love to her, she could not forbear at length mentioning the orders he had left with his uncle, as rather a d token of his barbarity to her. These words, which stabbed that jealous monarch to the heart, made him conclude, that nothing less than the criminal conversation, with which Salome had accused her, could have induced his uncle to disclose the fatal secret. In the first sally of his fury, he was on the point of sacrificing her with his own hand, had not his love prevailed over his resentment. But Joseph and Alexandra fell the unhappy victims of his rage; the first of whom he caused to be put to immediate death, refusing even to see him, or hear what could be urged in his defence; the latter he caused to be put in chains, and confined to a close prison under a strong guard, as the main cause of all this mischief.

His fury was soon after diverted by the coming of Cleopatra into Judæa, in her e return from the Euphrates, whither she had accompanied Antony. That princess, whose avarice was as insatiable as her lust, had disobliged him sensibly by both these passions. On the one hand, she had obtained from her paramour all the fertile territories of Jericho, which were by far the richest and pleasantest of all Judæa, especially upon the score of the balm (F), and the great quantity of palm-trees which grew in it,

Cleopatra

(D) The eagles were the principle standards of the Roman legions; they used to be set up in some eminent place of their camp to receive the adoration of the army, and to protect those who took sanctuary under them, they being allowed an inviolable asylum to such.

The Romans had left a legion in the neighbourhood of that metropolis under the command of one Julius, and it was under his standards that Alexandra proposed to take refuge, when the news of her son-in-law's death came to her ears.

(E) We have had occasion to shew in a former volume, how far it was lawful, according to the law of Moses, for an uncle to marry his niece, tho' not for an aunt to marry her nephew. We refer the reader to what has been further said upon that head by a late learned writer (45).

(F) This precious plant, so famous for its balsam, the most valuable of all ointments, is affirmed by Pliny (46) to have grown only in two gardens belonging to the Jewish monarchs, one of them containing only twenty acres, and the other still somewhat less. But Cleopatra caused a number of them to be carried into Egypt, where it is said to grow in great quantity at this very day (47).

But it is plain beyond all controversy, that this plant is the natural growth of Arabia, especially in the neighbourhoods of Mecca and Medina, where it grows wild even in sandy grounds, though that which is cultivated in gardens is reckoned the finest and brought Herod a considerable revenue ^d. On the other, she was soliciting that a monarch to an amour all the time she stayed with him. Herod, who had conceived a great aversion to her, was consulting all the time he entertained her with utmost magnificence, of some means of putting her to death, whilst he had her in his power; but his friends dreading the consequences of such a fact, did not only dissuade him from it, but prevailed on him to glut at least her avarice with costly presents, which he did with surprising profuseness. However, as he had refused to gratify her other predominant passion, he feared lest her resentment on that score, joining with the invincible hatred which the Jews had conceived against him, should one day prove fatal to him. To prevent which, after he had accompanied her as far as Pelusium, he went and fortified the castle of Massada, and furnished it with arms and provisions ^b for ten thousand men, that at all events he might have a sure place of refuge to flee to. At the same time he took constant care to send that princess the revenues of those territories which Antony had given from him to her, that she might have no pretence to fall out with him upon that score ^e.

BUT this was not sufficient to prevent the effects of that base princess's resentment; and she soon after laid such a plot against him, that all his strength and courage were hardly sufficient to save him from ruin. We have elsewhere taken notice that she had obtained a great many provinces from Antony, in Syria, Phœnice, and Arabia. The latter of these had paid tribute to her constantly enough, whilst Antony was in power; but after his defeat, at the battle of Actium, of which we shall speak in a more proper place, Malchus, then king of that country, refused all further payment to her. Herod, who had got a complete army, with which he designed to assist his friend Antony against Octavianus, received orders from him to turn his forces against the Arabians. This was Cleopatra's plot; who by bringing these two kings to a battle, proposed to get the territories of the conquered, let the victory fall on which side it would. But as her spight against Herod was most prevailing, she sent one of her generals, named Athenion, who equally hated him, at the head of an army, under pretence of assisting him, but in reality to betray and ruin him, because she foresaw that he was like to have the better of his enemy. For Herod upon the first encounter had given them a great overthrow, and obliged them to get a fresh army ^d together, which Malchus brought into Cælo-Syria. Here a second battle was fought near Cana (G), in which Herod was on the point of getting anew victory; when Athenion, who had stood neuter all the time of the engagement, fell upon his troops, before they could rally themselves, and in spite of Herod's speedy assistance and bravery, cut the greatest part of the Jews in pieces, and plundered their camp, Herod himself escaping with great difficulty, with a small number of his men ^f. The Maccabees book adds, that Athenion was ordered to surround that monarch with his troops, as soon as he had engaged those of the Arabians ^g. However that be, Herod from that time forbore coming to an engagement with them, and contented himself with making frequent incursions against them, incamping always on the mountains; by which he got this double advantage, that he harassed the enemy, and inured his own troops to the trade of war.

finest (48). We have taken notice in a former volume of some that grew near the lake Asphaltus, and which brought a considerable revenue to the owners [†].

The balm was gathered from the shrub in the months of July and August, and in some warmer grounds even in June. It either drops of itself, or is made to do so by incision, with a sharp knife made, not of iron or steel, which they say is death to the plant, but either of glass, flint, or ivory. The liquor that distils from the plant is whitish at the first, then by degrees turns greenish, yellowish, and when very old, almost of the colour of honey. It is at first thin, and by degrees contracts a density like our terebinth, and is of so light a body, that it swims on the surface of water, and when beaten with it, will turn white. There is so little that is brought genuine into England, that it is rarely used, though its virtues have been cried up by many ancient and modern authors; but even that which is least adulterated has a very ill quality amongst its excellent ones, namely, that the frequent use of it will in time dissolve the solid parts of the blood.

Besides what comes from the countries above-mentioned, there are some sorts of it brought from America, the most esteemed of which are those of Pern and Tholu.

Herod

- a Herod was by this time got into the seventh year of his reign^b, when Judæa was shaken with such an earthquake, as had never been felt before, and which destroyed great numbers of cattle, and many thousand persons who perished under the ruins of their houses (H). His troops indeed escaped the common ruin, because he kept them incamped in the open field; nevertheless, the great loss which the kingdom sustained by this calamity, obliged him to send an embassy to sue to the Arabians for peace. But by this time the account of his loss having been greatly magnified to them, they not only rejected his offers, but slew the ambassadors that brought them, and invaded Judæa with utmost speed, expecting to have found it destitute of defence. It was with the greatest difficulty that Herod kept his men from abandoning him; but having at length dispelled their fears, and offered the usual sacrifices, he went to meet the enemy on the other side of the Jordan, and there gave them two such signal defeats, that he forced them in their turn to sue for peace, and to accept it on his own conditions; after which he returned in triumph to Jerusalem^c (1).

- BUT his happiness was soon after troubled by the defeat of Antony by Augustus at the battle of Actium, by which he saw himself deprived of a most powerful as well as steady friend, and on the brink of falling a sacrifice to the conqueror's resentment. The best expedient he could think on under this consternation, was to send advice to Antony to put Cleopatra to death, and to seize on her kingdom and treasures; by which he might be enabled to raise new forces, and either make a fresh push for the empire, or, at the worst, obtain easier conditions of peace. He promised him on those terms to stick fast to his interest, and to furnish him with money, troops, and strong-holds, and all other assistance to carry on the war against his rival. But Antony was still too great a slave to that princess, to consent to such an expedient; which when Herod perceived, he thought no more but how to make his peace with the conqueror on the best terms he could. He had still another dread upon him as great as the displeasure of Cæsar. Hyrkan, the only surviving male of the Ashmonean race, had been formerly acknowledged king of Judæa, and as such, had entered into alliances with the Roman senate. Herod on the other hand had been chiefly upheld in his throne by the interest of Antony; and Alexandra, ever watchful for all opportunities of being revenged on the usurper, had begun to try to gain some advantage from the late change of affairs against him. Herod therefore, who had his spies about him, thought it unsafe to go to Augustus, till he had drawn the father and the daughter into a snare, which might afford him a pretence for putting the former to death, which he did by causing him to be beheaded in the eightieth year of his age (K).

THIS was the dismal end of that unfortunate prince, after a long series of unhappy vicissitudes. He was at first raised to the pontifical dignity by his mother Alexandra, and succeeded her soon after in the kingdom also; three months after which, he was deprived of both by his brother Aristobulus. He was restored to both by Pompey, and

(H) Our historian in one place mentions but ten thousand slain (50), but in another he makes them to amount to three myriads, or thirty thousand men (1); which last is the more likely of the two, and agrees much better with the description he gives of that calamity.

(1) The first of these battles was fought near Philadelphia, in which five thousand Arabians were either killed on the spot, or trod to death in their flight. Herod having afterwards closely besieged them in their camp, where they were ready to perish for want of water; they offered him at first fifty talents for their freedom, which being rejected, they in great numbers came to surrender themselves till the fifth day, on which the rest in despair, and without hopes or prospect of success, attacked him, and had seven thousand killed. Upon which they submitted to his conditions, one of which was, that he was declared by them governor or protector of their nation (2).

(K) So says the fourth book of the Maccabees (3). The trap into which he was drawn was a masterpiece of his politic rival, who corrupted some of his and his daughters confidants, to set on foot a kind of treasonable correspondence, whether real or counterfeited, with Malchus king of Arabia, wherein Hyrkan desired to put himself again under his protection, and begged of him to send him some horsemen to conduct him from a private place near Jerusalem, to the lake Asphaltites, which was about ninety miles distant from that metropolis.

Dositheus, the agent of this correspondence, betrayed to Herod both this letter and the answer, in which the Arabian king promised him a safe escort to convey him away; Herod summoned the pontiff before his council, and having taxed him with it, and upon his denial, shewed him the very letter, caused him to be condemned to die.

This last article Josephus tells us (4), he took as he found it in the commentary which Herod left behind him; but at the same time he relates the matter somewhat differently from other hands. We refer the reader for it to the place last quoted.

enjoyed them near forty years, till deposed again, and disqualified by Antigonus, who cut off his ears, and sent him prisoner into Parthia, from whence he unfortunately returned at the pressing invitation of Herod, who owed his life, crown, and all his greatness, to him, and who repaid all his kindnesses with a violent death¹.

Herod's next care before he departed, was to secure his family the best he could, in case he should miscarry in his address to Augustus. To that end, he committed his mother Cyprus, and his sister Salome, to the care of his brother Pheroras, whom he sent into the castle of Alexandria, with orders to this last to seize on the Jewish crown, and defend it to the last, in case he heard that it went ill with him. As for his wife Mariamne, and his mother Alexandra, he sent them into the strong fortress of Massada, and put them under the care of his treasurer, named Joseph, and of Sobemus, one of his chief confidants, with express orders to put those two princesses to death, as soon as he received the news of his ill success at the emperor's court; and then to go and assist his brother with all his power. He embarked soon after for Rhodes, where Augustus then was; and having obtained an audience from him, appeared before that prince in all his royal ornaments, except his diadem, and spoke to him with such a seeming confidence, as if he was sure before-hand to obtain what he came for. He made no difficulty to own his former attachment to Antony's interest, his assisting him with men, arms, money, and other necessaries for the war; and even the counsel he had given him after his defeat, of killing Cleopatra, and seizing on her kingdom, and immense treasure, in order to obtain a more advantageous peace. All this, said he, concluding his speech, I thought myself bound in honour, gratitude, and friendship, to do for Antony; but since he has rejected my last advice, and left me at liberty to make you a tender of my future services, if you think them worth your acceptance, and can but forget what is past, you shall find me henceforth as sincere and steadfast a friend to you, as I have been hitherto to your rival. An earnest of which he had already given to the emperor in the timely succour he had sent to Q. Didius, his governor in Syria, against Antony's gladiators (L). Augustus was very much taken both with his speech and gallant behaviour: he had likewise been acquainted with the succour he had sent to Didius, and thanked him for it, assuring him that he readily accepted of his friendship, confirmed the kingdom to him; in token of which, he ordered him to take up his diadem, and wear it before him. Herod, pleased with his good success, made some presents to Augustus and his favourites, according to his usual profuseness, and was from that time in greater esteem with him than any other tributary prince; so that he returned to Jerusalem highly satisfied with these additions of honour and power; but all this was soon soured by the ill reception he met with from his favourite Mariamne, and her exasperated mother^m.

His speech to him.

Troubled with domestic jars.

FOR these two princesses looking upon their confinement at Massada only as a more honourable imprisonment, and remembering with horror the bloody orders he had formerly left with his uncle Joseph concerning them, did not doubt but he had given the same to their two new guardians. To be satisfied of it, they spared neither presents nor caresses, till they got the fatal secret from Sobemus, so that when Herod came to Massada, and was going to embrace the queen with his usual tenderness, and to acquaint her with his success, he was surprized to find all his caresses answered with sighs and tears, and all other marks of grief and disdain. His resentment rose to such a height, that it extorted from him the bitterest reproaches, accompanied with such threatenings, as would have alarmed any woman but her. But his love, which was no less violent, seldom suffered those sallies of anger to be long-lived; till his mother and sister, tired and affrighted to see him still floating between those opposite passions, found out a way to work her effectual ruin, by raising the vilest surmises and calumnies against her unspotted character.

(L) These were an abject race, whom Antony had brought up at Cyzicum to exhibit triumphant sports; and these, when they heard of his defeat, determined to go into Egypt to his assistance. They had fought their way through several provinces in their march thither, Didius was the first who put a stop to their progress, being privately assisted by Herod with some troops; and at length prevailed upon them to quit their gladiatorial employment, after they had waited a long time in vain for Antony's joining them (5).

(5) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 10.

■ IN the mean time Augustus passing through Syria in his way to Egypt, Herod, who went to meet him as far as Ptolemais, entertained him and his army with incredible magnificence; and besides a present that he made to him of eight hundred talents, took care to furnish his army with bread, wine, and other provisions, as they marched through some barren deserts, where they might have been otherwise in danger of wanting even bread and water. He accompanied him as far as Pelusium, and that emperor was so charmed with his politeness and generosity, that he made him ride by his side whenever he went to review his troops, or upon any diversion. He gave him the same magnificent reception upon his return from Egypt, as he passed through Syria; in return of which, Augustus made him a present of the four thousand Gauls, which had served as life-guards to Cleopatra, and restored to him the territories and revenues of Jericho, Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, in the inlands, and those of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the tower of Straton on the sea-side, which made a considerable enlargement both to his kingdom and revenues. But upon his return to Jerusalem, he relapsed into his former discontent and jealousies, on account of his beloved queen, whose aversion to him did daily increase, insomuch that she came at last to treat him with such contempt, and accompanied it with such bitter reflections, as easily convinced him that she had conceived an irreconcilable hatred against him. She gave him a mortifying instance of it soon after, and such a one as hastened her death, by giving her enemies an opportunity of taking the blackest means for pushing his fury against her to the highest pitch.

His magnificent reception of Augustus.

Mariamne's aversion to him.

Herod, who had by this time floated near a year between the most violent affection and resentment, had withdrawn himself into his chamber to rest himself during the heat of the day; he sent for her, and in the kindest manner invited her to lie down by him; but she, instead of complying with this last request, returned his caresses with invincible scorn, upbraided him with all the other wrongs he had done to her and her family, and particularly the death of her father and brother, which so exasperated that fierce monarch, that he was on the point of killing her with his own hands. Salome did not let this opportunity slip of putting her hellish engines at work against that unfortunate princess: she had corrupted the king's cup-bearer before-hand to be ready on the first call with one of the blackest accusations against her; and now she sent him to Herod, with a poisoned cup in one hand, and a sum of money in the other, to acquaint him that Mariamne had bribed him with the one to administer the other to him. The rage this new accusation threw him in, made him order one of her favourite eunuchs and confidants to be put to the rack; but all the confession he could extort from him was, that he believed the cruel orders he had lately left with Sobemus, had exasperated that princess against him (M). Herod, enraged that a person in whom he reposed so great confidence, should dare, in spite of his express commands to the contrary, to disclose so important a secret, was easily persuaded that there must have been some criminal conversation between them, and therefore ordered that favourite to be put to immediate death. As for Mariamne, he resolved to have her publicly tried, and having packed up a set of judges of his own creatures, he himself carried on the prosecution with such violence, that they easily understood they must condemn her to death, though they all hoped and begged that he would not precipitate their sentence, but confine her to some castle, till he had more maturely consulted with his own heart. But Salome, who knew how apt her brother was to relapse, and fearing some discovery might come out of her treachery to her, if her death should be delayed, did at length obtain an order from him for her execution, under pretence that the nation would rise up in arms for her, if he suffered her to live any longer.

She is falsely accused.

Tried and condemned to die.

Mariamne received the fatal summons with an heroic courage becoming her exalted virtue and quality, and marched to the place of execution with incredible serenity, till an accident befel her, which put her constancy to the severest trial. Her mother, the turbulent intriguing Alexandra, who expected nothing but to follow her in a short

(M) The fourth book of the Maccabees (6) says, it was Joseph, and not Sobemus, that betrayed the secret, and that it was not the eunuch, but Mariamne herself, who in a fit of resentment upbraided the brutal king with it. But it is hardly probable, considering the punishment that she had seen inflicted on Herod's uncle for the like discovery, that Mari- amne would have exposed either of these to the effects of his fury.

Besides, we cannot suppose, that either Joseph or Sobemus would have ventured to disclose the matter to her without some previous promise of secrecy, and Mariamne was a princess of too strict virtue and honour to have broke it upon any account.

time, could think on no better expedient to avert the impending storm, than by trying to ingratiate herself to Herod, by insulting her unfortunate daughter all the way she was led to the fatal place; and not contented to load her with the bitterest of reproaches for her ingratitude and faithlessness to the best of husbands, she made several offers to strike her, and pull her by her hair. Mariamne bore all her pretended resentment without betraying any other change in her countenance, than an inward shame at so base an artifice, which proved however far enough from succeeding, as the sequel will presently shew. Mariamne submitted to her death with the same constancy and intrepidity as she had lived^a, and with her ended all the happiness of her tyrannic husband.

Her death.

A grievous plague. Year of the flood 2971. Before Christ 28.

Herod's rage being soon quenched with the blood of that amiable princess, his love broke out the more fiercely, and filled him with such pungent remorse, that his life became a burthen to him. He tried in vain to divert his grief with feasting, and other diversions; Mariamne was still uppermost in his thoughts, he called aloud after her, and sometimes would order those of his attendance to fetch her to him. A grievous pestilence, which happened soon after, and swept away multitudes of people of all ranks, added a fresh load to his misery, because it was universally looked upon as a just judgment on him for all the blood he had shed, and especially that of his injured queen. At first he withdrew himself into some of the neighbouring deserts, under pretence of hunting; but really to avoid the sight of men. At length being seized with a violent distemper in his bowels, he returned to Samaria, where his physicians tried in vain to give him some ease; their medicines did but increase his pain, through his wilfulness, and irregular living. His constitution did however get the better of his disease, but never could of his sour and brutish humour; to which he abandoned himself more and more, as he recovered his health and strength. He grew up at length to such a height of cruelty, that he spared neither friend nor foe in his fits of rage, and went on sacrificing numbers of his relations and best friends to his passion, even to the day of his death.

Alexandra put to death.

Salome divorces her husband. Year of the flood 2973. Before Christ 26.

Alexandra, the base and unnatural mother of the late virtuous Mariamne, was one of the very first that fell a victim to his rage after her injured daughter. The hopes of Herod's death, while he lay sick at Samaria, had made her set her wits to work to corrupt the governors of the two principal fortresses of Judaea, the one called Antonia near the temple, and the other in the city of Jerusalem, to deliver them up into her hands (N), together with Herod's children, pretending thereby to secure the kingdom for his sons by Mariamne in case of their father's death. But her restless and intriguing genius was so well known to those governors, that instead of complying with her request, they informed the king with it, who sent orders back to have her immediately put to death, which was accordingly done without further trial. The next was his brother-in-law Costobares, who was an Idumean, and had married Salome, after Herod had put her first husband to death, as we have related above. This man, whom Herod had raised from an inferior rank (O) to the government of Idumea, had justly incurred his displeasure, by endeavouring to make himself and that province independent from him, and applying to Cleopatra for assistance. Herod would have put him to immediate death, had not Salome interposed; but she being since fallen out with, and willing to get rid of him, first sent him a bill of divorce; and to justify that unlawful action to her brother (P), told him that she had discovered a treasonable design, which

(N) These two fortresses were justly looked upon as the two main keys of the kingdom, the one commanding the temple, and the other the city; so that it was of utmost consequence to the candidates for the crown to be masters of them, or at least of the first of them; for the Jews had such an invincible attachment to the worship of the temple, that there was scarce any thing, even life itself, which they would not sacrifice to the liberty of coming to that sacred place at all proper times and solemnities.

(O) He was descended from the ancient priest of Chofe, a deity of the Idumeans, before they were forced by Hyrtan I. to embrace the Jewish religion.

This deity is not unrightly supposed to be the יהוה or jee, prophet or law-giver of the Hebrews (7); for if we may believe Epiphanius (8), both the Idumeans and Arabs of Arabia Petrea did worship Moses, and paid divine honours to his statue.

(P) According to the Mosaic law, the husbands alone were permitted to divorce their wives, but not the wife the husband (9). However, Salome relying on her brother's friendship, and her own politic head, assumed that prerogative, which no Jewish woman, that we know of, had ever done before.

(7) Calmet. Hist. vet. test. sub A. M. 3976. (8) Harif. 55. (9) Vid. Deuter. xxiv. 1, & seq. Matt. xix. 3, & seq. Mark x. 2, & seq. Maimon. de repud.

- a was carried on by her husband in conjunction with Lyfimachus, Dositheus and Antipater; and, as a proof of it, told him, that he privately kept the sons of Babas (Q) under his protection, contrary to his express commands; all which Herod having found true, he ordered them all to be put to death.

Herod having by this time rid himself of the Amonean race, and of their most considerable partisans, began now to shew a greater disregard to the Jewish religion than he had hitherto ventured to do, by abolishing several of its ceremonies, and introducing some foreign customs, which were forbidden by it. He began with building a stately theatre in the city, and a spacious amphitheatre in its suburbs, and ordered public games to be celebrated in them every fifth year, in honour of Augustus; and to draw the greater concourse to them, he caused them to be proclaimed, not only in the neighbouring provinces, but in the most distant kingdoms, and promised magnificent prizes to those that should gain the victory. Besides great numbers of the most expert musicians, players, couriers, gladiators, &c. which he had sent for thither, he caused also some of the fiercest wild beasts to be brought, and fought upon the stage; all which did not a little displease the zealous Jews, who thought it unlawful and inhuman to expose men to the fury of wild beasts. But what exasperated them most, were the trophies with which he had caused those sumptuous places to be adorned, and which they mistaking for statues, thought contrary to their law, which forbids all kind of imagery, whether carved or even painted. They therefore cried out against him, that he had profaned their city, and that they would never tamely bear such idolatrous monuments to be set up in it. Herod tried in vain to undeceive them by fair speeches; he was forced at length to lead some of the principal of them to the place, and to order the armour of the trophies to be taken down, and thereby to convince them, that there was nothing under them but bare posts. This demonstration did indeed satisfy them as to this one point, and turned their outcries into laughter; but the generality of the nation retained such an aversion against him, upon the account of his other heathenish novelties, that they looked no longer upon him as a Jewish king, but as a heathen and a tyrant.

- d TEN of the boldest of them took it at last into their heads to enter the theatre with daggers hid under their cloaths, and either to stab the king or some of his retinue, not doubting but even their perishing in the attempt would render the tyrant still more odious. They were not mistaken; for Herod being informed of their design by one of his spies, and causing the assassins to be put to a most excruciating death, the people were so exasperated against the informer, that they cut and tore him to pieces, and cast his flesh to the dogs. Herod tried in vain to discover the authors of this affront; he was at last forced to order some women to be put to the rack, and to extort from them the names of the principal of them, whom he caused likewise to be hurried to death, together with their innocent families. This last act of cruelty drove the Jews into such desperate hatred against him, that he expected nothing less than a general revolt; to prevent which he set about fortifying Jerusalem, rebuilding Samaria (R), and garisoning several other fortresses in Judæa, whose situation was

(Q) These had been great sticklers for the Amonean race, and, at the siege of Jerusalem, had strenuously opposed the opening of the gates to Herod, for which that prince, upon his taking of the city, had given charge to Castobarus to secure them; but he had let them escape, and had excused the matter to him; but Herod finding now, that he had sent them into an asylum, and maintained them there, he put their protector, and as many of them as he could find, to death.

(R) We took notice in a former section, that this city, which had been destroyed by Hyrcan, had been in part rebuilt by Gabinus governor of Syria, and called from him Gabinianna; but he being soon after turned out, it advanced no higher than a good large village. Herod therefore chose to finish that work, and to restore that place to its pristine splendor; because being but one day's journey, or thirty-five miles, distant from Jerusalem, he could easily make it a place of retreat, in case of necessity.

He adorned it with magnificent buildings, fortified it with walls and towers, and invited six thousand foreigners to come and settle there, who finding the soil very fertile, became very rich in a short time. He gave it the name of Sebastæ, which signifies the same in Greek as doth Augustus in Latin.

The other places which he fortified and garisoned, were, the tower of Straton, which he called Cæsarea, in honour of the emperor, and made it so strong, that it seemed to command the whole country. He built likewise another strong fortress in the midst of a plain, and put in it a garison of horse. A third he built in Galilee, named Gabala; and a fourth in Eschmonitis in Perea; all which being also well stored with arms and provisions, were a great check to the whole kingdom (11).

But he bestowed the most cost on his new Sebastæ, to which he allowed a circuit of twenty stades, or two miles and a half. In the centre of it was a spacious square of about a stade and a half, and in the middle a stately temple. In a word, he spared no cost to render it one of the richest and most beautiful cities of his realm, and looked upon it as his favourite master-piece (12).

most likely to keep the country in awe", and whose names the reader may find at the end of the last note.

Judæa visited with famine
and pestilence.

ABOUT the same time, which was the thirteenth year of his reign, Judæa was visited with a grievous drought, which brought on a famine, and ended in a raging pestilence, of which great multitudes died daily for want of proper help and sustenance. Herod, whose treasury was exhausted by building so many cities and fortresses, and whose finances were reduced to the lowest ebb through the famine and death of his subjects, was forced to melt down all his plate, and to send it down into Egypt, to procure a fresh supply of provisions, in order to stop the mouths of the people, who, as is usual in such calamities, threw all the odium of them upon him. The drought having likewise killed such quantities of their cattle, that they had not wooll b sufficient left to cloath themselves against the approaching winter, he took care also to procure a sufficient supply of it betimes; and Petronius, the Roman prefect then in Egypt, notwithstanding the multitudes of people who applied to him from other provinces for the same things, did so far befriend him, as to send him a sufficient quantity of them; which Herod caused to be immediately distributed among his subjects, but to the Jews preferably to any of the rest. This generosity did, for the present, change their hatred into admiration, and his praises were for a while the main subject of their discourse; but as he soon relapsed into his cruel and savage humour, so their love was soon turned into hatred again, which continued to his death. However, his prudent liberality having stored the country with plenty of c corn, and the long drought being succeeded by more refreshing seasons, they began to cultivate their lands again, and found them, to their great comfort, restored to their former fecundity.

Relieved by

As soon as the land had recovered itself from the late calamity, Herod went on with his building (S), particularly his stately palace near the temple of Jerusalem, in which the gold, marble, cedar, and other precious materials, seemed to outvie one another. There were in it, among other apartments, two magnificent ones, to the one of which he gave the name of Augustus, and to the other that of Agrippa. At the same time he was not unmindful to ingratiate himself to the emperor, by more substantial services than building of places to his honour; for Gellius having been sent d with an army to attempt the conquest of Arabia, Herod failed not to send him very considerable succours, and among the rest five hundred of the stoutest of his guards; and tho' that enterprize proved unsuccessful to the Romans in a country where the air, water and aliments, were as contrary to them as the temper of the people*, yet Herod's assistance proved so useful and seasonable to them, that Cæsar could not chuse being highly pleased with it.

THIS very year also he married another Mariamne, who was the daughter of a Jewish priest of Alexandria, named Simon, the son of Boetibus, and a woman of extraordinary beauty. To raise her father up to a condition fit for such an alliance, he placed him upon the pontifical chair, after having dispossessed Jesus the son of Phariseus of that dignity. Soon after these nuptials, he went and built the magnificent e palace of Herodion, on the place where he had formerly defeated the Antigonians. The situation of it was so inviting (T), that the Jews and other people gladly came and built round it; so that from a palace it soon became a considerable city. In a word, he spared no cost to leave every-where some monuments of his unmeasured magnificence, as well in Judæa as out of it; but with this difference, that those in

(S) Amongst them, that of Cæsarea mentioned in the last note, was the most magnificent next to Sebastæ. He bestowed twelve years in the finishing and adorning it. It stood on the coasts of Phœnicie, and was very convenient for trade, but had till then a very dangerous harbour, so that no ships could be safe in it when the wind was at south-west. Herod remedied this inconveniency at an immense labour and charge, and made it one of the most convenient havens on that coast. He beautified also the place with stately buildings. The reader may see in

Josephus (12) a full account of this immense work, and of many others, in other places, erected by that prince; which, joined to his profuse munificence, justly gained him the surname of Great.

(T) This stately building stood on a pleasant hill, about seven miles from Jerusalem, and had the prospect as well as command of all the country round about. The gradual declivity of it was no less beautiful. The reader may see it described, as well as the city, by the authors quoted above.

- a Judæa were not adorned, as the rest were, with temples and other buildings, with statues and other carvings, which he knew the Jews would never have borne with any patience; but as for those which he built out of it, he gave himself all the scope which either his pride, or desire of pleasing the Romans, could inspire him with; for all which he had a salvo ready, namely, that he did in all this only obey, and even much against his will, the orders of the emperor, who had a right to command him.

- By this time Herod seemed to be at the height of all his wishes; his being in such high esteem with Augustus made him either loved or feared by his subjects and neighbours; and therefore, that he might cultivate that prince's favour still more, he sent b his two favourite sons, whom he had by Mariamne, and who were grown up by this time, to be educated under his eye. Pollio, his intimate friend, was ordered to provide a stately house at Rome; but the emperor took that care off his hands, and assigned them apartments in his own palace; and so well pleased was he with the confidence which their father put in him, that he gave him full power to name which of them he pleased to be his successor. He likewise added several provinces to his kingdom, whose names, as well as the occasion of the gift, the reader will find in the margin (V). Zenodorus, from whom they had been taken, having tried in vain several ways to regain them from him, took the opportunity of the emperor's coming into Syria, to bring a deputation from the Gadarenes with him to Antioch, c there to renew their complaints against Herod, and to accuse him of oppression, tyranny, and other such crimes; and Augustus did seem to comply so far with their request, that he set a day for Herod, who was there also, to make his defence before them; but, when he came to do it, the emperor betrayed such visible favour and partiality towards him, that his accusers, fearing to be delivered up to his resentment, chose to dispatch themselves out of the world that very night; which they did, some by drowning, some by hanging themselves, and other such desperate ways. Zenodorus in particular was so terrified by it, that he took a strong dose of poison, which quite corroded his bowels, and ended his life by the next morning^r.

- Augustus* however stopped not his kindness here, but looking upon the desperate d exit of Herod's accusers as a proof of his innocence and merit, appointed him his procurator in Syria, and forbid his governor there to undertake any thing without his knowledge and advice. At the same time Herod took this favourable opportunity to obtain a tetrarchy for his brother Pheloras, that he might live according to his birth, and without depending on his successor's favour after his death (W). In acknowledgment for all these gifts, Herod having accompanied the emperor to the sea-port, built a sumptuous temple in honour of him, all of fine white marble, near the Panion, or place whence the Jordan has its origin[†]. The vast number of edifices he built,

(V) These were the three districts of Trachonitis, Auranitis or Iturea, and Basanea, which were situate between Libanus and Perem, on the other side Jordan (14).

They were given to him on this occasion; Zenodorus, tetrarch of a small toparchy, had farmed these from Varro the then president of Syria, and suffered the inhabitants of it, who lived chiefly in rocks and caves, to make excursions into all the neighbouring countries impunely. A complaint of this had been sent by Varro to Augustus; upon which orders were brought back to him at any rate to extirpate those robbers; and, for the more effectual doing of it, the emperor commanded him to take those three toparchies from Zenodorus, and to put them under Herod, who, with his usual success, soon ferreted them out, and cleared the country of them.

Zenodorus however went to Rome to complain of the injustice done him in taking those districts from him; but the emperor, who had reason to suspect that he had made a gain by protecting a vermin which he ought to have suppressed, would not so much as hear him.

Agrippa being soon after sent into Syria, Herod went to meet him at Mitylene; and, soon after his return, Zenodorus, in hopes of meeting with better success with him, stirred up the Gadarenes to come and proffer sundry grievous complaints against him. But he found the new governor too well rooted in Herod's interest to hear any accusation against him; on the contrary he sent them bound to Jerusalem, where Herod, hoping to gain them by fair usage, ordered them to be set at liberty.

Zenodorus, thus disappointed again, went and sold the territories of Auranitis to the Arabs for fifty talents; so that a war was like to have ensued between Herod and them, they being deaf to all his offers for ending the dispute in an amicable way (15), when Augustus's coming in a lucky time decided the controversy in his favour, as has been seen above.

(W) Josephus does not tell us where this tetrarchy was situate; but, by what we find in another place (16), it seems to have been beyond Jordan, and at some distance from Jerusalem.

and adorned with carvings and other imagery, which the Jews looked upon as a destructive of religion and good manners, did so exasperate them against him, that he was forced to remit them a third part of their yearly tribute. His pretence indeed was, that the last grievous dearth, which had greatly impoverished the land, required this largess from him; but, at the bottom, it was the murmurs and private meetings of the people, which were now more frequent than ever, that extorted it from him, in hopes that it would in some measure allay the sourness of their spirits. However, to let them see, that he was neither insensible of their mutinous cabals, nor afraid to put a stop to them, he issued out an edict, expressly forbidding all public and private assemblies, whether on account of feasts, or any other pretence, under the severest penalties. But as he not only had his spies every-where, but did sometimes mix himself among them in disguise, he quickly found all these precautions were like to prove to little purpose to keep the people in obedience. This made him bethink himself of exacting an oath of fidelity from them; but this new imposition was so strenuously refused by Pollio, or Hillel, and Shamai, at the head of the whole sect of Essenians, and by all the chiefs of the Pharisees, that he was forced to set it aside, without venturing to shew any resentment against those that had opposed him in it, for fear of exasperating the whole nation against him.

He fell soon after upon a much better expedient to quiet them, and at the same time to satisfy his invincible itch of eternising his memory by the number and magnificence of his buildings. The great attachment which they had for their temple, made him conceive the hopes, that his rebuilding of it in a more stately manner, would not fail to recommend him, not only to the present Jews, but also to posterity. The difficulty was, to convince them of his being both willing and able to rear such a costly edifice, after he had pulled down the old one; and this he did in a set speech, which he made to their assembly, wherein, with his usual eloquence, he failed not to display his zeal for the glory of God, and for the promoting of his religion. Among other things he reminded them how vastly inferior that sacred place now was to that which had been formerly built by Solomon (X); but this, he told them, was rather to be imputed to the want of ability in those that returned from Babylon, than to their want of zeal; but now that God was pleased not only to raise him to the Jewish throne, but to bless him with peace, plenty, affluence, and with the friendship of the Romans, he thought himself bound to make some signal acknowledgment to him for all these blessings, and hoped, that the rebuilding of his temple in the manner he proposed, could not but be acceptable both to him and them; but as he found them very much hesitating at the difficulty, length and expensiveness of such a work, he was forced to engage not to move a stone from the old edifice, till he had prepared all the materials for the new. As soon as he had gained their consent (Y), he set immediately ten thousand workmen to work, under the direction of a thousand priests, the best skilled in carving, masonry, &c. all whom he kept under his pay. One thousand carts were likewise employed in fetching of all the materials; and, in a

(X) Josephus makes him say here (17), that the present temple was lower by sixty cubits than that of Solomon; which cannot be understood of the holy place, which, we are told (18), was but thirty cubits high; whereas that built after the captivity, was, by Cyrus's own grant, sixty cubits high (19). If therefore there be no mistake crept into the text, both Herod and the Jewish historians must probably speak of some of the galleries, which might be so much higher in the first than in the second temple. The reader may recur to what we have said on the subject at the beginning of this †, and in the appendix to the first volume.

(Y) This assembly seems to have been held about the time of the Easter solemnity, when there was the greatest concourse of the Jews at Jerusalem; for Josephus says it was in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign; that is, as the learned Usher observes, reckoning from the death of Antigonus (20), which happened not till about the Midsummer after his imprisonment; according to which, reckoning the nineteenth year of Herod not beginning till the nineteenth year before Christ, the six first months must have belonged to the eighteenth year of his reign, which brings it to the passover feast above-mentioned (21). We must not however look upon this building as a new temple, as distinct from that of Zerubbabel as that was from that of Solomon, but rather as the same rebuilt, enlarged and adorned, upon the old foundation, and with the same materials, as far as they could go. The very Jews themselves still looked upon it as the second temple, and that which was to exceed that of Solomon in glory, by the presence of the Messiah, according to the prophecy of Haggai; but, as we cannot enlarge on this subject, we shall refer the curious reader to the elaborate preface of Constantine l'Empereur, prefixed to his comment on the book of Middoth, where he will find that point discussed to his satisfaction.

- a word, such a number of hands was employed, and such expedition used, that he got every thing ready within the space of two years, after which they set about pulling down the old building, and with the same dispatch, rearing the new one; so that the holy place, or temple properly so called, was finished in a year and a half's time; during which, we are told ^c, it never rained in the day-time, but only in the night. The remainder took up a little above eight years, by which time it was, if not wholly finished (Z), yet made fit for divine service, according to the king's first design. The temple, properly so called, or holy place, was but sixty cubits high, and as many in breadth; but in the front he added two wings or shoulders, which projected twenty cubits more on each side; which made a front of one hundred and twenty
- b cubits in length, and as many in height, with a gate seventy cubits high, and twenty in breadth, but open, and without any doors. The stones were white marble, twenty-five cubits in length, twelve in height, and nine in breadth, all wrought and polished with exquisite beauty, the whole resembling a stately palace, whose middle being considerably raised above the extremities of each face, made it afford a beautiful vista at a great distance to those that came to that metropolis (A). Instead of doors, the gates closed with very costly veils, enriched with variety of flowering of gold, silver, purple, and every thing that was rich and curious; and on each side of the gates were planted two stately columns, from whose cornices did hang gold festoons, and vines, with their clusters of grapes, leaves, &c. curiously
- c wrought. As for the galleries that surrounded this sacred place, the porticos, towers, courts, and other embellishments of it, we do not design to swell this section with them, but give a short sketch of them in the margin (B), and refer our readers for a

(Z) Josephus shews us, in another place (22), that the whole was still continued till the beginning of the Jewish war under Gellius Florus, when eighteen thousand workmen being dismissed, and like to be idle, the Jews, unwilling their treasure should be laid up to become a prey to the Romans, petitioned the king (Agrippa) to build the eastern porch, which inclosed the most outward parts of the temple; but the king having refused their suit, those men, for want of work, began to raise those seditions which hastened the destruction both of the city and temple; so that it is plain, some part of that building had been still carried on till this time.

And hence that saying of the Jews to Christ, Forty and six years hath this temple been hitherto a building; for so the text ought to be read, according to the import of the aorist there used by the evangelist (23); and indeed so long a time had elapsed from the beginning of the building to the first pass-over after Christ had entered into his ministry, at which time the Jews were objecting this to him (24).

(A) This superstructure, which was probably reared on the old foundation, without sufficient additions to it, proved, as Josephus tells us (25), too heavy for it, and sunk down about twenty cubits; so that it was reduced to the height of one hundred. A project was set on foot for raising it again to its former height in Nero's time; but, upon some account or other, it was set aside.

(B) We have already spoken in a former volume [†] of the foundations of this stupendous work, some of whose walls were raised from the deep valley beneath, to the height of three hundred cubits and upwards, and some of the stones of it forty cubits long, all fastened to each other with lead and iron, to be proof against time, wind and weather. The platform was a regular square of a stade or furlong on each side; and in that description we gave of the superstructure ^{*}, we confined ourselves to what the sacred writers had said of it, without introducing the vast additions that had been made since by Herod and his successors.

Since then we have two accounts of Herod's temple, the one written by Josephus (26), who had been a curious viewer of it; the other by Jehudah Hakkoðesh (27), the compiler of the Talmud, above one hundred and twenty years after its destruction by the Romans. From these the authors quoted in the margin (28) have reared each their separate edifices, disposed, beautified and adorned them more by the strength of their imagination than by any superior knowledge they had of the authors they copied from; tho' with respect to even these, whoever considers their swollen style, will be apt to look upon their accounts of that building, rather as panegyrics than historical descriptions of it. However, if either is to be preferred to the other, Josephus, who had both seen it, and described it soon after, if not before its destruction, when he might have been contradicted by numbers, who had viewed it as well as he, is certainly more to be credited than the Talmudists, who wrote so long after, and when they were sure there was none left to gain-say them. From him therefore we shall endeavour to give the best and shortest sketch and plan of that stately work, which is as follows:

Each front of this square, which, as we hinted above, was a furlong long, had a spacious gate or entrance, enriched with suitable ornaments; but that on the west had four gates, the one of which led to the palace, the next to the city, and the two others to the suburbs and fields. This inclosure was surrounded on the outside with a strong and high wall of large stones, well cemented; and on the inside had, on each front, a stately piazza or gallery, supported by columns of such a bigness, that three men could but just embrace them, their circumference fuller account to Josephus, the Talmud, and to such other writers as have been at the pains of compiling their several descriptions from them.

Herod goes to Rome.

Makes a severe law against robbers.

Marries his two sons.

WHILST the work of the temple was carrying on with such surprising expedition, as raised the admiration of the Jews, Herod made a voyage to Rome, to pay his compliments to the emperor, and a paternal visit to his two sons. Perhaps also did he chuse this time to be out of the hearing of some of the murmurings, which the zealous Jews raised against a law which he had lately made to suppress the frequent incursions and robberies which were committed in Judæa. By this law, it seems, he condemned every man that was found breaking through the walls of any house, to be sold for a slave into foreign countries; and this had greatly displeased the nation, because, contrary to that of Moses, it made their slavery perpetual; whereas, had they been only sold among their brethren, the sabbatic or the jubilee year would have put an end to it. Another objection raised against that law, was, that those slaves would, in all likelihood, be tempted to forsake the Jewish religion, and turn idolaters; upon which account it was still more universally exclaimed against*. It is therefore likely, that Herod, who resolved at any rate to suppress those robbers, got out of the way, that he might not be importuned to repeal it. On his arrival at Rome (C), Augustus received him with all the marks of friendship, entertained him in the most sumptuous manner, and delivered his sons to him. Herod could not but be highly pleased to behold them so greatly improved under the care of that emperor. He acknowledged the favour in terms, and by presents, answerable to the high sense he had of the obligation, and, after a short stay, took the two young princes with him back into Judæa. Here they were received with the loudest acclamations of the people, who could not forbear admiring their majestic port and behaviour, which, joined to the excellent education they had received in Italy, had rendered them in all respects truly accomplished princes. He married them soon after to suitable matches; Alexander rence being about twenty-seven feet. There were, in all, one hundred and sixty-two of them, which supported a cedar ceiling of exquisite workmanship, and formed three galleries, the middlemost of which was the largest and highest, it being forty-five feet in breadth, and one hundred in height; whereas those on each side were but thirty feet wide, and fifty in height.

The piazzas and court were paved with marble of various colours; and at a small distance from the galleries was a second inclosure, surrounded with a flight of beautiful marble rails, with stately columns at proper distances, on which were engraven certain admonitions in Greek and Latin, to forbid strangers, and those Jews that were not purified, to proceed further under pain of death. This inclosure had but one gate on the east-side, none on the west, but on the north and south it had three, placed at equal distances from each other.

A third inclosure surrounded the temple properly so called, and the altar of burnt-offerings, and made what they called the court of the Hebrews or Israelites. It was square like the rest; but the wall on the outside was surrounded by a flight of fourteen steps, which hid a considerable part of it; and on the top was a terrace of about twelve cubits in breadth, which went quite round the whole inclosure. The east side had but one gate, the west none, and the north and south four, at equal distances. Each gate was ascended to by five steps more, before one could reach the level of the inward court; so that the wall which inclosed it, appeared within to be but twenty-five cubits high, tho' considerably higher on the outside. On the inside of each of those gates were raised a couple of spacious square chambers, in form of a pavilion, thirty cubits wide, and forty in height, each supported by columns of twelve cubits circumference.

This inclosure had likewise a double flight of galleries on the inside, supported by a double row of columns; but the western side was only one continued wall, without gates or galleries. The women had likewise their particular courts separate from that of the men, and one of the gates on the north and south leading to it.

The altar of burnt-offerings was likewise high and spacious, being forty cubits in breadth, and fifteen in height. The ascent to it was, according to the Mosaic law †, smooth and without steps, and the altar of unbewn stones. It was surrounded at a convenient distance round about with a low wall or rail, not above a cubit in height, which divided the court of the priests from that of the lay Israelites; so that these last were allowed to come thus far to bring their offerings and sacrifices; but none but the priests were allowed to come within that inclosure. The reader will more easily understand this description by the plan here subjoined, to which we have referred all the particulars under each paragraph by proper references.

All that needs be added here is, that Herod caused a new dedication of the whole to be performed with the utmost magnificence, and presented to it many rich trophies of his former victories, after the custom of the Jewish monarchs (29).

(C) Josephus adds, that, in his way to Rome, he had the curiosity to stop at Elis to see the solemnity of the CXCIIIrd olympiad; and that the poverty of the Elians having sunk the pomp and splendor of those games, he settled a constant revenue on them, in order to restore them to their ancient lustre (30).

The like piece of generosity he shewed to the Chians, for whom he paid a large sum, which they were indebted to Cæsar's receivers; after which he gave them another sum to rebuild their porticoes, which had been demolished in the wars (31).

- a to Glaphyra the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, and Aristobulus to Berenice the daughter of his sister Salome ^v.

BUT the admiration and love which the people expressed for those two excellent princes, failed not to raise the envy and jealousy of the restless Salome, and of those of her accomplices, who had forwarded the death of Mariamne, as they had reason more than enough to fear their avenging that princess's death. To prevent so just and sad a catastrophe, they had recourse to their vile artifices, which had succeeded so well against that innocent princess. They began with spreading of reports abroad, that the two young princes could not endure their father, whom they looked upon as still reeking with the blood of their mother; not doubting, but when the rumour reached that jealous monarch's ears, it would inevitably render them obnoxious to him, and hasten their ruin. In the mean time Agrippa being come to Asia Proper, Herod went to invite him into Judea, where having shewed him his new-built cities of Sebaste, Alexandria, Cesarea, &c. he thence led him to Jerusalem. There the people met them at some distance from that metropolis, in their festival dress, and conducted them with loud acclamations into the city, where his reception was suitable to the magnificence of his host. Agrippa, having sacrificed a whole hecatomb at the temple, was forced to depart sooner than he would otherwise have done, by reason of the approaching winter, and Herod failed not to load him and his retinue with suitable presents, whilst the people accompanied him with loud huzzas, and strewn the way with flowers and odoriferous herbs where-ever he passed; insomuch that that prince did ever after take a particular delight in expressing the pleasure of that journey, and extolling the magnificence of the temple and royal palace, and of the priestly ornaments, the stately buildings, and generosity of Herod. Pbilo adds, that he made the Jews some considerable presents, and did every thing he could to oblige them, without hurting the interest of their king. On the spring following Agrippa sailing with his fleet to the Bosporus, was agreeably surprized with Herod's coming to meet him with another at Lesbos, wherein he had brought him some considerable reinforcements of men, arms and provisions; all which did so endear him to that prince, that he never undertook any thing without his knowledge and advice, nor scarce any party of pleasure without his company ².

ON his return to Jerusalem he assembled the Jews, and acquainted them with the success of his arms and those of Agrippa against the Bosphorans. He added, in order to lessen their discontent, that he remitted the nation a fourth part of their tribute; which made them some satisfaction for the late murmurings which his law against robbers had occasioned ¹. But whilst things went thus smoothly on in his kingdom, his family was plagued with intestine jars, occasioned by the hatred which Salome bore to his two worthy sons. The truth is, they spake both of her and of her brother Pheroras in such resenting terms, as made them dread something worse from them. They even ventured to complain sometimes of the injustice done to their mother, and in their behaviour shewed so little tenderness towards their father, that Salome found it an easy matter to alienate his affection from them. To suppress in some measure the presumption of the two brothers, Herod caused Antipater, another of his sons (D), whom he had till then educated in a private manner, to be brought to court, where he heaped such caresses on him, as only rendered him more obnoxious to them, and them more indiscreet in their speeches against their father, all which were still carried back to him, and very often aggravated; whilst Antipater, wholly employed to cultivate a good understanding with him, was careful never to let a word slip even against his two brothers, tho' he had taken care to place such about him as should do it more effectually.

- f AMONG many other marks of Herod's affection to this new favourite son (E), he obtained of Agrippa the favour of his accompanying him to Rome, and of his being presented by him to the emperor; so that by this time every one began to look upon him as his father's successor. Antipater set out accordingly; but, to prevent his two rivals regaining their father's favour during his absence, he ceased not, both by his letters and by his agents, to turn his heart against them, till at length he began to look upon them as his enemies, and resolved to take them with him to Rome, and there to try them at Cæsar's tribunal ^b. Cæsar being gone by that time to Aquileia, Herod came to him, and there accused his two sons of high treason, and required justice against them in such strong terms, as extorted a flood of tears from them; after which Alexander pleaded his own and his brother's cause with such becoming modesty, as easily convinced both the emperor and the audience of their innocence. Augustus did, in a genteel manner, reprove Herod for his too rash belief, and reconciled them together; but it was not likely this peace should be long-lived. Herod was too jealous, his sons too indiscreet, and their enemies too cunning and indefatigable not to give cause for fresh dissensions. Herod himself laid the foundation for a new and dangerous one, by a speech which he made to the Jewish assembly upon his being returned with his sons to Jerusalem; for there having acquainted them with his success at Rome, he declared to them, that it was indeed his intention that his sons should reign after his death, and not till then, Antipater first, and then Alexander, and lastly Aristobulus (F); but that, whilst he lived, he did not think fit to part with the reins of government. This was indeed casting a bone of discord among his sons, and so it proved in the sequel ^c.

By this time the city of Cæsarea, which had been twelve years a building, being finished, Herod caused the dedication of it to be performed with the greatest pomp and splendor, and appointed games to be performed in it with the utmost solemnity every fifth year. Julia, the emperor's wife, or, as the Jewish historian always calls her, Livia, contributed towards the splendour of those sports five hundred talents out of her own coffers; and Herod entertained his guests there, who were very considerable, both in quality and number, with surprising magnificence; insomuch that Augustus said of him, That his soul was too great for his kingdom; and that he deserved to have been king of all Syria and Egypt. Besides the city of Cæsarea, which, by reason of its beauty, pleasant situation, and commodious harbour, became in time the residence of the Roman procurators, he built also those of Antipatris, in honour of his father; of Cypron, in honour of his mother, and Phasaelis, in honour of his brother; besides several other towers and castles of prodigious size and strength ^d. On the next year the Jews of Asia and Cyrene having been greatly oppressed by the Greeks, especially on account of their religion and customs, sent a deputation to Augustus, and obtained an effectual redress from that emperor. The purport of his decree in their favour the reader may see in the margin (G).

Herod might have viewed, with no small pleasure, both himself and the whole Jewish nation respected and protected by the emperor and senate on the one hand, and by his friend Agrippa on the other; but his domestic jars, which daily increased by the hellish machinations of his brother and sister, and the emptiness of his coffers, which he had exhausted by his profuseness in buildings and feasts, made him too wretched to taste any pleasure in other things. To remove these two corroding sores, he betook himself to remedies more desperate than the disease. To supply his present necessi-

(F) During his stay at Rome, Augustus had, it seems, not only renewed his former grant to him of appointing any of his sons to be his successor, but had likewise given him the further liberty of dividing the kingdom amongst them in what proportion he should think fit.

He had likewise granted him one half of the revenue of the mines of Cyprus, and had appointed him his overseer of the other half. Several other rich presents were also interchanged between those two monarchs, which shewed their great intimacy to each other (34).

(G) That they should be allowed to live according to their laws, and with the same privileges as they had enjoyed under the late Cæsar and Hyrcan; that their temple at Jerusalem should still receive their yearly tribute towards the repairs and worship of it; that the Jews should not be obliged to appear at the courts of judicature on the eve of the sabbath after the ninth hour, (answering to three afternoon) nor on the sabbath; lastly, that whosoever should lay hands either on the temple tribute, or on any of the sacred books of the Jews, should be punished as a sacrilege, and all his goods should be confiscated to the Roman commonwealth.

This decree was ordered to be set up in a public place at Ancyra, which had been dedicated by the whole people of Asia to the honour of that monarch (35).

King Agrippa made much such another decree in their favour, and ordered, that whoever stole any of the sacred treasure, or Jewish books, and took sanctuary in any temple or asylum, should be torn thence, and delivered up to the Jews, to be punished by them (36).

ties,

- a ties, he cast his eyes on the tombs of David and Solomon, out of which he had heard, or pretended to have heard, that *Hyrca*n had formerly drawn some large sums; and those places, he thought, would prove a lasting fund for his extravagant expences. We shall not repeat what we have observed heretofore concerning this pretended theft of the Maccabian pontiff †. All we shall add with respect to Herod, is, that he executed his design with the utmost privacy, and went to the place in the night, accompanied only with some few confidants, where, instead of the coined gold and silver he expected, he found only some quantity of rich vessels, curiously wrought, which he caused to be carried off. Not content with these, he ventured farther, to search into the very coffins of the dead monarchs; but some sudden damp, or, as Josephus calls it, a miraculous flame, which consumed two of his guards, having scared him and his retinue, put a stop to his further search. Herod, to make some satisfaction for his sacrilege, caused a stately monument of white marble to be erected at the entrance of the sepulchre *; but this was looked upon by the Jews rather as a monument of his crime than an expiation of it.

- But his cruelty to his sons and their friends rendered him still more abhorred. His vile sister (H) had raised his jealousy against them to such a height, that he acted more like a furious tyrant than a father or king, filling the city with blood, and turning his own palace into a slaughter-house. Alexander had been accused to him of having corrupted, by dint of presents and promises, two of his favourite confidants, namely, his high steward and cup-bearer. Herod ordered them immediately to be put to the rack; whereon they confessed their having indeed received some presents from that prince; but denied his having betrayed to them any ill design against the king. This confession not satisfying his jealousy, they were tortured afresh, and again, till he had extorted enough from them to justify his sending his son to prison, and loading him with irons. Here the young prince being grown desperate, sent his father four different confessions, in which he owned all, and more, than the torture had extorted from the other two, and at the same time accused Salome and Pheroras, with two of the king's prime ministers and favourites, of being all alike concerned in the plot; and particularly that Salome had even ventured to come to him in the dead of night, and lying down by him, had used many cogent arguments to convince him, that they must expect neither peace nor happiness, till they had rid themselves of the tyrant ‡.

His cruelty to his sons

Alexander's desperate confession.

- This accusation, which was only calculated to set all on fire, had the desired effect; and the jealous king, not knowing whom to trust to, flew into the greatest excesses of cruelty. There was now nothing to be heard of but racks, imprisonments, and dreadful executions abroad, whilst the tyrant was so tormented with fears at home, that he often started out of his bed, as if pursued sword in hand by his sons and their accomplices. Thus it was hourly expected when these fits of rage and dread would have run him mad, or hastened his son's execution; when Archelaus king of Cappadocia came in a lucky minute (I), and, by his interposition, settled a calm again, at least for a time. This discreet prince, who knew the violence of Herod's temper, began at first with pitying his sad condition, and condemning the unnatural perfidy of his son, threatening to take his daughter from him, and to leave him to his father's just resentment; but, in the end, he had the address, by degrees, to explode all these malicious accusations and extorted confessions, and not only to persuade him

(H) One of her hellish projects, and which cost her dear, was to get Pheroras to tell young Alexander, that the king was become so desperately in love with his wife Glaphyra, that nothing but his forcing her from him could satisfy his unruly passion. Alexander taking it for granted, went to his father, and, in the humblest manner, mixed with a flood of tears, expostulated the matter with him. Herod, surprized at such a black accusation, of which he was wholly innocent, sent for his brother, and asked him, How he could lay such a black perfidy to his charge?

Pheroras threw all the blame on his sister, and pretended she was the person who had whispered the thing to him. Salome being sent for, denied the whole with her usual assurance; but the king reading her guilt in her looks, in spite of her protestations to the contrary, caused her and her brother to be banished the court, and highly commended his son's moderation; but all this good understanding was soon after dashed by a more hellish accusation, which they brought against that young prince, and which we are going to relate.

(I) We have already taken notice, that he was the father of Glaphyra, whom Alexander had married. This prince, who was of a prudent and cool temper, had received Herod and his sons in their return from Rome, where they had been acquitted by the emperor, and, by his wise counsels, had finished that reconciliation which Augustus had begun.

But being now informed to what height of cruelty things were carried at Jerusalem, he thought himself obliged to come thither, and to use his best endeavours to settle peace in that monarch's family.

that his son was innocent of any design upon his life or kingdom, but even to make him a turn intercessor in his behalf. Pheroras hearing of this reconciliation, found no better expedient to obtain Herod's pardon, than by coming in a mourning dress, and, at his feet, confessing himself the author of all the slanders raised against the two princes. Herod thus reconciled to his sons, set out with them for Rome, to acquaint the emperor with the whole affair, after having accompanied Artabellus as far as Antioch in his way homewards. He was indeed under an obligation to go and clear his son at the Roman court, because he had, after their second falling out, exhibited several grievous complaints against him to the emperor.

favour with Augustus.

DURING this, and his last journey to Rome, the bands of robbers, whom he had driven out of Trachonitis, having taken shelter in Arabia Petrea, under the protection of Obodas the king of it (K), had made such terrible inroads into Judea, that Herod, on his return, not being able to come at them there, put all their relations and friends to death which he could lay his hands on; which made them more cruel and desperate than ever. By this time the temple being finished, as was hinted above, Herod caused the dedication of it to be performed with his usual magnificence, and, on the following spring, set about the suppressing of the Trachonitish robbers. He began with a law-suit against Syllæus for sixty talents which he had lent him; and having gained his cause before the prefects of Syria, Saturninus and Volumnius, Syllæus, instead of paying the money, slipped away to Rome; whereupon Herod having got leave of those two governors to right himself by arms, marched into Arabia, and there defeated the robbers, demolished their castle, and returned to Jerusalem, without taking any further revenge. But this expedition was like to have cost him dear, through the treachery of Syllæus, who, upon the first hearing of it, went and complained to the emperor, and aggravated the wrongs done to the Arabians to such a degree, that Augustus sent him a very sharp reproof, and would have wholly cast him off, had not he been better informed soon after. Herod had sent two embassies to that prince, and neither of them had been able to get an audience. At length he sent Nicolas Damascen thither, who finding how prejudiced the emperor was against his master, bethought himself of an happy expedient to explode all the accusations of Syllæus, by means of the ambassadors of the Nabathean Arabs, without discovering his errand, till they had cleared the way for him (L). Augustus being now satisfied of Herod's innocence, and of his own too great credulity, was thinking to have taken the Nabathean kingdom from Aretas, and to have made him a present of it; but whilst he was deliberating about it, fresh complaints came to him from that unhappy monarch against his sons, which diverted the emperor from pursuing his design.

Presents new
against his sons.

For whilst these things had been agitating, Salome and Pheroras had again filled Herod's head with new plots and assassinations intended against him by his sons; and tho', upon inquiry, nothing could be proved against them, but a design of retiring into some other country, where they might peaceably outlive their father's tyranny; yet the jealous king took all the rest for granted upon this single evidence, and sent two of his ministers to Rome, with orders, that, if they found the emperor reconciled to him, they should deliver his letter to him, and obtain justice against the two young princes. Augustus having read the letter, and finding Herod desperately bent upon the ruin of his unfortunate sons, sent immediately orders to have them tried at

(K) This prince had a favourite minister named Syllæus, who had formerly made his addresses to Salome; but Herod refusing to give her to him, unless he turned Jew, and Syllæus not daring to consent to it, she had been given to Alexas, one of Herod's confidants. Hence arose a mutual hatred between them, which Syllæus improved, by persuading Obodas to protect those banditti, who did accordingly assign them the fortrels of Repta for a place of retreat, from which they sallied out, and committed innumerable outrages and cruelties, both in Palestine and in Cælo-Syria (37).

(L) These were come to demand justice against Syllæus, who had by that time caused Obodas to be poisoned, and was there soliciting the emperor for that kingdom; but the Nabatheans having set up a king of their own, sent this embassy to Rome, to have him confirmed there, and to have the assassin punished.

Damascen therefore having privately gained them, directed them how to manage their audience in such a manner, as to clear Herod of all that was laid to his charge, without betraying any other design than that of accusing Syllæus. The thing succeeded to his wish, and Damascen putting himself at the head of their embassy, managed his accusation with such address, backing it with the suffrages of his Nabathean colleagues, that Syllæus, who was then present, could not disprove one single point; but was condemned to pay Herod's debt, and then to lose his head (38).

Berytus,

^a Berytus; before the governors of Syria, and other neighbouring provinces, and in particular before Archelaus; and, if they were found guilty, he gave their father leave to punish them as he should think fit. Herod convened them all accordingly, except the Cappadocian king, whom he suspected of too great partiality to his sons; and having left these two unfortunate princes under a strong guard at Platone, a small town of the Syrianians, under pretence that they might be easily brought thence, if the judges did think it necessary, he pleaded his own cause before an assembly of above five hundred persons; but with such violence and brutish resentment, as rather raised their indignation against, than pity for him. He spared for neither evidence nor arguments to have them condemned to die, and concluded with telling them, that
^b being a king, he might have done it by his own authority, according to the laws of Judea; but that he rather chose to have them tried before such an assembly, to avoid the imputation of injustice or cruelty. After a full hearing, Saturnius, who had been formerly consul, voted that they should be punished indeed, but not with death, and was seconded by his three sons, who were then his lieutenants; but they were over-ruled by Volumnius, who condemned them to death, and drew the rest of the judges after him. Only they left it to Herod to execute the sentence when, and how he thought fit.

Damascen, on his return from Rome, did try in vain to dissuade him from too rashly depriving himself of two such sons, and leaving himself in his old age to the mercy of the ambitious Antipater. Tyro, another old experienced soldier, came likewise to beg of him, that he might be admitted to speak to him on the same subject; and, upon his permission, freely told him the danger he was in from that young prince, who, he assured him, entertained some treasonable designs against him, whilst the chiefs of the Jewish nation, to whom he was grown odious on that account, did highly pity his two condemned sons, as less guilty than that brother. Herod stopped him short there, to make him name those chiefs; and, upon his so doing, caused them to be imprisoned. Tyro himself was, by the subtlety of Salome, accused by Herod's barber, of having hired him to cut his throat. Herod had recourse to the rack, which he caused to be given to the accuser, and to Tyro and his son, a youth of about the ^d age of Alexander; and the latter, to save his father from the torture, confessed, that himself alone, without his father's privity, had resolved to kill him, and to save Alexander. Scarce any body believed his confession but Herod, who thereupon caused his two sons to be conveyed to Sebaste, and there strangled, or, as the fourth book of the Maccabees has it, hanged on a post or gallows. Their bodies were afterwards buried at Alexandrión, among their Amonean ancestors ^b.

Puts them to death.

Antipater having now no rival left but his father, and Pheroras, tho' highly obliged to his brother, having lately fallen out with him (M), these two entered into a plot to take him off as soon as possible. Herod had about this time sent Glaphyra, Alexander's widow, back into Cappadocia, and returned her dowry out of his own coffers.
^c There were still two sons left of hers, and two which Aristobulus had had by Berenice, all whom the king had caused to be carefully educated. He had likewise expressed an uncommon concern for them, as well as a remorse for the untimely death of their fathers; and as he found himself upon the decline, he was contriving how to have those young princes so advantageously matched, that he might see them safely and happily settled before he died. But Antipater, who looked upon them in another view, found means to break all his measures, and to persuade him to change the disposition of his family, contrary to his first design ⁱ. It will not be amiss here to give an account of that monarch's wives, and of their issue, in order to understand the sequel of this history. The reader will find both in the margin (N).

(M) The occasion of this rupture, Josephus tells us (39), was, that Herod had formerly offered his brother his daughter in marriage, whom he had refused for the sake of a favourite servant, with whom he was deeply in love, and did soon after marry. Herod hereupon insisted upon his divorcing her, and marrying another of his daughters. Pheroras bound himself in the most solemn manner to perform it within a month; but when the time came, he absolutely refused; and Antipater taking the advantage of this breach, easily drew him into his treasonable design.

(N) Herod had nine wives, the first of whom, named Doris, was the mother of Antipater. The second was Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-priest, by whom he had a son named Herod, called also Philip, who had married Herodias, on whose account the baptist was afterwards beheaded.

New troubles in Judea.

Herod falls sick.

Antipater's
plot against him discovered.

IN the mean time another thing happened, which rendered Herod more odious to the Jews, and more irreconcilable to his brother. An edict lately issued out, commanding the Jewish nation to swear allegiance to Augustus, and to the king, had been strenuously opposed by the pharisees to the number of seven thousand, as contrary to the Mosaic law^k; for which contumacy Herod had condemned them to a severe fine, which had been paid by Pheroras's new wife. This generous deed of hers had therefore so ingratiated her to that sect, that they scrupled not to persuade the people, from a pretended prophetic spirit, that God was going to transfer the crown from the line of Herod to the posterity of his brother's wife. Salome failed not to acquaint Herod with it, who having put several of the ring-leaders to death, commanded his brother to put his wife away, as the cause of this new sedition. Pheroras, upon his obstinate refusal to comply with his command, was forbid the court, and the rest of Herod's family to have any further conversation with him. Pheroras was glad to take this opportunity of retiring into his tetrarchy, and took an oath never to return to court again whilst Herod lived. His being at that distance from the metropolis, was indeed a likely expedient to prevent his being suspected of having a hand in what he was then hatching against the king's life; and for the same reason Antipater procured himself to be sent for to Rome to attend upon Augustus. Thus had these two politic persons contrived to screen themselves from discovery, whilst their instruments were on work to bring about their treacherous design; but an accident soon after happened, which brought their whole treason to light.

Herod, who was fallen sick, and still retained a great love for his brother, had sent for him to communicate some private orders to him, and Pheroras had refused it, on pretence that he dared not violate his oath. He fell sick soon after, and Herod recovered, and was so far from resenting his late refusal, that he paid him an affectionate visit, without staying for an invitation from him. Pheroras dying two days after his arrival, he caused him to be magnificently buried at Jerusalem. But his death proved the beginning of Antipater's disgrace: for two of the deceased's freed-men came and demanded justice against his wife, whom they accused of having dispatched him with some poison, which she had given him on that very evening, on which he was taken ill. Herod had recourse to his old way of extorting the truth by the rack; in particular, the women of Pheroras's family suffered it at first with a surprising constancy; but one of them was at length forced by the excess of the torture to cry out, that she prayed to God, that Doris, Antipater's mother, might bear her share of the torments, which she had been the cause of. At these words Herod having caused them to be more cruelly tortured, as well as one Antipater, an officer under his treacherous son, the whole plot was unravelled; and upon comparing their several depositions, and the intelligence which Salome had already given to the king, it was found, that the poison, of which Pheroras died, had been procured from Alexandria by a friend of Antipater, from whom it was conveyed by Antipater's mother to Pheroras, in order

* Vid. Deut. xvii. 15.

The third was his brother's daughter. The fourth his first cousin. He had no children by these two last.

The fifth was called Martac, a Samaritan, by whom he had Archelaus and Antipas, the former of whom succeeded him in the half of the kingdom under the name of Tetrarch, and the latter, called also Philip, married Salome, the dancing daughter of Herodias above-mentioned.

The sixth, named Cleopatra, was a native of Jerusalem, by whom he had two sons, Herod called also Antipas, and Philip. Herod having married Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, during his life, was reproved for it by John the baptist, and caused him to be put to death.

Pallas was his seventh wife, by whom he had a son, named Phasael. The eighth was Phadra, by whom he had only one daughter, named Roxana; and by the last, called Elpis, he had another daughter called Salome (40).

As to his grandsons, by his beloved Mariamne, mother of Alexander and Aristobolus, lately put to death, they make likewise a considerable figure in history, and especially those of the latter in the gospel, and deserve here a particular mention.

Aristobolus left two sons, and a daughter whom he had by Berenice his wife, as we have seen a little higher, namely Agrippa, Herod, and Herodias. Agrippa, at first clapt into prison by Tiberius, and afterwards made king of Judea by Caligula (41), was he who put James the brother of John to death, imprisoned Peter, and was smitten with death at Cæsarea (42). Herod was made king of Chalcis, and is only known in St. Luke for his marriage with the dancing daughter of Herodias, as we hinted above.

As for Agrippa, he left a son of the same name, before whom and his sister Berenice St. Paul was admitted to plead his cause at Cæsarea (43), and another daughter, named Drusilla, married to Felix, governor of Judea (44).

- a to be given to the king upon the first opportunity. All which was upon further examination acknowledged by Pheroras's wife, who added that she would go and fetch it to him; and, instead of doing so, flung herself down from a high gallery; but her fall not proving mortal, she, upon Herod's promise of a general pardon, depose further, that her husband being stung with remorse at his receiving this last visit from him, had ordered her to fetch the poison, and to burn it before his face, which she had accordingly done, except a small dose that she had reserved for herself in case of necessity. The box, and rest of the poison being produced, and acknowledged by other witnesses, convinced Herod of his son's perfidy, not only to himself, but to the two sons of his favourite Mariamne. His other wife of that name was likewise accused
b of being in the same plot, and though nothing was proved against her, yet was she banished, her son Herod disinherited, and her father deposed from the high-priesthood (O). Doris was likewise stript of all her costly ornaments, which amounted to a large sum, and banished the court¹.

BUT it is now time to leave for a while Herod in his sad distracted condition, and the nation in their feuds and resentments against him, and turn our eyes on more important matters; those great and inestimable blessings which heaven was then ready to shower down, not only on the Jews, had they not rendered themselves unworthy of them, but on the whole world, who, we are told, were then in an universal expectation of them under the promised Messiah. For about this time the angel Gabriel, who had been
c formerly sent to manifest to Daniel the precise time of his coming, by a determinate number of weeks^m (P), was again sent to Zachary, a pious and upright priest of the

John the baptist born.

(O) Simon was succeeded in that dignity by one Mattias the son of Theophilus, a native of Jerusalem. But this pontiff having on the following expiation eve contracted some pollution †, which incapacitated him from officiating on that grand solemnity, a near relation of his, named Joseph, the son of Ellemus, was substituted in his room: Mattias enjoyed his dignity but one year, after which he was deposed for being privy to an insurrection raised at Jerusalem, and succeeded by Joazar his brother-in-law (45).

(P) This is justly allowed one of the noblest prophecies in the whole Old Testament, and one of the strongest proofs of christianity against the Jews, since it determines the very time on which Christ was to come into the world, enter into his ministry, and be cut off for the sins of the people; soon after which was to follow the destruction of the Jews, or, as the prophet words it, their ceasing to be a nation or people, and the promulgation of the gospel, or of the new covenant, in and by that Messiah.

The whole prophecy runs as follows (46): Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city to finish (or restrain) the transgression, and make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most holy one. Know therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah, the prince, shall be seven weeks; and threescore and two weeks the street shall be built again, and the wall, and even in anxious (or perilous) times; and after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself; and the people of the prince that shall come, shall destroy the city and the sanctuary, and the end of it shall be with (or like) an inundation, and unto the end of the war desolation is determined; and he shall confirm the covenant with many during one week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and he shall make it desolate on account of the over-spreading of abominations, until the determined extermination be poured on the land, or people, that is become liable to that desolation.

It will not be expected that we should here enter into a comment on this prophecy, much less into a dissertation on the various ways of computing the seventy weeks here mentioned, and the various times, which interpreters, both Jewish and Christians, have assigned for the beginning and ending of that prophetic epocha. And yet, as the subject is of no small moment, the reader will doubtless be glad to hear at least how it is best calculated and made out by the latter, and by what subtrefuges the former endeavour to evade the force of it.

The generality of the Jews do agree with us, that those prophetic weeks are weeks of years, or of a day for a year, according to the prophetic style. Though some of them, in order to puzzle the cause, have pretended to understand them of weeks of jubilees, or of seven sabbatic *, that is, forty-nine weeks each, amounting in all to 3430 years (47). A good long epocha, and very proper to keep up the drooping hopes of the Jews about the Messiah's coming. Others stretch it still farther, to seven thousand years, that is, by allowing a hundred years to every week; but the generality understand those weeks of seven lunar or Jewish years, as we do, according to which seventy weeks will make four hundred and ninety years. But here they finding themselves closely pinched by that computation, have had recourse to various pitiful shifts to explode it. We shall give our readers a sketch of some of the best of them, by which he may guess at the rest.

Some of them pretend, that the words of the prophet, from the going forth of the command to restore and to build, are not to be understood from the issuing out of Cyrus or Darius's decree; but from the time of those words being prophetically pronounced by Jeremiah to Zedekiah king of Judah (48), course of Abiab, whilst he stood offering the sacred incense in the temple, according to the priestly office^a, to foretel him the birth of a son, the miraculous child of old age and barrenness; a son whom he should shortly have by his virtuous wife Elizabeth, and who should be a Nazarite, and the fore-runner and great harbinger of the world's redeemer^o. Here the good old priest, surprized at the vision, and conscious of his and his spouse's extreme old age, could not forbear desiring to have his faith confirmed by some further miraculous token; and the angel granted his request, and in such a manner, as might at once be a reproof to his diffidence, and a confirmation of the message he had delivered to him. Zacharias was accordingly struck dumb on that instant, and continued so, till the promised child was actually born.

Six months after this vision, the same heavenly messenger was sent to an obscure young virgin, named Mary, who dwelt then at Nazareth, with, and under the guardianship of her espoused husband Joseph, both of them of the house and lineage of some years before the captivity (49); and to shew their wretched skill in chronology, conclude the epocha with us at the destruction of the temple. Others, St. Jerom tells us (50), began it at Darius the Mede, and ended it with those above-mentioned at the destruction of Jerusalem; only they allowed the eight remaining weeks for the total dispersion of the Jewish nation completed under the emperor Adrian.

A third sort begin the seventy weeks at the destruction of the first temple by Nebuchadnezzar, and end it at the destruction of the second, by Titus Vespasian (1). Shrinking thereby an epoch of six hundred and sixty years into this of four hundred and ninety, to make it agree with the seventy weeks, and thereby betraying still more their ignorance of chronology. This devastation of the city and temple, and the dispersion of the Jews, is according to this latter system to last till the overthrow of Gog and Magog by the Messiah; but when that will happen, they do not pretend to guess. For these reasons they are altogether at a loss how to explain this prophecy, so as to evade the consequences drawn from it by the christians against them, and have fallen into various hypotheses, equally absurd and ridiculous, about the Messiah. Some think, that the sins of the nation have retarded his coming; others, that he came at the appointed time, but did not appear publicly; others, that he is still hid in some obscure part of the world, waiting till they are fit to receive him; others have imagined two Messiahs, one humble, obscure, and rejected; and another as yet to come, glorious, warlike, victorious, and universally acknowledged. Lastly, and to name no more, from a sense of the manifest deficiency of all these evasory shifts, they have agreed to leave the dispute about the Messiah in suspensio till better times, and have prohibited all further inquiries and calculations about it under a severe anathema (2).

The christians are not exactly agreed either in the placing the beginning and end of these weeks, or in the calculations of those lunar or Jewish years. Both differences however are inconsiderable, if duly attended to; the former is intirely owing to our imperfect knowledge of the chronology of those times. Had we a sure guide in it, the point would not be long unsettled. But whilst in this uncertainty one author will place the beginning at the decree of Cyrus, another at that of Darius, a third at that of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and each of them endeavours to stretch or shorten the chrono-nology of each interval, as best suits with his hypothesis; it is no wonder there is so little agreement among them, and so little certainty to be gathered from the whole dispute.

The difference arising from the various computations of the Jewish years is still more inconsiderable, since it can amount at most but to nine or ten years between those who make it longest, and those who make it shortest; and who can wonder at it, or urge it as an objection against this prophecy, that considers the variety of computations, of either the Jews, of which we have formerly spoken more fully*, or of other nations, from which this epoch is to be calculated and rectified? Upon the whole then, these difficulties duly considered, an impartial reader will doubtless rest satisfied with that system, which best adjusts the seventy weeks or four hundred and ninety years of the prophecy to the chronology of that epoch, according to the best light that can be had of it from the sacred and profane historians.

Waving therefore some minute differences between the authors that have written on that subject, the system most universally received by protestants as well as Roman catholics is that of Julius Africanus (3), as it has been amended by some late eminent chronologers (4), who place the beginning of it, expressed in the words of the prophecy, From the going forth of the commandment to rebuild, &c. at the beginning of its execution, which was not done till Nehemiah's coming to Jerusalem to see it punctually performed, and the end of it at the death of the Messiah; which interval makes up the four hundred and ninetieth year here foretold. For as to the first, it is plain, that Nehemiah found the work quite obstructed, and set aside, at his first arrival there, and that he set immediately about and finished it (5). This command, which was given in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (6), is not however to be understood, according to them, of the twentieth year of his reigning alone, which would make the whole period too long by ten years; but of the twentieth of his reigning in partnership with his father (on a supposition that he was admitted into it by him ten years before his death) which will be the tenth of his reigning alone.

This system, which seems clearly to remove all difficulties, is attended with only one, viz. the silence of historians, and the unlikelihood of Artaxerxes being admitted so early into partnership with his father; and this objection, small as it is, has been however however thought weighty enough to oblige the learned Prideaux (7) to steer a new course, which our readers will perhaps better approve than the former. But as he has treated the subject in such a full and prolix manner, as would swell this note beyond due bounds, and the book itself is in every body's hands, and in our own language, we shall refer the readers to it for the further clearing of this noble prophecy.

In the conclusion the prophet is told, that after the cutting off of the Messiah the temple and city shall be destroyed by a strange nation, that shall come like an inundation against it, and that the desolation of the land shall be preceded by an overflowing of abominations; all which sufficiently prefigures the Roman eagles set up in the temple, prophetically also alluded to by Christ himself (8), followed by the profanation, plundering and firing of that holy place. In the middle of the week, the sacrifices, oblations, &c. were to cease, not actually, for they did not do so till the destruction of the city, about forty years after; but they lost their efficacy, and became useless and insignificant after the grand sacrifice of the Saviour of the world, which they were to prefigure, and from which alone they received their efficacy. Lastly, those who had thus rejected, and put to death the Messiah, were to cease to be a people, be dispersed, desolate, &c. all which the Jews have sufficiently felt to their cost.

The destruction and lasting desolation of the city, but more particularly of the temple, was indeed to be the finishing stroke of the christian evidence against the Jews. We have shewn in a former volume †, how these evade the pregnant prophecies of Jacob, that the shepards should not depart from Judah, &c. (9) and the reader has now seen what wretched shifts they make to elude this of Daniel's week, at the expence of sense and chronology. There seemed therefore still wanting a more irrefragable proof, if not to convince, at least to silence that insatuated nation, with respect to this important article of the Messiah's being come at the appointed time, and of the vanity of those that still expect him; and this was the prophecy of his coming during the standing of the second temple, and rendering it more glorious by his presence than that of Solomon, notwithstanding its great disparity in other respects, concerning which the reader may look back to what has been said at the beginning of this chapter *. When therefore this temple was destroyed, it ought to have convinced them that he was really come, as his apostles and disciples affirmed, though there had been a new one immediately built; how much more when all attempts for the rebuilding it have been hitherto frustrated? But of this we shall have a proper occasion to speak more fully in the sequel.

We beg leave here only to observe further, that if the total destruction of the city and temple, and the dispersion of the Jews, did not immediately follow the crucifixion of the Messiah, they became obnoxious to it from that time; and God seems only to have protracted the sentence during those forty years to give them time to repent of that atrocious fact, which, as St. Peter observes (10), they had committed through ignorance. Accordingly we find that vast numbers of them prevented it by a timely conversion (11), whilst the more obdurate sort refusing to acknowledge that crime (12, and embrace the proffered mercy, were thereupon dispersed throughout the world, to be, against their will, a standing evidence of the truth of the scriptures and prophecies, and of their own judicial blindness and punishment.

(Q) We have taken notice in a former volume, that the Jews had a law which expressly forbid heiresses to marry out of their own tribes (13). It is true, the virgin Mary seems to have been far enough from being one of that sort, at least in possession, whatever she might be in reversion, or by virtue of the jubilee laws, according to which all lands and inheritances were to revolve to the original owner, or to his next heir or heiress †. But there was still a much greater tie, which kept the virgins of the tribe of Judah, but especially those of the house of David, from marrying into another tribe or family, namely, the sure expectation they had that the Messiah was to be of that lineage, and to be born in Bethlehem, the city and patrimony of that monarch; and how careful every family was to preserve their genealogy, needs not be repeated.

It is therefore in vain that the Jews exclaim against the uncertainty of Christ's being of the seed of David, because Joseph's and not Mary's genealogy is deduced from him by the two evangelists, who is yet affirmed by them to have had no share in his conception. The certainty of the virgin's descent from that house is rendered evident enough by what we observed above, especially if we add the testimony of the evangelists themselves, who call her miraculous child the son or descendant of David. If it be asked, why they chose rather to give us that of her husband? it may be answered, that they conformed in it to the custom of the Hebrews, and even of the sacred writers, who deduce their genealogies from the male rather than the female line; for if Christ the son of Mary was the son or descendant of David, it must follow that his mother must be so too.

But the greater difficulty is, to reconcile the variations of the two genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and we much question whether the greater part of our readers would care to have all repeated that has been said on that subject, though in ever so succinct an epitome, especially considering that the point has not been so sufficiently cleared hitherto, as to leave no room for fresh cavils and objections. Yet that our silence might not be interpreted for a giving up of the cause, we shall subjoin a few observations we have been able to make, some of which, though intirely new, may yet furnish the curious inquirers into these abstruse matters, with a better key to reconcile those two genealogies, if not to clear and confirm the one by the help of the other, than they have as yet met with; and as we design the following remarks chiefly for such of our studious readers, we shall content ourselves with giving them as hints for them to exert their talents upon, without confining ourselves so much to method, as we do in other notes.

First, then, we beg leave to observe, that the titles of father and son, as well as the terms so begot, and be begotten, in the language of scripture, do not always imply an immediate, but frequently a remote succession. Hence the phrase often used by Moses, when thou shalt hereafter begot children and children's children (14), and the name of father or son given should therefore give the significant name of Jesus, or Saviour, according to the prophecies long since written of him. Those that relate to this particular head, are as follow : Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Emanuel, &c.

given to a predecessor or successor at the distance of two, three, or more generations, as will more fully appear by the sequel. This being premised, will serve as a basis to the following remarks on the subject of those two gospel genealogies.

1st, St. Matthew gives one genealogy, and St. Luke another, and both in some names vary from the Old Testament.

2dly, St. Matthew, who begins his from Abraham, divides it into forty-two successions, called by him generations ; that is, fourteen before } the regal government.

fourteen under fourteen after

4thly, The next fourteen in St. Matthew contain the legal succession of the line of Solomon, until its extinction in Jechoniah, ab. Coniah, and Jehoiachim (15), when the line of Nathan the son of David, and brother of Solomon, took place.

5thly, The inheritance in the Jewish polity being unalienable farther than the jubilee, as was before hinted, and then revolving to the next surviving heir, the latter, though at some distance from the former, was called the son, that is, properly the successor of the former. Thus Salathiel, who by St. Luke's genealogy appears to have been the descendant of Nathan the son of David, is by St. Matthew said to be begotten by Jechoniah (16), the last of the Solomonic line, because he was the next surviving heir of the house of David after Jechoniah's death. Had not therefore Solomon's line been set down, and the end thereof noted, it could not have appeared from St. Luke, how Salathiel came by his title of succession ; for the line of Nathan could not have any claim to it, whilst that of Solomon subsisted, unless in an uncertain reversion ; and this will account for the difference between St. Luke and St. Matthew, in these middle fourteen generations.

6thly, But there is likewise in this latter succession a manifest variation as to the number from the books of the Old Testament. It has indeed been solved by saying that the evangelist aiming only at the three round numbers of fourteen generations above-mentioned, had overlooked or purposely past by some of the redundant ones ; and this answer hath hitherto past for current.

But the difference seems to arise from something more material, than the bare aim at an equality of numbers. The historical books set down all the kings in general that had reigned from David to Jechoniah ; but St. Matthew, as a genealogist, seems to take notice only of those who had a legal title, and to omit the others. Of this latter sort we take Ahaziah the son of Jehoram by Athaliah to have been, who is said to have been made king by the inhabitants of Jerusalem upon his father's death, because his elder brother had been killed by Philiſtes (17), which seems to intimate that they had chosen him in lieu of some infant son of his deceased brother. For had not this been the case, he would have succeeded of course, without the people's choice. In the same class we may put Joash, who succeeded his father Ahaziah, and Amaziah the son of Joash, all who might succeed each other in prejudice to the elder branch, till this being extinct, made way for the younger in Uſiah or Oſias, the son of Amaziah, who is therefore called by the evangelist, the son (18), that is, as we have hinted above, the successor of Jehoram, though at the distance of three generations above-mentioned.

Thus again Zedekiah, who was set up by the king of Babylon in prejudice of his elder brother Jechoniah, is likewise omitted by the evangelist. Now when these irregular successions are taken away, there will remain but the same fourteen which are mentioned in his genealogy.

7thly, The next variation between the two evangelists is in the last fourteen generations, and arises from the one's constant care of pointing out the passing of the inheritance as far as it goes in the elder branch. They both agree as far as Zerubbabel, after which St. Matthew goes on with Abiud, and his heirs, down to Eleazar, where the line of Abiud ends ; and then he sets down as his son and successor Matthan (19), who is by St. Luke mentioned under the name of Matthat, and was of the line of Rhesa (20) the son of Zerubbabel. So that he entered into the regular succession after the extinction of that of Abiud.

Thus again, Matthat or Matthan dying childless, Eli was obliged, according to the Mosaic law, to take his wife, and raise up seed to him, and by him begot Joseph the husband of Mary, who, according to the same law, was still reputed as the son of the dead elder brother. For this reason St. Matthew rightly calls him the son of Jacob ; whereas St. Luke, who did not proceed on the same method, calls him the son of Eli. The first gives us the name of his legal, the other of his natural father.

St. Matthew might in all probability have fetched his genealogy from the records of Beulahem, the patrimony of David, and wherein therefore none were entered, but such as by a regular lineal descent were in actual possession of it, and where the younger branch, though in actual possession of the crown, could not be regularly inrolled, as long as there was any heir of the elder left alive, or till such a time as this latter failed. St. Luke, on the other hand, who, as he tells us in the preface to his gospel, proposed to supply such defects as he found in those who had writ the history of Jesus Christ before him, fearing lest these omissions should cause some confusion, for want of pointing out when the younger succeeded the elder branch, had recourse to the book of the chronicles, where the series of the successions, both regular and irregular, legal and illegal, are exhibited. So that both had their genealogies from the most authentic, though different records, and scrupulously adhered each to his own, according to the scheme they had in view, and consequently, instead of clashing, do more probably clear and confirm each other.

There is still one difficulty left with respect to St. Luke's genealogy, viz. his introducing of Cainan in the line of Shem, adding thereto one generation contrary to the Hebrew text in Genesis and the Chronicles, and all the versions of it, except the Septuagint, contrary to the concurring testimony of Josephus, Philo, and other Jewish doctors, as well as to that of the ancient fathers ; all who not only omit Cainan's name, but reckon only ten generations from Noah to Abraham, whereas with this there would be eleven.

This difference has given commentators more pains to reconcile, than we think it deserved, considering the likelihood there is of its having been jumped into St. Luke's text by the carelessness of the transcribers, there being another Cainan mentioned in the verse immediately following, which might be a.60, according to the old close way of writing, in the very next line. But allowing it to have been originally in St. Luke, it is plain, he must have had it out of the septuagint, which version both he and the other sacred writers his contemporaries used, and the copy which he then had might have been corrupted after the same careless manner ; for it doth not appear that all the copies of that version had this name, else it would be found in all the Latin versions of it, as well as in Josephus, Philo, and the fathers ; and then they must have reckoned eleven instead of ten generations.

The time may be said even on the supposition, that it was originally put in by the seventy interpreters ; for as neither they, nor the transcribers of the Hebrew copy, which they took with them into Egypt, were infallible (at least we think we have made it appear they were not, when we spoke of their version) how easily might that word have crept into the text by their inadvertency !

But if all this will not satisfy the scrupulous, what we have observed above of the distinction of natural and legal parents, will easily remove the difficulty ; so that Arphaxad might be the natural father of Sala, and the legal one of Cainan, or vice versa. There is therefore no need of having recourse, as some have done, to injurious suppositions against the Jews, as if they had purposely scratched out the name of Cainan in their Hebrew copies, that they might take occasion to cry down the septuagint version ; much less to other more violent means, to account for so small a variation, which, for aught appears to the contrary, was occasioned by the mere oversight of a transcriber, and the more probably, of St. Luke's own copy, than of either original or Greek version.

(R) This prophecy has been very much canvassed of late by our modern sceptics, and as learnedly answered by several eminent hands. Those disputes are so recent, that we need not refer our readers to the authors who have wrote on either side. As for the difficulty that is raised, how the prophecy of a child thus miraculously born, could be a satisfaction to Ahaz, to whom it was addressed, unless it was fulfilled in his time, we have answered it in a former volume, to which the reader may, if he pleases, have recourse †.

(S) Our readers may perhaps be willing to know what answer or evasion the Jews make use of against such pregnant prophecies ; and it will not be amiss here to give them a specimen of them out of one of their subtlest and boldest champions (21), by which he may guess at the rest.

First then, to the former of these prophecies, where the miraculous child is called Jesus or Saviour, because he was to save his people from their sins, they in general, and this in particular, answer to this effect : Who has told you that the sin of Adam has intailed any guilt on his posterity ? Was not that of his son Cain, who murdered his brother, a thousand times greater than the biting of an apple ? and yet no such thing is said of his posterity being tainted with it. Besides, where is there any mention made that the Messiah was to save his people from their sins ? and if there was, how did Jesus save us from them, when you own he made us commit one infinitely heavier in crucifying him ? In vain do you tell us of a redeemer of souls, we expect none but a redeemer of bodies, a Messiah that shall deliver us from slavery, and make us again a flourishing victorious nation and kingdom.

To the second prophecy, the sarcastic author above quoted gives the following answer in a kind of triumphing tone. We will join issue with you, tho', according to your interpretation, it should have been written his names (instead of his name shall be called) but waving that, how can his (Jesus's) name be called wonderful counsellor ? Did not Judas rather defeat his council, when he betrayed him unknown to him ? He could not be the gibbor, or mighty one, seeing he was put to death : He could not be the Abbi, the everlasting father, or father of eternity, because he was cut off in the midst of his days. Lastly, he could not be called the prince of peace, because he enjoyed none himself, neither have wars ever ceased since his time ; yea, himself lays, that he did not come to bring peace, but war upon earth.

Others endeavour to elude the force of the prophecy, by pretending that the impersonal וְיִקְרָא שְׁמִי, he shall call, refers to God ; and consequently that all those titles there mentioned refer to him, and not to the child there spoken of. But this evasion is so ungrammatical, and contrary to the plain import, in a vast number of parallel places, that others of them have disowned it.

(T) Of this kind is that of Jeremiah (22) : The Lord will create a new thing upon the earth, a female (or woman) shall encompass a man ; which the context plainly shews to allude to the days of the Messiah, and most probably, from the natural sense of the words, to the miraculous pregnancy of this virgin. However, the Jews not only take them in a very different sense, but exclaim against us for urging this text to them.

Especially the Jewish author above-quoted, who here, as every-where else, rather exposes his inveterate rancour against the Christians, than his skill in the prophetic writings. It would doubtless offend our reader's ears, to tell him what a filthy word this vile wretch has found for the blessed mother of Christ, by the alteration of the first letter of her name, or the blasphemies which most of their other writers vent against him and his religion. It shall suffice to have given this hint of it once for all. We shall spare them for the future, since their distorting the obvious sense of the sacred writings, whilst they acknowledge the divine authority of them, doth but the more evince the truth of the one, and the invincible obstinacy of the other.

Another text hitherto misunderstood, and worse translated, and which we think to be prophetic of the birth of Christ of a virgin, is that of the Proverbs, chap. xxxi. verse 19. The way of the man, not with the maid, as our version renders it, but in the virgin ; but this we have had occasion to explain in a former volume, to which we refer the reader *.

virgin was so far from calling to mind those prophecies, that she looked on her virginity, which it is most likely she had resolved to preserve under the guardianship of an aged religious husband, as an obstacle to the accomplishment of the angel's word, till, assured at length by him of the miraculous conception of that divine child, with an humble confidence she wholly submitted herself to the will of heaven. The angel having at the same time acquainted her with the pregnancy of her cousin Elizabeth in her old age, she went up into the mountainous country to congratulate her and her husband upon it. At the first embracing of these three holy persons, whose ecstatic joy can only be guessed from the pathetic account which the evangelist has left us of it^a; Elizabeth, who was far advanced in her pregnancy, felt her child give a leap in her womb, from which she began to conceive a higher notion^b of her visitor, and which she expressed in terms of the deepest respect and gratitude. Mary, on her part, being filled with rapturous joy at what she had heard, testified her humble sense for all the divine favours she saw herself blest with in that most heavenly canticle, which the same evangelist has preserved to us; and after three months abode, returned to her homely habitation at Nazareth. During her stay there, Elizabeth being delivered of the promised son, gave him the name of John (U), as his father had been commanded by the angel; and Zacharias having testified his consent to it in writing, found his tongue immediately loosed, and his heart filled with the Holy Ghost; and broke out into an eucharistic and prophetic hymn, which inspired the wondering by-standers, with singular hopes concerning this new-born child^c.

DURING this time, that part of Judaea, which is called Trachonitis (W), and which was very rocky and mountainous, had been the receptacle of a great number of banditti, and free-booters, who, as we have already hinted, lived chiefly upon the plunder which they got by their constant excursions, sometimes towards Judaea, sometimes towards Arabia. What was still worse, they infested the roads that led from the Babylonish territories to Jerusalem, and hindered the concourse of the Jews of those quarters to the annual feasts. Herod, who had already been at a vast deal of pains to ferret them out of their dens, and lurking-holes, bethought himself at length of a way of suppressing them effectually. He began with enlarging and fortifying a village, which was conveniently situated in the heart of the country, and became in time a considerable town. Hither he invited a certain Jewish captain, named Zamaris, who was gone at the head of five hundred well-armed men to settle in a castle in the neighbourhood of Antioch; and gave him and his men so many encouragements and immunities, that they came and fixed their abode there, and soon cleared all that country of that plundering vermin^d. Zamaris, who was both valliant and religious, did not only signalise himself in this province, but left a noble offspring like himself, whose very names were sufficient to deter the rest of that gang from settling there any more.

Christ the Saviour of the world born.

THE virgin Mary, who was returned, from her visit to Zacharias, to Nazareth, the place of her abode, began now to give such signs of her pregnancy, as made her aged spouse, who had wholly abstained from matrimonial converse with her, to conceive some strong suspicion of her incontinency. He was thereupon contriving some means to give her a private divorce, without exposing her to the rigour of the law; when he was apprised by an angel, that her conception was altogether miraculous, and that he ought not to hesitate one moment to take her and her child under his patronage, since that miraculous son was appointed by heaven to be the saviour of his people. Joseph immediately obeyed, and took her to his home, but lived in perfect continence with her till the time of her delivery^e, if not, of his death (X). In the mean time Beth-lehem,

The greatest part indeed of it, according to Josephus, who places it between Palestine and Cælo-Syria, had such ridges of rocks and mountains, especially on the sides of Arabia and Iturea, that some of them had caverns large enough to lodge a thousand men (24).

- a lehem, the city of David, and not the obscure city of Nazareth, being the place pointed at by the prophet for the birth of the Messiah ¹, the divine wisdom so ordered it, that the decree of Augustus for taking a fresh survey of the Roman empire, Augustus's and the number and estimate of all persons, estates, riches, &c. (Y) should reach Judæa ^{decrees} about this time, which obliged the pregnant virgin and her husband to repair thither, to be inrolled with all those that were of the house and lineage of David. The great concourse of people coming to that place, put this poor little family under two inconveniencies, viz. a long stay, and the want of a lodging, and proper entertainment; yet was this also conducted by a special providence, that he, who was to be the pattern of humility, should begin and end his race in the same low and dejected path. Accordingly, when the pregnant virgin found herself near the time of her delivery, she was forced to take up with the mean accommodation of a stable, where having brought forth her god-like son, she wrapped him up in swaddling-cloaths, and for want of a better, made the poor manger serve him for a cradle.

- But this humble rising of the sun of righteousness did soon break out into its peculiar lustre, when an angel, at the head of an heavenly host, proclaimed his wonderful birth to the watching shepherds, and celebrated it with that noble hymn, Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men; and here began the first part of the character of that divine child, hinted above out of the prophet, to be displayed, And he shall be called Wonderful; wonderfully conceived, wonderfully born, and as wonderfully manifested. Accordingly, the angel having declared to the shepherds, that on that day was born in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord, gives them these wonderful signs to discover him by: Ye shall find the babe wrapped up in swaddling cloaths, and lying in a manger ²; and the shepherds going to the place, and finding all things as had been told to them, became themselves the publishers of the joyful news, and began to fill the neighbourhood with hopes of their long-expected and now assured deliverance. The child's parents, according to the Mosaic law, circumcised him on the eighth day, and gave him the name of Jesus, as they had been directed by the angel (Z) ³.

to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, doth not always imply the duration of a thing to such a time, but often carries a continuation unto the end; otherwise Christ would have his session at the right hand of God no longer than till his enemies were made his foot-stool (25). Timothy would have been obliged, according to St. Paul's exhortation (26), to have vacated to the scriptures, and other episcopal duties, no longer than till the coming of that apostle to him; and Jacob would have been no longer intitled to the divine protection, than till God had performed the promise of bringing him safe to his own home again (27). The reader may see many more instances of the like nature in the famous concordance of indeclinables printed by Froben (28).

If it be objected, why Joseph, who is by St. Matthew called a righteous man, should scruple to expose his wife to the rigour of the Mosaic law, which condemns all such to death; it is answered, that the word righteous is here used by the evangelist in opposition to one of a severe and rigorous disposition, and rather means a charitable person, who, though he abhors the crime, yet thinks there is a debt of mercy and compassion due to the offender; and who could have a greater claim to it, than a young and unexperienced virgin?

(Y) When this way of surveying came in vogue in the Roman empire, how and by whom it was performed, shall be shewn in the Roman history. We need only take notice that Augustus caused three of these to be made in his time, of which this was the second; it had been begun somewhat above seven years before the vulgar or christian æra, that is, above three years before the birth of Christ; and it might be well all that time going through the provinces of Cælo-Syria, Phœnice, and part of Judæa, before it came to Bethlehem (29), since that which had been made by David, of the single province of Judæa, (though it doth not appear that the commissioners were to take an estimate of the estates, but only the number of fighting men) had taken up three whole years, though they were recalled before they had gone through with it (30).

It may not be amiss to observe further concerning this decree of Augustus, that there is a kind of dissonance between St. Luke and Josephus, the former calling it a decree for taxing the empire, and the other affirming that no tax was paid in Judæa during Herod and his son Archelaus's reign, and that it did not begin till the deposition of the latter, when that province was put under a Roman governor or president. This was not till twelve years after, when Cyrenius, as he is called by the Greeks and the evangelists, or in the Roman style Pub. Sulp. Quirinius, was sent president of Syria (31).

The difference is easily reconciled; the decree issued out by Augustus was in order to have the empire taxed according to the estimate made by this survey. Judæa, though then subject to Rome, was excepted by the favour of the emperor, till the deposition of Archelaus, when it began to take place there under that new president. This sense, which seems the obvious one of the evangelist, doth in no way really clash with the Jewish historian (32).

Janus shuts.

ANOTHER remarkable occurrence, and very proper to usher in both this character of Wonderful, as well as the other of Prince of peace, was, that the temple of Janus was then shut, which was never done, but when the empire enjoyed a profound peace^a, as it did at this time, and continued to do twelve whole years (A). But the most signal manifestation of this new-born Saviour, and which put the whole city of Jerusalem into an uproar, was the arrival of the magi, or wise-men from the east (B), to that we have, that of our most excellent Usher, in the four thousand year of the world; and falls in exactly with an old tradition of the Jews mentioned in a former volume, that the world should last two thousand years before the law, two thousand under the law, and two thousand under the Messiah, according to the six days of the Mosaic creation; after which was to follow the seventh, or millennium †.

Accordingly, we find that there was about this time an universal expectation of him among all the Jews, and even among the Heathens, who might have it probably from them; the sacred books having by this time been a considerable while translated into Greek, as we have seen in a former section. Neither is it improbable, they might still retain a kind of traditionary notion of him from the prophecy of Balaam concerning the wonderful star that was to arise out of Jacob (33); and this may be the reason why these so readily embraced christianity, whilst the Jews, blinded with prejudice, and soothed into the hopes of a conquering deliverer, rejected both him and his doctrine. But of this hereafter.

We have seen a little higher how the Jews evade those prophecies, which fixed the coming of Christ to this time by several manifest indices; and need we wonder they should do the same thing by this tradition? Their common salvo, that the sins of the nation has retarded his coming, is a plain acknowledgment, that they look upon the time as long since expired, though they will hardly own it in so many words. But here they go from a received notion of their doctors, that though God may protract or even remit the evils he denounces against men, as he did in the case of the Ninevites, yet he never doth so with his promises, but punctually performs them in due time. According to which notion they used to try a true from a false prophet; that is, they did not condemn him, if his threatening did not come to pass, but only when his promises failed.

This notion of the Messiah's coming being retarded on account of the sins of the nation, is indeed the natural offspring of a much greater error; their expecting him to have appeared in the pomp and grandeur of a conquering and victorious monarch, who was to free them from the Roman yoke, and bring this, and all other nations, under that of the Jews; for this is the sense they put on all those prophecies which set forth the glories of his kingdom; and these being the chief blessings they expected from him, and on which they set the highest value, what more likely cause could be assigned for his delay, than that of their sins?

But could they have opened their eyes to the opposite part of his character, which is there as plainly and expressly foretold, and in the very same chapter of the same prophet (34), namely that of his humiliation and sufferings, of his being rejected, reproached, blasphemed, and persecuted, even to death; they must have concluded, that nothing less than their sins could be the cause of his coming being so long suspended. On the contrary, they would have seen, that since a person of his glorious, beneficent, and irreproachable character was to be so cruelly treated, so unjustly and so inhumanly butchered by his own people, no time could be fitter for his coming, than when their nation was come up to the height of ingratitude and injustice, of inatuation and inhumanity, as it really was, when those prophecies were fulfilled in him.

(A) This was the fifth time of its being shut since the foundation of Rome, the first time was under Numa; the second at the end of the Punic war; the third under Cæsar Augustus, after the defeat of Marc Antony, and death of Cleopatra, twenty-nine years before the birth of Christ; the fourth four years after, or twenty-five years before Christ, on the reduction of the Cantiberians or Cantabrians in Spain; and the fifth at this time of our Saviour's birth, and under the same emperor (35).

(B) It would doubtless prove an inquiry worth making, could we come at any tolerable certainty concerning these wise men, who they were? what part of the world they came from? what time of the year they arrived at Jerusalem? how many they were? and many more such questions, which have been started to little purpose, and to which no satisfactory light can be given. However, to spare our curious readers the trouble of consulting the various accounts that have been given of them, we shall here subjoin the most that can be found concerning them.

1st, It is generally agreed, that they were of the sect of the Mages, of whom we have given an account in a former volume †, persons wholly addicted to the study of philology, astronomy, and divination; and are supposed by some to have been the disciples or descendants of Balaam, whom we have mentioned a little higher, on account of his notable prophecy of the Messiah. This will not appear improbable, if we consider that both they and their supposed master are said to have come from the east (36). Now the latter is said to have been sent for from the city of Pethor (37), which is there affirmed to have been situate on the banks of the river of the land of the children of his people, or, as the targum of Onkelos renders the place, on the river Euphrates, and elsewhere is said by Moses to have been a city of Mesopotamia (38). So that this country of Arabia Deserta seems most probably to be the place they came from; for they generally bear the name of eastern in the sacred writings. Another ancient author, whom we shall have occasion to mention under the next note, tells us, that they were Chaldeans by birth, and by profession great astronomers; and that it was by the help of this art that they understood what this new-risen star prefignified, which made them take their journey into Judea, where the new Jewish king was born. Now Chaldaea, properly so called, being situate along the river Euphrates, was still nearer Judea than the other two above-mentioned.

This will also give us some light into another question concerning them, viz. How long they were a coming a that metropolis, under the guidance of a miraculous star (C), which ceased not to go before them, till it had brought them to the place and person they were in search of.

^a coming from their country to Jerusalem? for if they came from the latter, they might easily reach it on their camels or dromedaries, the usual, but expeditious carriage of those parts in and about a fourteenth night; and if from the former, through the latter, one week or ten days more might suffice. For upon the supposition above-mentioned, of their coming from Mesopotamia, and the banks of the Euphrates, the greatest distance from that river to Jerusalem will not much exceed six hundred miles. What further seems to confirm this conjecture is, the prophecy of the kings of Sheba and Saba, or Arabia, bringing their gifts to the king Messiah. For of him is this psalm (19) allowed by Jews and Christians to have been writ.

Some ancient authors indeed, who have fetched them from the remotest parts of Persia, have allowed them a two years travel, and found their supposition on the inquiry which Herod made of the exact time of the star's appearing to them, and his destroying all the male infants from two years and under (30); but what quite overturns this conjecture, and proves that they must have been at Bethlehem within less than forty days after his birth, is, that this was the place where they found him; whereas after his parents had presented him to the Lord at Jerusalem, which was to be done at the end of forty days, they are said to have gone and dwelt at Nazareth, their usual habitation (31).

Besides, if they had been two years a coming, the star must be also supposed to have appeared to them so long before, and to have directed them all that time, which is absurd, as we shall further shew under the next note. Herod therefore, by slaying all the males under two years, might only do it for his greater security, and from some doubt, either that the Magi might not have observed the first appearance of the star, or that they had purposely concealed it from him, out of a forecast they had of his bloody design against the child. We have seen already through his history, that he was never sparing of the lives of his subjects, whenever his jealousy or resentment rendered them obnoxious to him.

Neither sacred nor ancient ecclesiastical writers tell us, how many in number, or of what quality they were; but this has not hindered those more recent, fixing these and many more minute circumstances, even as far as the names, age, complexion, dress, retinue, and such-like. As for the number, the most received opinion is, that they were but three, and this notion seems founded on the three kinds of presents they brought with them, as if each of them had presented a different one. But this is said without foundation. An old apocryphal book has multiplied them to twelve; and adds, that they were chosen from their whole nation, and went every night on the high mountains to watch the appearance of the star (32).

Those that give them the title of kings, found their opinion partly on the text above-quoted out of the psalmist, and partly on a notion, which Tertullian had taken (33), on what ground is hard to guess, that all those eastern nations were governed by kings chosen out of the sect of the Mages. To the royal crown the Armenians (34) have added to them that of martyrdom, which they pretend they suffered in that country. The great constable of Armenia, in his letter to the king of France, (St. Lewis) adds, that they came thither from the province of Tangut (35). All this is said on the authority of a tradition they have among them, and not from any authentic records; so that we may oppose to it that of the city of Cologne, which pretends that they died there in their way home, and shews not only their tomb, but their three heads in the cathedral of that city. Their epitaph, which is in Latin verse, gives them the names of Gaspas, Melchior, and Balthazar.

We shall add one tradition more concerning them, which is, it seems, as stiffly believed in some parts of the Indies, as the two last are in Armenia and Germany. We have it on the credit of Jerom Ofsirius, bishop of Algarba in Portugal, who assures us he had it from persons of undoubted credit, well versed in the ancient monuments of those countries, and is to this effect:

Chiperimal, king of Cranganor, in the kingdom of Calecut, having undertaken some long voyage by way of expiation for an incest he had committed, came into Carmania, where he met with two Mages going into Judea to pay their homage to a miraculous child newly born of a virgin. The king begged leave to accompany them, and on his return caused a stately church to be built in honour of the virgin and her son, and in which he caused her image to be set up, holding the child in her arms. We shall stop here, seeing there is no going further in search of them without danger of being still more bewildered.

However, before we dismiss this note, it will be very proper to take notice, once for all, that from the very earliest times of christianity, there started up a number of heretics, who, the better to colour their impious tenets, trumped up divers false gospels and writings under the names of some of the apostles, or most famous disciples of Christ, and stuffed them with such variety of miraculous circumstances and stories, as obliged the heads of the church to condemn and explode them, as they justly deserved. But though the books vanished, except their names, and some few fragments of them, yet the memory of those additious stories and miracles was not so easily extinguished among the vulgar, who were ignorant of their foul origin; but was propagated by a kind of popular tradition, which was afterwards too indiscriminately received by the writers of the fourth, fifth, &c. centuries, especially where they thought it served to clear a text, or supplied those circumstances of men and things, which had been omitted by the sacred writers.

Thus the various notions about the wise-men, mentioned above, of the miraculous star, we shall speak of in the next note, and many more of the like kind, too gross to deserve a place here, seem to have flowed from the pseudo-gospels of Joseph the carpenter, of Joseph of Arimathæa, of the infancy of Jesus, and some others, falsely attributed to one or other of the apostles; but in time their origin being forgot, they were received as common tradition, and quoted as such by some of the latter fathers. So that it would be unjust to charge those great and good men, with either forgery, or even with a fondness for what we call pious frauds, seeing the persecuted state of the church during so many centuries made their mistake almost unavoidable, which were in better times happily discovered and rectified.

(C) We have likewise a great variety of conjectures concerning this wonderful star, according as men of. However, as they looked upon him as the king of the Jews, they first repaired to the metropolis, where he was most likely to be either born, or heard of. Upon their first inquiry after him, Herod and the whole city was moved, and the grand sanhedrin being consulted about the place of his birth, directed them to Bethlehem, the place mentioned by the prophet above quoted. Whatever hopes the rest of the Jews might conceive from this wonderful phenomenon, and the tidings of the new-born Messiah, Herod, who dreamt of nothing but of an earthly kingdom, began to look upon that wonderful child as a dangerous rival, and resolved from that instant to nip him in the bud. To this end, he caused the magi to be privately brought to him, and having carefully sifted them concerning the time of the star's appearance, and other circumstances, which might serve his bloody design, he dismissed them with these words; Go and search diligently for the child; and when you have found him, bring me word, that I may go likewise and pay my homage to him. They set out accordingly, and were not a little over-joyed, when upon their leaving Jerusalem, they beheld the same star still going before them, till it stood and shot its rays perpendicular upon the house where the child and his parents were. Here they approached the divine babe with suitable reverence, and having laid open their treasures, they offered him the presents of gold, frankincense, and myrrh (D); and being warned not to go back to Jerusalem, they returned men are inclined, either to lessen or to multiply miracles. Of this second sort are those who think it to have been a mere comet, only with some peculiar lustre, or some other index, well understood by the wise-men (36); and others, who make no more of it than a meteor, vastly below the orb of the moon †; though either of these can hardly be admitted without the interposition of a miracle, since the supposition of an extraordinary lustre in the former, and the long and regular motion of the latter, contrary to all that we understand of meteors, seems to have required a supernatural hand. Since therefore a miracle must be admitted, and it is plain God was never less sparing of them, than upon this glorious juncture; others have with greater probability believed it to have been a luminous body created on purpose; others, that it was the very light which had appeared to the shepherds, which having been seen at a distance to the wise-men like a star, came lastly to appear to those in a more resplendent manner (37). Some think it was an angel in that figure (38); others have run still greater lengths, making it to have been the Holy Ghost, appearing in that visible shape, and have attributed such an unusual brightness to it, as even eclipsed the sun; if so, 'tis a wonder no cotemporary authors, either sacred or profane, should have laid something of it.

And this will in a great measure explode the notion of those we mentioned in the last note, who make the wise men to have been two years a coming to Jerusalem, and the star to have gone all that time before them; since its long continuance, and irregular motion, with respect to other heavenly bodies, could not but awaken the attention and wonder of all those countries, in which it must have been seen. But this difficulty has been removed, by pretending that it appeared either to none but to the Magi, or only two or three times, enough for those who were watchful observers of it, but overlooked by all the rest. But this is said without foundation, or even shadow of probability; and the question of the Magi at Jerusalem, seems much rather to imply that it had been seen at least in all the countries between Judea and their own.

We will not take upon us to say which of all these hypotheses is the most probable, since the sacred historian has left us in the dark, and the rest of ancient historians are quite silent about it. We shall only subjoin here what the Platonic philosopher Chalcidius says of it (39): It is not easy indeed to guess at the time in which he lived; but that he was a christian, the very passage itself plainly shews: "Let us now turn our thoughts, says he, to another, and more holy history, and such a one as is more worthy of our admiration. I mean that which ment on the appearance of a star, not of the nature of those which portended either a sickness or mortality, but which manifested the descent of God upon earth, to dwell among men, and to bless them with his choicest favours. Some of the Magi, or wise men of Chaldaea, having observed this star in the night, and being thoroughly versed in astronomy, went immediately in search of this new-born God, and having found him, presented him with gifts suitable to his divine character". The reader will find in the next note, what may have been probably the meaning of this last expression.

(D) The piety of some ancient times, when allegory was in greatest vogue, and mysteries were diligently looked for in every part of holy writ, hath led men into such lengths, as it would be dangerous to follow in these days. Particularly in these presents, which the wise-men offered to the holy Jesus, they have pretended to find out, either his three distinct offices of king, priest, and prophet, or his divinity, royalty, and manhood (40); or, lastly, the divine virtues he was endowed with, and was to communicate to his true followers, viz. purity by the myrrh, which is an excellent ingredient to preserve from corruption, incense; the smoke or perfume of which is said to be the prayers of the faithful (41); and charity or beneficence, the most acceptable perfume that can be offered to the deity, and implied in the gold.

Others, grieving to see their fellow-christians feed their piety with such far-fetched notions, have sought a nearer meaning by running into another extreme, and concluded, that nothing else seems intended by those gifts, than the supplying the present and future indigencies of the child and his parents, who were shortly to be forced to take a long journey into Egypt. So that the gold was to defray their expences, the myrrh to preserve the babe's tender limbs in his travels, and the incense to dispel the common damps, and ill smell, either of his stable, or of those caravanzeras or inns, in which they would be obliged to lodge. But a returned home by another way ^b. As soon as the child was forty days old, the time prescribed for the purification of women after the birth of a son ^c, his parents brought him to Jerusalem to be presented to the Lord in the temple, and to be redeemed, according to the law concerning the first-born ^d, with the price of five shekels, or of a lamb, or a pair of doves, or young pigeons; which last was the price appointed for the meaner sort. And into such low condition was the family of David reduced (by this time) and so poor were the parents of the world's inestimable redeemer, that they were fain to redeem him at the lowest price. Here they were met by a venerable old man, named Simeon (E), a person of consummate piety, and endowed with the spirit of prophesy; to whom it had been revealed, that he should not see death before he had beheld the promised Messiah. Being therefore directed by the Holy Ghost to the temple at the same time, he took the babe in his arms, and having foretold to his mother the sorrows with which her pious soul would in time be pierced, on account of the many blasphemies and persecutions which this divine son was to be exposed to; and being now assured that nothing could add to his happiness but the joys of a future life, sung his own requiem in a short ecstatic hymn, and restored the babe to his parents. His testimony was accompanied with that of a venerable old prophetess, named Anna, who had dedicated the remainder of her life from her widowhood to the service of God, and of his temple; and coming at that instant to the place, began likewise from thenceforth to publish this new-born Saviour to all the faithful Israelites ^e.

c WHAT bloody expedient the jealous Herod pitched upon to frustrate all these predictions by ridding himself of this so dreaded child, and how he was disappointed in it by a peculiar providence, will be seen in the next section; and we shall close this, according to our promise, with a short view of the sects at this time reigning in Judea, that the reader may see how it came to pass, that a Messiah, so plainly and frequently foretold from the beginning, so miraculously conceived and born, proclaimed by angels, attested by prophets, and confirmed by innumerable miracles, the infallible seals of heaven, came yet to be rejected and persecuted even to death, and beyond, by those who were the keepers and expounders of those oracles, which foretold and typified him, and eye-witnesses of all his stupendous works. For though we are writing the history of the Jews, and not of the christians, yet, for as much as the destruction of their temple, city, and common wealth, was owing to their refusing

But there is a middle way between those extremes, which is, that the Magi offered these presents to this new-born monarch, as they looked on him merely as the future king of the Jews, and without any regard to his divinity, of which it doth not sufficiently appear that they were apprised. Only they supposed by the wonderful phenomena that preceded and accompanied his birth, that he was likely to prove such a glorious monarch, as that his reign would eclipse those of all his ancestors; but whether on account of his greater power, conquests, or for what other reason, it is not likely they could know without a particular revelation.

(E) The shortness of the evangelist's account concerning this venerable person, has been abundantly supplied by the pious and fruitful fancies of later writers, who have each contributed their mite towards the raising of his character. He has been by many (42) affirmed to have been a priest, and to have been then performing his function in receiving the child in his arms, according to the custom of redeeming the first-born. There is indeed nothing can make this incredible or improbable, if we except the silence of St. Luke, who, it is not likely, would have over-looked his being a priest, if he had been really such.

Some have affirmed him to have been the same with Simon, surnamed The Just, disciple of the famous Hillel, often mentioned in this history, who was also the master of that Garnatiel, at whose feet St. Paul had been brought up (43), and that whilst he was endeavouring after an exposition of the prophecy, quoted a little higher, A virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, this revelation was made to him, that he should not die before he had seen it fulfilled. So that when he came to see the miraculous mother and child, he broke out into that divine and prophetic ecstasy mentioned by the evangelist, and died soon after. Epiphanius adds (44), that the noble testimony he gave to this new-born Saviour did so exasperate the stubborn Jews, that they denied him common burial.

Another set, which makes him one of the seventy interpreters of the Greek version mentioned in a former section †, tell us, that when he came to translate the prophecy just now mentioned, he found his faith stagger; but that his doubts were happily dispelled by this revelation, that he should see the accomplishment of it before he died (45). So that at that rate he must have lived to a good old age, since at the lowest that version was made above two hundred years before Christ, and those interpreters were scarcely chosen out of the youngest tribe.

to acknowledge the Messiah, after he had fulfilled in his own person all that the prophets had written of him ^f; it will be necessary to examine by what prejudices and infatuation they brought this total and lasting desolation upon their country and nation; and upon a review of the doctrines peculiar to each sect, it will be found, that their invincible attachment, each to their own tenets, were the main causes and hasteners of it. For on the one hand, that erroneous and pernicious opinion, which every one of them obstinately held of a temporal Messiah, and conquering deliverer, was attended with two very fatal consequences, namely the rejecting the Messiah, whom they saw appear in a quite opposite character; and their seeking him in those impostors, who flattered them in their delusion, and ripened them into an open rebellion. Such was Judas Galileus, the head of the Gaulonitish sect or faction, which proved the mother of infinite mischiefs to that infatuated nation, and hastened their total ruin; to say nothing of several other pretenders, to the character either of the Messiah, or of his fore-runner, which drew still vast multitudes after them. On the other hand, the irreconcilable hatred which every sect bore, either to each other, on account of their different tenets, or against christianity, which was still more opposite to their own, did so weaken and distract the whole body, that instead of joining their united counsel and strength against their oppressors, they did as much strengthen them by their mutual feuds and persecutions, as they did exasperate them by their seditious and hostile behaviour, and made their own ruin so much the easier to complete. All which will be better seen by the sequel, especially by a short view of each of those sects. a

Josephus reckons four principal ones among the Jews; 1. The pharisees; 2. sadducees; 3. essenians; and, 4. the Galileans, or the faction of Judas Galileus ^a. The evangelists add that of the herodians to the two former, and mention nothing of the two last, probably because they did not oppose the gospel with that inveteracy which the others did. How powerful and numerous the pharisaic sect was among the meaner, and what sway that of the sadducees did bear among the opulent, and what perpetual wars each waged against the other, has been already frequently hinted, and will now be better understood by a short review of their different tenets. b

Pharisees.

I. The rise of the pharisees is very much unknown; they claim indeed their famous doctor Hillel often mentioned in this chapter, for their father, as he is supposed by some to have lived during the pontificate of Jonathas, about a hundred and fifty years before the birth of Christ, but by others later; and more justly too, since, if he be the Pollio mentioned by Josephus along with the famous Sameas, he must have lived about the time of Herod, long before whom the pharisaic sect was in high repute. 'Tis therefore likely, they claim him rather as an ornament than as the author of their sect. The reader may see what we have already hinted concerning those two great men in a former section [†]. As to the pharisees, it is probable, they did not begin to distinguish themselves, till the opposite sect of the sadducees started up, and made them by degrees run into the other extreme. This seems evident from the etymon of their name, whether we derive it with the generality of critics from the Hebrew פָּרָשׁ, to divide or separate, or with others ^b, from another sense of that word, signifying recompense, or retribution, in opposition to their antagonists, who denied and derided it, at least as to a future life. c

We have formerly had occasion to mention one of their favourite tenets, namely that of an oral tradition conveyed down from Moses, and to which they attributed the same divine authority as to the sacred books [†]. This being strenuously opposed by the sadducees, as well as the Samaritans, and the Caraites (a sect of which we shall give some account at the close of this section) made them equally detested by them. But none more incurred their hatred and resentment than our Saviour, who took all proper occasions of reproving them for the unjustifiable preference which they gave to this pretended tradition to the written word of God, and for condemning those as apostates worthy of death, who paid not the same or even a greater regard to the former than to the latter. d

ANOTHER tenet of theirs in opposition to the sadducees was, that of the being of angels, the immortality of the soul, resurrection, and future rewards. But as to this

- a last, they first excluded all that were notoriously wicked from having any share in it, and sent them immediately after their death into everlasting punishment. Josephus, who was himself a strict as well as learned pharisee, affirms, that those spirits, which they called devils, were no other than the souls of such wicked men, who still retaining their mischievous propensity, were ever seeking to annoy those of the living by obsessions, &c. In the next place, this resurrection, in those that were admitted to it, was no more than a transmigration from one body to another, more or less happy, according to their behaviour in their former state. Thus the disciples asked our Saviour, who had sinned, the blind man before them, or his parents, that he should be punished with blindness ^c; and thus Herod and the multitude supposed Christ to be either John the baptist, Elias, or some other prophet risen from the dead ^d.
- b When therefore that divine master came to preach to them a more glorious resurrection, this proud sect could not but look upon it as a derogation to what they thought their superior authority and judgment, which was therefore the more offensive to them, as coming from so mean, illiterate, and contemptible a person.

A THIRD tenet was, that all things were subject to fate, or, as some express it, to the heavens, except the fear of God. It is not easy to guess what they meant by it: Josephus ^e indeed will have it, that they designed to reconcile by this unaccountable jumble, the fatality or predestination of the Essenes, with the free-will of the sadducees. If so, this is not the only absurdity, or even contradiction, which they held; but our learned bishop Bull seems to have proved, that they attributed all to fate, or to that chain of causes, to which the creator had subjected all things from the beginning ^f; among which the influence of the heavenly bodies was looked upon to be one of the principal. This seems hinted at by St. James in the beginning of his epistle to his new converts, where he explodes that pharisaical leaven by the most beautiful opposition of the immutability of God, the giver of all good, to the mutability of the planets, which, according to that notion, must necessarily vary their aspects from a benign to a malevolent one, and vice versa, even by the natural change of their courses ^g.

HERE was then a new source of dislike to Christ's doctrine, which affirms men to be the authors of their own unbelief, disobedience, obstinacy, and so answerable for that and all the train of evils which it brings after it ^h. It must be owned however, that some critics have given a different sense to Josephus's words, and whilst one makes the Jews from it to fall into the worship of angels, as having the government of those heavenly bodies ⁱ, others have endeavoured to disculpate them even from their known attachment to astrology, by pretending that by the heavens is meant no more than the eternal decrees of God, which are yet supposed very consistent with the notion of a freedom of will ^k. Both sides had an end to serve, and seem to argue according to their different notions, which it is not our business to enter further into, much less to reconcile the pharisees notion, if it was really theirs, of a freedom of will, with the absolute and eternal decree of the supreme being. Sure, it seems, from the address of the proud pharisee with, God I thank thee ^l, that he looked upon him as the original source of all those fancied virtues he there boasts of, whatever channel he might suppose they flowed to him from; and doth not this at least intimate that he looked upon the want of those virtues in the despised publican to be owing to his being deprived, by the same arbitrary divine will or decree, of that superior grace which produced them in him? All which is contrary likewise to the doctrine of Christ, which teaches us, that God distributes to every man a sufficient share of it to profit withal, and increases it according to the improvement they make of it.

BUT their most distinguishing character, and that which rendered them most obnoxious to the just censures of Christ, was their superogatory attachment to the ceremonial law, their frequent washings, fastings and prayings, their public alms-deeds, hunting after proselytes, scrupulous tithings, affected gravity of dress, gesture, and mortified looks; their building the tombs of the prophets, to tell the world that they were more righteous than their ancestors, who murdered them, though themselves were then plotting the death of the best and greatest of all the prophets; their over-scrupulous observance of the sabbath to the exclusion of works of the greatest charity, and many more of the like nature ; whilst they were wholly negligent of the a moral and eternal law of mercy and justice, of charity, humility, and the like indispensable virtues. The best of them contenting themselves with abstaining from the finishing act of any sin, indulged themselves in all the thoughts, desires, and complacencies which came short of it ; whilst others, more hardened in their vices, made no scruple, not only to cover, but to devour poor widows houses, to commit the vilest of oppressions, injustices, and cruelties, and to encourage it in their own disciples, under the specious cloak of religion and sanctity. Well might Christ then compare them to whited sepulchres, beautiful indeed without, but within full of rottenness and corruption ^a.

HENCE that fatal and judicial insatiation, which made them overlook all the mira- b cles which he wrought before their eyes, because he chose to do some of them on the sabbath ; as if healing the sick, giving ears to the deaf, eyes to the blind, life to the dead, &c. was a violation instead of a hallowing of that day, and must denominate him a profane person, a sabbath-breaker, a false prophet and seducer, or any other odious name, rather than what those miraculous works, long before foretold by the prophets, demonstrated him to be, the Messiah and redeemer of mankind.

THE last erroneous notion we shall mention of theirs, which was indeed common to the other sects, but did more exactly tally with the haughty, rapacious, and cruel temper of the pharisee, was their expectation of a glorious conquering Messiah, who was to bring the whole world under the Jewish yoke. Infomuch that there was c scarce a kennel-raker among them, that did not expect to be made president of some opulent province under him. How unlikely then was it, that a meek and humble Jesus, whose doctrine breathed nothing but humility, peace, disinterestedness, sincerity, contempt of the world, and worldly things, and universal love and beneficence, should ever be relished by that proud, covetous, and hypocritical sect ; or even by the rest of the populace, as long as these their demagogues so strenuously opposed it ! But we shall enlarge no further upon them, those who are desirous to know more may consult the authors quoted in the margin ^a.

Sadducees.

II. THE sadducean sect was no less opposite to the doctrine of Christ. We have d already given some account in a former section [†] of their rise, and of their favourite tenet, that there was neither resurrection, reward or punishment, nor even life after this. They added, that God was the only immaterial being, in consequence of which, they admitted neither angels, nor any spiritual substances, but him. Whether this was the original doctrine of Saddoc their founder, as the Talmudists and Josephus affirm, or whether these and some of their other epicurean principles were afterwards gradually introduced by his loose disciples, in order to rid themselves of the dread of a sad hereafter, as some moderns think ; 'tis plain, this tenet was very rise with them in our Saviour's time, which made them take several opportunities of opposing and ridiculing his doctrine of the resurrection ^e.

ANOTHER of their tenets, equally opposite to the pharisees, and to the doctrine of Christ, was, that man was made absolute master of all his actions, and stood in no need of any assistance to chuse or act ^p. For this reason they were always most severe in their sentences, whenever they sat as judges. Josephus adds in another place ^q, that they looked upon the deity as above intermeddling with human affairs, which is in effect denying a providence, and consequently all religion. But this favours too much of the pharisaic scandal, and it can hardly be supposed that men of such principles should not only continue uncensured and uncondemned by the sanhedrin, but be permitted to have access to the temple, to propose their questions and objections, and perform their devotions there as freely as any pharisee ; and, which is still more surprising, f should be suffered to fill the highest dignities in church and state. Besides, such principles seem altogether incompatible with their allowed belief of the Mosaic books, though they had rejected all the rest, as they are by some supposed to have done ^r ; but Scaliger, we think, has sufficiently cleared them of even this last imputation ^s, which has no other foundation than that of our Saviour's chusing to confute them only from the pentateuch.

- a It is true, they rejected all the pretended oral traditions of the pharisees, and stuck close to the text of the sacred books; perhaps they might also give the preference to those of Moses above all the rest. All the other Jews did so, and do to this day; but had they absolutely denied the authority of the latter, it is not likely they could have escaped being severely reprov'd for it, either by our Saviour and his apostles, or even by Josephus, who gives them such a foul character in other points; and yet he owns^a, that they received τα γράμματα, the written books; which expression is too general, and too much in their favour to have flowed from his pen, could he have charged them with rejecting any of them^a. Those who will have them to receive only the pentateuch, add another argument to that above-mentioned, and
- b equally inconclusive, viz. that the other sacred books did too plainly impugn their particular doctrines; but must not they for the same reason have rejected those of Moses? Are there not numberless instances of angels and spirits? and are there not likewise several pregnant proofs in them, if not of a resurrection, at least of the rewards and punishments of a future life^a? The very pharisees themselves laid down as a fundamental principle, that it was not enough to believe the resurrection, unless one believed also that it was contained in the law, so they call the pentateuch.

ADD to all this, that the reading of all the other books in the temple and synagogues having been introduced long before, as we have elsewhere observed[†], it is not likely they would have assisted at it; and yet we do not find that they absented themselves from it, either upon that or any other account. What therefore the learned rabbi last-quoted says of them, seems most probably to have been their case, namely, that they did not reject them, but only expounded them in a different sense from the other Jews.

SOME other pretended erroneous tenets they are charged, by Josephus and the Talmudists, to have held, particularly that of condemning polygamy, as forbid by the Mosaic law; but as they were not opposite to the christian doctrine, nor an obstacle to their receiving it, we shall pass them by. Those we have already mentioned were more than sufficient to frighten them from it. The notion of a future life, universal judgment, eternal rewards and punishments to men, whom a contrary doctrine had

d long soothed into luxury, and an over-grown fondness for all earthly happiness, which they looked upon as the only reward they were to expect for their obedience; must of necessity appear strange and frightful; and as such, could not chuse but meet with the strongest opposition from them; especially if we add what Josephus observes, that they were for the generality, men of the greatest quality and opulence, and consequently too apt to prefer the pleasures and grandeur of this life to those of another. The Jewish historian concludes their character in opposition to those of his own sect, with telling us, that they were a set of men, churlish and morose towards each other, and cruel and savage to all besides^a.

SOME have looked upon this sect to have been quite cut off at the total destruction of

e Jerusalem^a. It is true, indeed, that they were very much weakened and thinned by the Romans on account of their riches and credit; but their doctrines, so pleasing to flesh and blood, were not likely to continue long without fresh advocates. Accordingly, we find them so well revived and numerous in Egypt, even from the middle of the third or beginning of the fourth century, that Ammonius, Origen's master, thought it high time to write against them, or rather against the Jews, for suffering them to propagate their irreligious principles. Some, we are told, are still to be met with in Afric and elsewhere, who still deny a future life, and hold all the other tenets of that sect^a. Perhaps were they less odious to the sober part of mankind, we should find them more numerous than they appear. However, bad as they are, we are told

f by a Jewish chronologer^b of a learned Spanish rabbi, named Alpharag, who in the twelfth century wrote a book in defence of that sect, wherein he affirmed, that the purity of the Jewish religion was only to be found among them; whilst the pharisees clogged it with an infinity of needless and intolerable ceremonies.

III. THE herodians are so little known, that we need not wonder at the vast variety of opinions, which both the ancient fathers, and the moderns, have entertained concerning them, and of which the bare mention would swell us beyond our bounds. ^a Josephus, as we hinted above, makes no mention of them; and if the most general notion be right, that they were a set of men who cried up Herod as the Messiah, we need not be surprised, that this flattering historian should pass by a sect which applied those prophecies to that Jewish monarch, with which himself was complimenting his favourite emperor Titus Vespasian, as we shall see in the sequel. How Philo comes likewise to be silent of them, is past our finding out.

FOR it is plain from the evangelists, that they made a considerable sect or party in our Saviour's time; that they differed from those of the pharisees, sadducees, and essenians; and that they held some particular tenets of a dangerous nature, since Christ thought fit to forewarn his disciples against their leaven. It is true, some have confounded them with the sadducees ^d, because St. Matthew, in a parallel place ^c, mentions them instead of the Herodians. But as they are often mentioned elsewhere, in contradistinction to them ^f, it is likely, that one evangelist only supplies what the other has omitted. Hence it follows likewise, that they were not a kind of Jewish confraternity instituted in honour of Herod, and like unto the Roman sodales, augustales, &c. (which were not instituted in that empire till a long time after Herod's death) as some have imagined ^e, but a real sect, distinct from the rest in their principles and interests.

THERE is likewise a different opinion concerning them, among those who affirm them to have believed Herod to be the Messiah, namely which of the kings of that name they gave that title to. Some ^g thought it was to Herod I. surnamed the great, on account of his superior prowess, riches, magnificence, and of his kingdom's extending even beyond Palestine, which was more than any of his successors could boast of. They add, that he caused all the genealogies and records concerning the family of David to be destroyed, to prevent their being urged in opposition to his own lineage. But all this is easily confuted by the single consideration, that if he had been the person whom they took for the Messiah, his dreadful death, which was looked upon as a judgment from heaven, to say nothing of his wicked and hateful reign, would long before have convinced them of their error. Whereas we find them still very numerous, famed, and zealous for their sect in our Saviour's time, above thirty years after that monarch's death. Those therefore, who think that his son Herod, surnamed Antipas, the same who took the infamous Herodias from his brother Philip, and caused John the Baptist to be beheaded on her account, to have been the Messiah cried up by this sect, seem to judge with more probability. It is true, his dominion was confined within much narrower bounds than his father's; but then it is as plain, notwithstanding all Josephus's panegyrics on him, that his ambition was as unlimited; witness his joining in the conspiracy with Sejanus, and the vast magazines he had filled with arms, and of which we shall speak in its proper place. It is not therefore improbable, that this prince, no less politic than ambitious, who is on that account called a fox by a more impartial judge ⁱ, might take the advantage of the universal expectation which the Jews were then in of the Messiah, to form a party or sect of parasites, who should give it out that he was the glorious person they looked for; and that nation did not want for men at this time, base enough to flatter his ambition with that sacred title.

HOWEVER, other critics have with greater probability reduced that sect into a kind of herodian faction, set up in opposition to the pharisees and zealots; and that the herodians maintained the lawfulness of acknowledging and paying tribute to the kings that were set over them by the Romans, which was absolutely denied by the latter. The former likewise excused several unlawful innovations which had been made by Herod the Great, and his successors, as the effects of necessity rather than choice; whereas the latter cried them down as heathenish, idolatrous, and the effects of a base complaisance for the Roman emperors. Another critic, often quoted in this chapter ^k for his new genealogies of the herodian family, pretends, that they were a sect of platonic philosophers, whom Antipater had brought from Albens; and adds, that they held pretty much the same doctrines with the sadducees, or rather that those in Judea were the same with them. The reader may see that sanguine author

- a sufficiently confuted by Basnage in the place above-quoted. Beza on the contrary infers, that they agreed with the pharisees in denying the lawfulness of the tribute, from the insinuating question they came to put to our Saviour¹. But it is rather plain, that their design, and more especially that of the pharisees, who sent them to him, was of another nature. These had been just before determining at any rate to intangle him in his answers, that they might find some matter to accuse him, because he had been setting forth a parable that touched them to the quick. They therefore sent their own disciples in company with the herodians to intrap him with the question in dispute between them, Is it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar^m? If he answered in the affirmative, they could object against him that he was an impostor, and not what he pretended, the Messiah, who was to free them from all foreign yoke and impost; and upon this they could intent a criminal process against him, which would make them amends for his having given the preference to their antagonists. And if he answered in the negative, they gained a victory over them, and at the same time exposed him to their resentment, or rather to that of the civil power, which, they knew, would not fail to crush both the doctrine and its divine preacher, especially at such a juncture, when there was another new faction started up into a sect, which began to appear somewhat dangerous.

- IV. THIS was that of the Gaulonites, so named from *Judas the Gaulonite*ⁿ, or Gaulonites Galilean, as he is called by St. Luke^o. It began to appear soon after the banishment of Archelaus, when his territories were made a Roman province, and the government given to Cauptonius. For the Jews looking upon this as an open attempt to reduce them into slavery, Judas took the advantage of their discontent to put himself at their head, and to ripen them for an insurrection. Augustus furnished him with a plausible pretence for it, by issuing out his edict to have the whole province of Syria new surveyed and taxed about this time. Judas therefore, who was a man of uncommon ambition, took occasion from it to display all his eloquence to convince the Jews that such a submission was no less than base idolatry, and setting up men upon the level with God, who was the only Lord and Sovereign that could challenge their obedience and subjection. The party which he drew after him became in a little time so considerable, that they put every thing into confusion, and laid the foundation for those great mischiefs which ensued, and which will be seen in the sequel.

- THIS sect, as well as that of the herodians, lasted no longer than till the destruction of Jerusalem; a learned author lately quoted, thinks them to have been the same sect, only called by different names, by Josephus, and the evangelists[†]; but what has been said above concerning that of the herodians, we think, sufficiently shews the contrary. Had their sect been the same, they ought to have been more properly called anti-herodians, since that monarch's authority was equally exclaimed against by their chief, as that of the Romans; and if their doctrine, against which our Saviour forewarns his disciples, had been the same with that of the Gaulonites, would it not have been equally absurd to have called it the leaven of Herod? Josephus tells us, that it differed in no point but this from that of the pharisees; and the evangelists introduce the pharisees and herodians as coming by one consent to inquire of Christ concerning the lawfulness of the tribute, from all which it seems at least very probable, that they were only two different parties, who split themselves into two extremes from the pharisaic sect; whilst these last kept, as it were, in a medium between the base complaisance of the herodians, and the seditious spirit of the Gaulonites, not perhaps so much out of a conscientious principle, much less out of any love, either to Herod, or to the Romans, as from a fear of their power and resentment.

- f V. THE Essenians, though not taken notice of by the writers of the New Testament, did yet make a considerable sect among the Jews, and are very much celebrated by Josephus^p, Philo^q, by Pliny^r, and by some of the fathers and other christian writers, both ancient and modern^s; and if they were the same with the Hassidim or Hardanim, as some have thought, we may add also, by the books of the Maccabees, and other Jewish writers. But this last is a mere conjecture, founded only on a fancied conformity between some of their principles, and austere way of living. The ^a far greatest part of the Essenian sect was chiefly in Egypt; there was but a small number of them in Judaea, probably by reason of the grievous persecutions, and intestine broils, that raged almost perpetually in it. And this may be one reason why the evangelists make no mention of it; to which we may add another, namely, that their eremitic life, which secluded them from places of great resort, and their over-weaning pretence to a superior sanctity, which inspired them with a contempt for the rest of the world, might make them less curious about Christ's person and doctrine. They might think, that if he was really the Messiah, he would not fail to come to seek them; and if he was not, he had already enemies enough to oppose him; and it was beneath them to leave their beloved solitude and contemplative life, merely to declare themselves ^b against him. What wonder then that the sacred writers should overlook a proud, recluse, and remote sect, which neither embraced nor opposed the gospel, and whose affectation to a greater and supererogatory degree of holiness stood condemned by the frequent censures which Christ pronounced against that of the pharisees?

It would be next to impossible to trace out their origin, or even the etymology of their name, with any certainty (A). Pliny, in the place above-quoted, tells us, from what authority is not easy to guess, that they were of several thousand years standing; and, what increased his wonder, that they had subsisted so long without procreation. But he was in part mistaken, because, though one branch of them condemned all intercourse with the women, as apt to extinguish devotion; there was ^c another sort who declared as much against celibacy, as tending to extinguish the race of mankind, as we shall see in the sequel. But to come to more authentic evidence, the first Essenians we read of are in the fourth book of Maccabees, under the name of Hasdanim ^d, and in Josephus ^e, where both agree that they were already settled in Judaea in the time of Jonathan, the brother and successor of Judas Maccabaeus, about a hundred and fifty years before Christ. We have had occasion to mention out of these two authors, one Judas, a prophet of that sect, who foretold the death of Antigonus, brother to Aristobulus, then king of the Jews, and which came to pass accordingly, though to the great surprize of even the prophet himself ^f. And it is not improbable, that this anchoretic sect took its rise a little while before the time of the Macca- ^d bees, when the faithful Jews were forced to live in deserts and caves, to avoid persecution. As for those who suppose them to have been a branch of the Rechabites, who flourished so long before the Babylonish captivity ^g, and of whom we have spoken largely in our first volume ^h; we can only say they guess very much in the dark.

We have already hinted their different opinions concerning marriage and celibacy. Those who allowed the former, were yet very sparing of matrimonial intercourse, and wholly abstained from it on the night before the sabbath, and other festivals, on fast-days, and the like; and at other times, they were no less careful to wash, and use other purifications after it. The other branch, who condemned it, did likewise ^e disallow all servitude, and thought the distinction of master and servant to be against the law of nature, for which reason they never indulged themselves the use of the latter; and when any of them was, either through old age, sickness, or other accident, rendered incapable of helping himself, he received all proper assistance from the younger, who all expressed an uncommon readiness, or even emulation, to perform that duty to him. But the other sort allowed themselves servants for all inferior offices.

(A) Josephus has evaded giving us the etymology of that name, most probably because he knew not well where to fetch it from; and Philo, who derives it from the Greek Οσις, holy, owes it to be ungrammatical; but this has not hindered other critics from aiming at it. Epiphanius (1) has gone the farthest for it of any, when he derives it from Jesse the father of David, or, as it is to be read, according to the Hebrew, 'שׂי, jisai or jishai. Salmasius derives it from the city of Essa, mentioned by Josephus, as the place where Zeno had deposited his treasure (2).

If the reader be curious about such things, he need but read Serrarius (3), where he will find at least a dozen different opinions concerning the derivation of that word, enough, we think, to give him a disgust to etymological conjectures.

a THEY likewise distinguished themselves in their rules, and manner of life, into laborious and contemplative, otherwise called Teraputes, the first sort of them divided their time between prayer and labour, such as the exercise of some handicraft, or the cultivation of some spot of ground, where they sowed and planted such roots, herbs, corn, &c. as served for their food; and the latter between prayer and contemplation, or study. In this last, they confined themselves to that of the sacred books and morality, without troubling themselves with any other branch of philosophy. A late learned author has indeed ranked them among the Pyrrhonian or Sceptic philosophers; and it is true, they were very modest in their affirmations in points of divinity, and condemned the dogmatic assurance of the other sects; but that they ever b deigned to dive into the writings of the academy, or other philosophers, seems improbable, from the singular contempt they shewed of all the other Jewish sects; how much more, of those of the heathens?

For with respect to even the former, they refused to converse with them, for fear of contracting some pollution; and this notion they carried so far, as even to absent themselves from going to the temple, and contented themselves with sending their offerings to it by other hands.

BOTH the contemplative and laborious had their synagogues, their stated hours for prayer, for reading and expounding the sacred books. This latter province was always performed by the elder sort, who were seated at the upper end, according to c their seniority, whilst the younger, who were admitted to read the proper parashas or lessons, were placed at the lower end. Their expositions were generally of the allegorical kind, in which they seemed to have out-vied all their Jewish brethren. But they paid the greatest regard to the five books of Moses, and looked upon that law-giver as the head of all the inspired penmen; insomuch that they condemned to immediate death whosoever spoke disrespectfully either of him or of his writings. Upon this account they studied, read, and expounded him more than all the rest, and seem to have chiefly drawn all their divinity from the pentateuch. The doctrines and expositions of the elders were received with implicit faith, and in their practice they conformed with an intire submission to all the rules of their sect. To give a full d account of them, were to copy out Josephus and Philo, who have writ more copiously about them, and to whom we chule rather to refer our readers, who want a fuller detail. As for us, we shall content ourselves with giving them a short sketch out of those two authors (B), of their faith and practice, as far as they differed from the other Jewish sects.

WITH respect to their faith, they believed the being of angels, the immortality of the soul, a future state of rewards and punishments, like the pharisees, but seem to have had no notion of the resurrection. They looked upon the souls of men as composed of a most subtle æther, which immediately after their separation from the body, or from their cage or prison, as they affected to call it, were adjudged to e a place of endless happiness or misery: that those of the good took their flight over the ocean into some warm and delightful regions prepared for them, whilst those of the wicked were conveyed into some cold and intemperate climates, where they were left to groan under an inexpressible endless weight of misery. Some other Pythagorean notions are likewise attributed to them, neither with certainty, nor of great moment. One thing however is remarkable, that among their offerings, which they made to the temple, they never sent any living creatures to be sacrificed there. But whether they did it with any regard to the Pythagorean doctrine of transmigration, or from any other motive, we will not determine; much less pretend to reconcile this abstinence from bloody sacrifices with their pretended regard to the Mosaic law and writings, f where they are absolutely enjoined.

(B) It will not be amiss to observe to our readers, that their accounts of this sect differ in some particulars, which may be probably owing to the difference there was between those of Judea, and those of Egypt. Josephus, we may reasonably suppose, was better acquainted with the former, and Philo, who was of Alexandria, with the latter; and both may have described them according to the particular informations they had received concerning each.

However, Philo agrees with Josephus, that those of Judea amounted to but about four thousand, but he makes those of Egypt to have been vastly more numerous.

THEY were likewise intirely opposed to the sadducean doctrine of free-will, and attributed all to an eternal fatality, or chain of causes, little short of that of Spinoza; so that they seem to have run into the other extreme, whilst the pharisees appear to have kept a kind of medium between them. The Essenians were averse to all kinds of oaths, and affirmed that a good man's life ought to be such, as that he may be credited in every thing without them (C). The Therapeutic sort placed the excellency of their contemplative life in raising their minds so far above the earth, as to be able to see from thence what was done in heaven (D). When they had attained to this degree, they could dive into the nature of angels, give them proper names, or rightly interpret those already given, and pry so far into futurity, as to acquire the character of prophets. We have had occasion to mention some of them already at the beginning of this article, and in the course of this chapter. All we need to add is, that when they had once gained this name, they failed not to be highly respected, not only by their own fraternity, but by both kings and people. We have seen in a former section even a Herod shew a more than ordinary regard to the whole sect, for the sake of one of them, who had foretold his accession to the Jewish crown; and at a time when they were strenuously opposing his favourite scheme of obliging the whole nation to swear allegiance to him.

IN their practice they outdid all the other sects in austerity. If we may credit Philo, it was a fundamental maxim with them upon their entrance into the Therapeutic life, to renounce the world, and all their worldly properties, which they, it seems, generously divided among their friends and relations, whom they left behind them in it (E). They never eat till after sun-set, and the best of their fare was coarse bread, with some salt and hyssop, or some such stomachic herbs. Some of them, if we may believe Philo, would eat but every third, and others, every sixth day; and all of them very sparingly, even of that poor cheer they were allowed. Their cloathing was made of coarse wool, plain, but white. They condemned all sorts of unctions and perfumes as luxurious and effeminate. Their beds were hard, and their sleep short. In a word, as they looked upon all these austerities as the most effectual means to procure the favour of heaven, and the esteem of the brotherhood, to say nothing of that of the world, they never thought they could carry them to excess. Their heads or superiors were generally chosen according to seniority, unless there started up some of the brotherhood, more conspicuous for learning, piety, prophetic spirit, or any other distinguishing merit. But some there were so very contemplative, that they never stirred out of their cell, nor even looked out at window during the whole week. These spent their time in reading of the sacred books, and writing comments upon them.

ON the sabbath they repaired to their synagogues early in the morning, and continued the whole day there in prayers, singing of psalms, reading, or in expounding the sacred books; at which time they kept themselves in the profoundest silence. The feast of pentecost was observed by them with greater solemnity than other festivals, and in memory, it seems, of the Israelites passing the Red-Sea, and of that solemn eucharistical hymn, which was alternately sung by the choirs of men and women,

(C) And yet they seem to have enjoined something like them on their novices, before they were admitted professed members of their society; from which some conclude, that they did not wholly condemn them, but only such as were tendered or taken without manifest and absolute necessity (4).

(D) We need not remind our readers, that every nation and religion, not to say every age, has produced men of this sublime mould, who have trampled all sublunary things under-foot, to raise themselves up to a more intimate acquaintance with the deity. We read among the heathen, of Plotinus, a Platonic philosopher, who pretended to be ashamed to have a soul so refined as his, confined into a lump of matter, and of a Porphyry, who boasted of a vision, and divine intercourse, even before he was got into his dotage (5).

The Perfes, Mohammedans, and almost all the nations of India, have had their Therapentes, and vision-mongers; and it would be difficult to name one church or sect of christians, that has not abounded with such mystical and super-rigid enthusiasts; but in spite of all their austerities, and pretences to greater degrees of sanctity and mortification, the uncharitable contempt they have expressed for the rest of the world has easily discovered what spirit they were of.

(E) Our authors have forgot to tell us how this set of men lived after their admission into that sect, if they left all their worldly substance behind; since they were not, like the other branch, allowed to follow any trade, or to cultivate any land, but divided their time between prayer and study, or contemplation; and had neither wives nor servants to provide food for them, nor any other visible means, that we can find, to subsist (6).

a with Aaron and Miriam at their head. In imitation of which, both sexes, during this feast, went early to the synagogue in their white habit, newly washed; and after the usual prayers, reading, &c. the men and the women each in their separate choir, set themselves a singing and dancing, moving regularly backwards and forwards to the right and left, to and from each other, till at length their devotion was raised to such a pitch, that they forgot the difference of sexes, and both choirs intermingled, and continued dancing and singing the whole night. On the next morning they faced about towards the sun rising, their usual position at prayers, paid their adoration to the Supreme Being, wished each other a good day, and retired each to their respective cells. To all this we may add, that they had some other more secret rites or b mysteries relating to their sect, which, like the Pythagoreans, they were bound never to divulge, and which it were therefore in vain to inquire after.

THOSE of Judæa did live, according to *Pliny, in a desert in the neighbourhood of Hebron, about twenty miles south of Jerusalem.

THIS city, which we have spoken of in a former volume†, being generally supposed the place of John the Baptist's birth, it is not improbable that he was sent thither to be brought up among them, and lived with them till the time of his manifesting himself to the Jewish nation‡. But as for those who have imagined that Christ and his disciples had also been of that sect, because they pretend to see some conformity between some of his precepts, and way of living, and those of the Essenians, they are not worth confuting, since there runs rather a manifest opposition almost through the whole. However, those who will not be at the trouble to compare them, may see that wild notion fully confuted by the authors quoted in the margin^b, as well as another, no less improbable, though less absurd; that the Egyptian Therapeutes were a society of christian hermites instituted by St. Mark, when he founded the church of Alexandria‡. For Philo, who was at least cotemporary with the evangelist, if not older, speaks of them^d as a fraternity of a much longer standing, and as of Jews and zealous disciples of Moses, and stricter observers of the sabbath, than any other Jewish sect; having amongst them hymns and writings composed in former times by those who had been the principal leaders, and heads of their sect; dispersed not only through Egypt, but among the Greeks and Barbarians, d &c. Nothing of all which could have been said of such a society of christian hermits, supposing St. Mark had really instituted any thing like it. But we find no traces of any such institution till the beginning of the second century, when those ascetics, who had formerly fled from persecution, finding the sweets of their solitude, began to erect themselves into bodies, the earliest of which, that we read of, was, according to the two learned authors above-quoted, in or about the year of Christ 113^e.

OTHERS have believed that the Essenians and Therapeutes did afterwards renounce judaism, and convert to christianity; and it is not improbable, that many of them did so; but that the bulk of the sect embraced christianity, and became, as it were, absorbed into the societies of the christian ascetics, is hard to affirm. If it be asked, e What became of them, and of all their boasted writings and comments, if this was not the case? it may be answered, that those who persevered in their old sect, underwent the same fate with the rest of the Jews, and in a much greater number, as being become more odious to the Romans on account of their extreme constancy under those grievous persecutions which they raised against them. This might probably be also the cause why their books were more universally destroyed than those of the other Jews; though even of these we have nothing left but the Chaldee paraphrase, of which we shall speak in a more proper place. We shall have occasion in the sequel to shew that the Essenians flourished still under the emperor Trajan, though much
f degenerated from their primitive purity of life and doctrine, under their new demagogue Elxai. Under Justinian they were still known by the pompous title of angels or angelics, and inhabitants of heaven; but as their lives were found to fall infinitely short of those beings, whose names they assumed, the people saw through the cheat, and this was in all likelihood their last blast upon their going out, for we hear no more of them from that time.

We have now gone through all the Jewish sects that made any figure in our Saviour's ^a time, and might here put an end to this digression, if it may be called such; but so far as there is still one in being, and very considerable, as we have hinted in a former volume [†], who derive their origin from the famous Ezra, and the great synagogue, and are opposed to the rest in some of their fundamentals, it will not be amiss to speak something of them, before we conclude this section. They are called Caraim, or Karaites (F); that is, Scripturists, or persons wholly addicted to the reading, and thoroughly versed in the sacred writings.

It is not easy to determine when this sect first began. We have hinted above what claim they lay to antiquity and authority. They boast even a catalogue or register of all the learned who have written or taught either for or against their sect from the time of Esdra [‡]. Some of those that are dispersed in Poland, pretend to carry it still higher, and that they were descended from the ten tribes carried away by Salmazer. The Rabbinists seem however to allow them to have been a sect at least as old as the time of Alexander the Great, when they tell us, that Jaddua the then high-priest wrought a miracle before that prince, which the two chiefs of the Caraites could not imitate; but this may be put in the number of their fabulous miracles, of which they are never sparing, whenever any competition between the other sects and their own is in question; witness those which they urge against the Samaritans, of which we have spoken in a former section ^{*}. We shall give in the margin some of the different opinions concerning their origin (G), whilst we stick here to the most probable; which is, ^c that they were the successors of the Scribes so often mentioned by the evangelists (H), ^{fuch}

(F) קראים from the verb kara, to read (7). As they rejected all the other writings but those of the Jewish canon, and the pretended oral tradition so much cried up by the Pharisees; it is perhaps upon this account, that the Rabbinists, their bitterest enemies, have imputed most of the Sadducean errors to them (8), tho' this be the only point in which they agreed with them.

(G) The learned Wolf of Hamburg has given us the origin of the Caraites, written from the memoirs of one of that sect, named Mordecai; in which this last affirms, that Alexander Jannæus having put to death all the learned Jews of his time, Simæon, the son of Seta, and brother of the queen, was privately conveyed into Egypt, where he invented the system of the pretended Jewish oral tradition, and being returned to Jerusalem, began to teach it publicly, pretending that he was intrusted with all those discoveries which God had made to Moses, and were from him conveyed through a series of hands and ages down to his time. This system was embraced by some, and as strenuously opposed by others, who affirmed, that the whole will of God to their law-giver was contained in the sacred writings. From these last came the sect of the Caraites, as that of the Rabbinists or Traditionists did from the former. The same author adds, that Judas the son of Sabbai became eminent among the former, and Hillel famous among the latter (9).

Another author (10) thinks, that those two sects split themselves soon after the death of the prophets, upon a dispute about works of supererogation; one sort maintaining the necessity of them from tradition, and the other denying it on the authority of the sacred writings. These were the Caraites, who thereupon pretended to be descended from the prophets Haggai, Malachy, &c. But whatever was the occasion of their division, they conceived such an irreconcilable hatred against each other, that they think no name or language bad enough. Among other epithets, the Rabbinists call their opponents mamzerim, or bastards, a term of the greatest reproach among the Jews [†]; and the Caraites, in return, give them the title of bridled asses, on account of their broad phylacteries, and other superstitious trinkets, which these place a great deal of religion in, and the others detest. The former interpret the words of Moses (11), Thou shalt bind them (the divine precepts) for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes, &c. literally; and the others only as a precept injoining them to have a constant regard to, and remembrance of them. We have observed in a former volume, that their mutual hatred is such, that no consideration can move them to intermarry ^{*}. A modern Rabbinist adds, that if a Caraites had a mind to turn Traditionist, these would even refuse to admit him (12); and it is a common saying among the latter, that before a Caraites be admitted among them, he should have first turned Jew, and then christian, else they could not believe his conversion sincere.

(H) The scribes, in Hebrew סופרים sopherim, or writers, are mentioned for the first time in the song of Deborah (13), tho' some have put Moses at the head of that tribe. They are often spoken of in the books of Kings, Chronicles and Ezra, as persons in the highest dignities of the Jewish commonwealth. It is not unlikely that David did appoint some such an order, when he regulated the classes of the priests, levites, &c. (14), since there must have been proper secretaries, which is the right meaning of sopherim, in church, in state, in the army, revenues, &c. And as writing was not so universally practised in those days, those who excelled in it had a fair claim for such an office; but these being manifestly different from those mentioned in the gospel, we shall push our inquiry about them no further.

After the return from the captivity, when the canon of the scripture was revised by Ezra, and his inspired

- a such as were those whom Herod the Great consulted about the place where the Messiah was to be born *. These therefore, it is very likely, after the Pharisaic sect came to have clogged the Jewish religion with such a vast number of traditions, as rendered it wholly burdensome, if not intolerable, became so out of conceit with them, that they resolved to throw them all off, and to stick close to the text; for which they had the name of Caraites or Scripturists, either given them out of contempt, or took it by way of distinction from the Traditionists. The difficulty is to find out the time when, and the persons by whom, this breach was at first made; and doubtless the testimony of the Caraites themselves, who go either as far back as Ezra, or, at the latest, as the times of Hyrcan, or Alexander Jannæus, will appear too suspicious. But
- b that of the Talmudists, who allow them, some as ancient as Saddoc, or at least as Herod the Great, may be less liable to suspicion; and where is the difficulty of supposing that whilst the Sadducees distinguished themselves from the rest, as well by their Epicurean doctrines, as by their rejection of the Pharisaic traditions, another more moderate sect might close in with them in this last, without running into those other extremes of the Sadducean leaven, which, they saw, were manifestly destructive of all religion; and so compose a new sect, differing from them in all points but that, and from the Pharisees in that only one (I)? However, they seem to have been more moderate, than to have absolutely rejected all traditions and writings. They, on the contrary, used them as helps, whenever they found them judicious and well-founded, and only
- c denied them that blind and implicit obedience which the Pharisees insisted on; but whether those sects divided themselves so early as the reign of Hyrcan, or Alexander Jannæus, or whether in that famous rupture between Shammai and Hillel, about one hundred years before Christ, or about what time after (K); whether first in Judæa or Egypt,

inspired associates, mentioned in a former section †, it is very probable the multiplying and propagating, as well as the revising the copies of it, which were then very scarce, was committed to these sepherim or scribes, who, by a constant converse with those writings, attained to a still greater knowledge of them, and so came at length to set up for teachers and expounders of them, and to the name of scribes had that likewise added of doctor or teacher of the law. Accordingly we find one of them called by the former name in one evangelist (15), and by the latter in another (16); and both they and the Pharisees are said by our Saviour to sit in Moses's seat (17).

These therefore cannot be said to have made a separate sect, as some ancients have imagined (18), but to have been some of one, some of another; since it is obvious, that every one of them must have had their doctors and expounders, and all justly enough liable to those severe censures which our Saviour pronounced against them for putting each their several glosses on the text, inferring new and detrimental doctrines from it, and imposing them on their disciples, with as much arrogance as if they had been all infallible or inspired. However, since we find these scribes and lawyers or doctors of the law to be often mentioned with the Pharisees (19), it is likely they were more numerous in that sect than in any other; or rather perhaps, if we consider how necessary such men were in church and state, of how long a standing they must consequently have been, they may be looked upon as the root or trunk from which all the others sprang and divided themselves, according as their respective views, interest, education, pride, and such like motives led them.

(I) The Rabbinic writers do accordingly accuse the Caraites for having been more favourable to Jesus Christ than any other sect; and the evangelist seems to confirm it, when he introduces a scribe (20) applauding our Saviour's answer concerning the first and chief command, and agreeing with him, that the love of God, above all things, and of our neighbour as ourselves, was of more worth than all burnt-offerings, &c.

It is true, he seems to be called a Pharisee in a parallel place (21); but Basnage has judiciously observed (22), that the pronoun them did not refer to the Pharisees mentioned in the foregoing verse, who being confuted just before, were then gone to take counsel together, but to the multitude in the verse before that, who gladly heard Christ's nervous answers to those ensnaring sectaries. We may add, that the answer there given by the scribe, was more like that of a sober Caraites, than of a superstitious, hypocritical Pharisee.

That there seems to have been a manifest difference between these last and the scribes and lawyers, the above-quoted author shews from another evangelist, who introduces the last of these hearing patiently the woes which Christ pronounced against the Pharisees; but when he came to join the scribes with them, he complained loudly of it (23). Our Saviour's answer to him confirms it still more, when he added, We also unto you, lawyers, and laid a new charge against them, different from that of the Pharisees.

(K) Morinus places the rise of the Caraites about the year after Christ 740 or 750, about which time, and not before, he supposes the Talmud to have been completed, and to have given occasion to their separation (24). He adds, upon the authority of a good number of Rabbies, that one Ananias, vexed to see his brother preferred before him to the dignity of chief of the captivity, began to declare himself against the compilers and defenders of that work, as giving a divine authority to a book, which was mostly stuffed with fables, and drew a party after him. We shall have a more proper opportunity in the sequel to fix the time in which it was

Egypt (L), is at best but conjecture; and we hope we have given it the best light we are able to get.

We shall now give a short summary of their particular tenets, as they are opposed to those of the other sects.

1. THEY look upon the canonical books of the old testament as the only rule of their faith, and reject the apocryphal as of no authority, together with the pretended oral tradition of the Pharisees, as the wicked inventions of an inroaching and designing set of men; for which reason they have the utmost abhorrence for the Talmud.

2. THEY expound scripture by scripture; and, where that cannot be done, they call in the assistance of reason, and the writings and comments of other doctors, tho' without paying too implicit a regard to the latter.

3. THEY commonly read the scriptures in their synagogues in the original, esteeming it next to impossible to come at their true meaning from any translation of them; for this reason they are careful to instruct their children betimes in that sacred tongue; and if they suffer any version of them, it is only for the use of those of the meaner sort, who are not acquainted with the Hebrew.

4. THEIR prayers are likewise in that tongue, as being the most holy and energetic, and the only one in which the incommunicable name of God can be properly pronounced; for they are not so scrupulous in this respect as the other Jews, who always read it Adonai, but pronounce it Jehovab, as we do. Only in their writings, prayer-books, &c. they chuse to write it only with a vau between two jods. In their prayers, wherein they express a much greater fervency and devotion than the rest, they always turn their faces towards Jerusalem.

5. THEY expect, like the rest of the Jews, the reign of the Messiah to be a temporal and glorious one, and attribute his long delay, partly to the slowness of Saturn's motion, which they make the ruling planet of the sabbath †, and of the Jewish nation, and partly to their sins, which have provoked God to suspend the sending of him at the promised time (M); for this reason they forbid the calculating the time of his coming under the severest anathemas.

6. THEY entertain the highest and justest notions of the Deity, and of his perfeccompleted, and shall only observe here, that the authority of these Rabbies is not only very suspicious in a case of this nature, but is contradicted by others of older date, whom we have mentioned at the head of this article. Besides, what we have said hitherto, makes it more probable that they were of much earlier date, and that the rupture which the publication of the Talmud occasioned, might be only a revival of their old dispute, and the giving a new life to the sect. Sure it is, that some of the fathers, who are of much greater authority, have mentioned them long before (25), if not by the name of Caraites, at least by that of scribes, who rejected all oral traditions, and stuck close to the letter of the sacred books. The reader may see another proof of it in the next note.

(L) Epiphanius tells us (26), that in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, the Jews in Egypt were divided into two parties, the one of which expounded the Mosaic law allegorically, and the other literally; which latter was part of the Caraites character. We might further alledge, the book Hachofri, to which the Rabbies give a very great antiquity, and which introduces the king of Cassus as a great admirer of the Caraitic sect, because they were more zealous for the law, till his Rabbinic teachers acquainted him with the vast variety of opinions that were among them, for want of admitting the oral tradition, which fixed the sense of the sacred writings. We have elsewhere indeed had occasion to shew, that this book is far enough from being so ancient as they make it †; but it shews however, how little reason Morinus had to make them so recent as the eighth century, upon the testimony of some partial Rabbins, against that of a number of others of more ancient date, some of whom own them to have appeared even in the time of the Assimeans, others of the Sadducees, and others of Herod (27), to say nothing of that of the fathers above-quoted.

If it be objected, that Josephus has said nothing of them when he spoke of the other sects which reigned in his time, the argument will equally hold against the Herodians, which yet seem to have been very considerable. That historian might have his reasons for passing them by in silence. Had he spoke well of them, he would have disoblged his own sect, seeing he was a Pharisee; had he spoke ill of them, the Herodians might have exposed him to the resentment of that family, and even of the Romans, in whose behalf we have seen they divided themselves from the Pharisees and Gambonites; and as to the Caraites, they might not be so guilty in his own eyes as they appeared to the opposite sects. Josephus had too much sense to run all the lengths, and swallow all the fabulous stories of the Traditionists, tho', like a thorough-paced statesman, he outwardly joined with the most prevailing side.

(M) The reader may remember, that we have lately had occasion to confute this ridiculous pretence, and the cause from which it sprung (28), which, it seems by this, was not so confined to the carnal Pharisees and Sadducees, but their more sober and mortified sects gave into it.

a tions and attributes. They affirm his providence to be as extensive and unlimited as his knowledge; and at the same time allow, that mankind has a freedom to determine himself; but that God gave unto every man a portion of his universal grace to assist him in his right choice; and that our wills being influenced by our tempers and constitutions, but chiefly by the stars, makes that grace very necessary. They have a four fold distinction of this disposition of the soul, the one of sickness, the other of health, the third of life, the fourth of death. This distinction seems to have been alluded to by our Saviour in several places of the gospel; as where he speaks of the dead burying the dead; that not the whole, but the sick, have need of a physician, and some others of the like nature.

b 7. THEIR morality was not inferior to their divinity. It kept a kind of medium between the austere Essenian and the epicurean Sadducee. Of the two they rather inclined to the former in point of abstemiousness, whether of eating, drinking, or any other lawful pleasures.

8. THEY believe a future life of rewards and punishments, according to mens good or bad actions in this (N); that the souls come from heaven; that the future life was made for them, and that they will subsist there as the angels do.

c 9. WE have already hinted, that they condemned the phylacteries of the Pharisees. They had no less an abhorrence for all kind of pictures, that were used either by heathens, or afterwards by christians, for a religious use, or, as they term it, to be worshipped; and condemned the other sects for being remiss enough in that point, to make a traffick of them for gain.

10. THEY rejected the astronomical calculations as introduced after the captivity for settling the new moons and other festivals of the year; such as we have had occasion to mention more than once in the course of this chapter †. Whereas the Traditionists denied their being an innovation, and pretended, that they had been invented by Moses, and had been as much in vogue before, as since their return from Babylon.

d UPON all these, and some other less material differences, there was such an irreconcilable hatred intailed between those two sects, as came little short of persecution. They not only charge each other with heresy, with perverting the scriptures, and corrupting religion; but pronounce the bitterest anathemas they can meet with in the sacred books against each other, and that publicly and solemnly; so that where either of them, especially the Pharisees, are most numerous or powerful, the others must hear themselves cursed, without daring to resist or complain (O). The late Mr. Ludolph, who had been much conversant among them, told several of his acquaintance both in England and Holland, that he saved the life of a poor Carait at Frankfort, who, if he had not protected him, took him home, and sent him away privately, had been in danger of being either torn into pieces, or of being starved there^h. This mutual hatred and contempt is carefully propagated both by the parents e to the children, and much more by the masters to the disciples, over whom they usurp such an uncontrollable authority, that it is next to blasphemy and rebellion to contradict or disobey them.

Among the Caraites, above all other sects, the disciples have such profound respect for their doctors, that they neither sit down before them till they are bid, nor go from them without their leave; and then they go backwards, keeping still their faces turned towards them. They never speak to or of them, without the title of lord, master, or some such-like term of submission. The doctors, on the other hand, who

(N) Tho' they held this in opposition to the Sadducees, whom they therefore accused of maintaining the annihilation of the soul; yet we do not find that they believed the resurrection with the Pharisees.

(O) This, we are told (29), is practised in Palestina, where the Rabbinists, by far the more numerous and wealthy, assemble themselves on mount Olivet on the feast of tabernacles, and there pronounce all the curses of the law against the Caraites, who are often within the hearing of them; for tho'

we find their sect dispersed through many of the northern regions, such as Poland, Lithuania, Muscovy, &c. besides those that are to be met with in great numbers in Turky, where they enjoy much greater liberty; yet they prefer Judaea to all other countries, and would gladly live there rather than at Constantinople, Cairo, and other great cities, were they permitted to live peaceably, and free from the curses and other ill-offices of their inveterate enemies.

are averse to the Pbarisaic pride, treat them with great gentleness and humanity, and, ^a for the generality, teach their scholars gratis; so that one may say, upon the whole, the Caraites are by far the most religious, rational, and, bating their carnal notion of the Messiah's reign, the best disposed to embrace the gospel of any other sect; and we may reasonably suppose, that among the many thousands of that stubborn nation, whom the apostles converted to christianity, the far greater number of them flocked to it from that quarter; whilst the proud Pbarisees, full of their own superfluous knowledge and righteousness, and intoxicated with an invincible fondness for their own traditions; and the carnal Sadducees, contented with the enjoyments of this life, and regardless, if not averse to the thoughts of a future, spared no pains or artifice, cruelty or injustice, to oppose a doctrine so grating and contrary to theirs. ^b This being therefore the state of the Jews at the coming of the Messiah, we need not wonder at the reception which both he and his doctrine met with from them; especially when, instead of that glorious, warlike conqueror they had been made to expect, they saw him in the humble guise of the poor, illiterate son of an obscure carpenter.

S E C T. VI.

The history of the Jews, from the birth to the death of CHRIST.

Herod's distracted state resumed.

^c THE reader may remember, that we left Herod in the most distracted state that can be well imagined; his conscience stung with the most lively grief for the murder of his beloved and virtuous Mariamne, and of her two worthy sons; his life and crown in imminent danger from the rebellious Antipater, and ungrateful Pheroras; his reign stained with rivers of innocent blood; his latter days imbibed by the treacherous intrigues of a hellish sister; his person and family hated by the whole Jewish nation; and last of all his crown and all his glories on the eve of being obscured by the birth of a miraculous child, who is proclaimed by heaven and earth to be the promised and long expected Messiah and Saviour of the world. To all these plagues we must add some fresh intelligencies which came tumbling in upon that wretched monarch; and which, by assuring him still more, not only of the treasonable designs ^d of the unnatural Antipater, but also of the bitter complaints which his other two sons, then at the Roman court, did vent against them both, rendered him more than ever completely miserable. Had these two princes continued in their duty to him, they would have been a support and comfort, tho' his favourite one had proved the traitor they had represented him; but whom could he trust to, when there was not one of his family left, that did not in some measure declare himself an enemy to him? This was the dreadful view in which he beheld himself and his unnatural offspring; not that those two young princes were really so divested of all filial affection, as they were represented to him by Antipater and his instruments; but it had been his and their constant care and study, by such vile misrepresentations, to render them more and ^e more suspected to the jealous king. Their letters were generally filled with the pretended injurious reflections which those two sons whispered against him; such as his having unjustly murdered those of Mariamne, and their dread of being recalled into Judæa to be made to undergo the same fate. Antipater indeed acted under closer covert, and whilst he seemed, as it were, unwillingly to confirm all these accusations, pretended to excuse them as the effects of rashness and youth, which time and consideration would soon rectify; and indeed so taken up was he either in cultivating these discords, or in procuring himself friends at Rome and Jerusalem by his profuse liberality, that he seems to have been wholly ignorant of the discoveries which the rack had extorted from his agents in Judæa, especially upon the death of Pheroras, of ^f which we gave an account in the last section.

Antipater's cabals against his two brothers.

It is indeed surprising, that none of his friends in Judæa should have sent him some private intelligence of what had passed at that dreadful scene, and warned him to secure himself betimes from his father's resentment; but so intent was he on the means of ridding himself of him, and seizing on his crown, that he even furnished him with fresh proofs against himself, by sending a fresh supply of poison to his mother, by means of a freed man of his, in case the old one should in any ways have miscarried. Batillus, that was the servant's name, was no sooner arrived at Jerusalem,

- a lem, than Herod, who by this time had unravelled the whole plot, caused him to be apprehended, and put to the rack; upon which he confessed the purport of his errand from Rome. Herod, the better to conceal his resentment against his treacherous son, sent him immediately a letter, in which he seemed to complain only of some ill treatment from his mother, and charged him at the same time to make what haste he could to Jerusalem, that his absence might no longer give his enemies a handle to obstruct his interest in the succession. He concluded with a promise, that immediately upon his arrival he would obliterate all past miscarriages, and give him all the marks of paternal affection that he should desire.
- b Antipater, still ignorant of what had passed in Judæa, and thinking his father by this time poisoned, and in his grave, was set out for Judæa, being as eager to reach Jerusalem, as his father to get him thither; but when he was come to Tarentum, he received a dispatch from some of his friends, which acquainted him with the particulars of Pheroras's death. The news gave him a terrible shock, not indeed so much out of love to the deceased, as because he found by it, that he had missed his aim of poisoning the king. He pursued however his journey as far as Celenderis, a city in Sicily, where being taken with a qualm at the thoughts of the affront put upon his mother, who, as we observed in the last section, had been banished the court, and stripped of all her riches, which he looked upon as an ill omen; he stopped some time there, to consult with his friends, whether he had best proceed, or go back.
- c At length some of them having flushed him with the sanguine hopes, that his appearance at court would dispel all his father's suspicions, he got on board again, and in a little while landed at Sebaste. Here he met with a more mortifying omen, than that of his mother's disgrace; and instead of those acclamations and good wishes with which numerous crouds had followed him to the ship, he heard nothing but the bitterest curses from the Jews against himself, as the bloody murderer of Mariamne's two brave sons.

Barilius's confession on the rack.

Antipater comes back to Jerusalem.

- d Whilst Herod was impatiently waiting his arrival, he had not been negligent of what he thought perhaps a more important care, namely, the destroying of his new-born rival at Bethlehem, whom he supposed to be still there. Finding himself therefore disappointed by the wise men, from whom he expected a more particular information concerning him, that he might be sure of not missing his victim, he issued forth an order to have all the male infants massacred, not only in that city, but in all the coasts round about, from two years old and under (F); and, by that horrid slaughter, verified the oracle long before delivered by one of the prophets, which the reader will find in the margin (G). But providence had already taken care to convey

The children at Bethlehem massacred.

(F) An author of the fifth century tells us (36), that Herod had also a son there at nurse, who was massacred among the rest; and that it was upon this occasion that Augustus made that reflection upon him, that it was better he Herod's bag, than his son. But it is more likely, that that emperor hearing about the same time of the death of Antipater, which happened about six weeks after this horrid slaughter, and recollecting that also of his other two sons, might make him break out into that bitter sarcasm against such an unnatural father; besides, it is hardly probable that Herod, old, crazed and distracted as he was, could have any children so young.

It is something surprising, that Josephus, who was in no case sparing of Herod's character, should yet have omitted such a material occurrence. The christians have taxed him, and justly too, with partiality, as having concealed it, to avoid giving such a countenance to the evangelist, and such an ample testimony to the Messiah, as might offend his whole nation, and more particularly the Pharisaic brotherhood, who had been his most inveterate enemies.

On the other hand, there have not been wanting those, who, preferring the authority of the Jewish historian to that of St. Matthew, have made use of the one, among many other topics, to cry down the other. The controversy is so recent in every body's memory, that we need not here repeat it; especially considering, that it is out of our province to enter into a dispute, which, we think, has been so sufficiently decided in favour of the latter.

As to what may be objected, that Josephus has not scrupled in another place to give Jesus Christ a most noble character; we shall only say here, that that passage has been shrewdly suspected of forgery, as this in all likelihood would have been, were it to be found in that historian. However, we shall have a fitter opportunity of speaking of that pretended interpolation in the sequel of this section.

(G) The whole passage runs thus (37), that the evangelist has only quoted the first part, as enough to direct his readers to the rest, as was the custom before the bible was divided into chapters and verses.

Thus says the Lord, a voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they were not. Thus saith the Lord, refrain thy voice from weeping, and shine eyes from tears; for thy labour shall be rewarded, or, as the original has it, there is a reward (laid up) for thy labour, and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. For there is hope, saith the Lord, that, in thy latter end, thy children shall come again to their own border. I have heard Ephraim complain, saying, Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised, &c.

There

vey the child far enough out of the reach of his butchers; and his parents having a been timely forewarned of his bloody design, had withdrawn themselves into Egypt, whence he was not recalled till after the death of the tyrant; when, upon their return, fearing still some further attempt from his successor Archelaus, they were directed by the same heavenly monitor to turn off into Galilee, and to betake themselves to their old habitation at Nazareth. Here was likewise another prophecy fulfilled in the name of Nazarite or Nazaren, which was given him from his long abode in that obscure place (H) ^d.

There was a necessity for taking the whole text thus far, in order to shew how this prophecy or promise of God was verified in the slaughter of these babes; and it is for want of attending to the whole, that some commentators have been forced to have recourse to a primitive or historical meaning, in the carrying away of the ten tribes, and a secondary in this more cruel bereaving of Rachel, or the Jewish state, of her beloved children; whilst others, not satisfied with the solution, have run into downright scepticism. Whereas the whole, thus connected, implies no more than this, that no affliction or suffering, either wrongfully, or for a good cause, shall miss of its sure reward at the latter end.

The words therefore of the evangelist (38) may, and, we think, justly too, be thus paraphrased and expanded: Then, or in that bitter weeping and lamentation of those doleful mothers, was fulfilled, or truly verified, that saying of the prophet Jeremiah; In Ramah, which, in the original, signifies a high place, was heard bitter lamentation, &c. the mournful mothers refusing to be comforted for their lost children, because they were now no more. But what says the Lord? Refrain your cryings and tears; for there is a recompence reserved for all your labours at your latter end; and the children you count for lost, shall surely return again. And when could such a comfortable promise be more truly verified, than when he, who brought life and immortality to light, came to assure us of it by so many irrefragable arguments, as well as by his own infallible word?

The Jews themselves, especially those who believed the resurrection, might easily have understood this to have been the meaning both of the prophet and evangelist, since they tell us (39), that the reason why God did not double the number of Job's children, as he did that of his cattle, &c. when he restored him to his prosperous state, was, because those children, tho' dead, were not lost, as his other possessions were, but lived still with God, and would be raised up at the latter end.

(H) This prophecy has likewise been very much canvassed, and hitherto in vain sought after, tho', by the evangelist's words, it should be in more places than one, since he doth not there quote any one in particular, but the prophets in general. The question therefore is, whether it is laid any-where, that the Messiah should be called Nazarite? The answer is, not in any version, (except perhaps the Chaldee and the Syriac) but in the original Hebrew, where we shall find him called נָזִיר Nazir; not indeed on account of his having received that appellation from any particular city, but by reason of his high character, office and descent. We shall content ourselves with giving two instances of it, which will however suffice as a clue to the rest.

The first is in Exodus (40), where the Lord is said to descend in the cloud, and to proclaim the name or attributes of the Lord, in the following words: The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in mercy and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, &c. Where it is observable, that the first letter in the word נָזִיר Nazir, keeping, is one of those which the Jews call majuscule, or large letters, such as occur only about thirty times in the whole old testament; and are, according to them, never used by the sacred writers, but to imply some great mystery to be contained in the word.

We shall not here dispute, whether the words in the passage above-quoted are those of God there appearing, as our, and most versions understand it, or of Moses calling upon him there, tho' the latter seems to us most probable, from those that go immediately before, Vajicra behem Jahovah, And he called on the name of the Lord. It is sufficient that the name of Nazir is given to the divine person there appearing, which could not be that of God the Father, whom no man hath seen at any time; but of the Son, in that human appearance he often took both before and under the Mosaic dispensation; and for further proof of which, we shall refer our readers to what has been said in a former volume*, and all we shall add is, that none could have a better claim to this title of Nazir chessed, keeping or preserving mercy, than he that came to obtain it for us at no less a price than his own inestimable life.

The other place we shall mention, is in Isaiah (41), where the same Messiah is called a Nazir, or, a branch out of the old stem of Jesse, &c. where the word נֵזֶם or נֵזֶם which we translate stem, signifies the old stump of a tree, after the main body has been cut off; and the Nazir the spontaneous shoot which springs from it; and such was indeed the house of David at the time of Christ's birth, reduced to the lowest degree of poverty and obscurity, tho' at but fourteen generations distance from Zerubbabel; but we must remember that the priests, the Assyrians, and afterwards Herod, had held the kingdom and government of Judea; whose interest therefore it was to suppress that family, lest some of them should in time wrench it out of their hands. Neither was this done without the particular conduct of providence, and in pursuance of those prophecies in which the low and humble state of the world's Redeemer is so lively described; and accordingly we find, that when his parents came to Bethlehem, they were so poor, that his mother could not purchase a room in that city, where she might be decently delivered of him, but was forced to make use of a stable for herself, and of a manger for her child; or, which is indeed more likely from a closer examination of the text, was delivered in the open fields, and laid the divine babe, עַל תַּרְסָן et tarsi, in a crib; for in that sense the septuagint commonly use that word.

If then the Messiah is in Genesis and Isaiah emphatically called Nazir or Nazir, and that name is given him by the Jews, in their doing so, tho' by way of contempt, they did but fulfil those prophecies of him, tho' unwittingly, unwillingly, and in derision; and it is still more to his glory, that it was com-

- a Soon after this massacre at Betlechem, arrived Antipater at Sebaste, and from thence ^{Antipater's arrival.} went directly to Jerusalem, where Herod had so closely concealed his designs concerning him, that he made no hesitation to go and offer himself at the gates of the palace. They were immediately opened to him; but, upon his being entered, they were shut up again to all his retinue. Upon his being introduced to the king, he went to throw himself at his feet, and to embrace his knees; but met with a stern repulse, and was immediately arrested; and when he asked the reason of it, he was upbraided with the death of his brothers, and referred over to Varus, by whom he should be judged on the very next day. Quintilius Varus had succeeded Sextus Saturninus in the government of Syria, and being arrived at that province, was just then come to Jerusalem, to pay a visit to Herod, and was thereupon desired by that monarch, that he would preside as judge at the trial of his rebellious and unnatural son. Antipater was ^{His trial for treason.} accordingly brought the next morning before him, and a numerous assembly, whom Herod had convened for that purpose. Upon his first appearing, he threw himself upon his knees, and begged that they would have pity on him, and not condemn him unheard. Herod, who was also present, only bid him stand up, that he might the better level his resentments at him. He upbraided him with his secret designs of poisoning him, and unravelled the whole conspiracy lately discovered, appealing for the truth of it to his relations and friends, and other evidences, whom he had also posted there to prove all his accusations; the last of which, and that which he vented with greatest vehemence, was the death of his two brave sons, Of whom, said he, addressing himself to Antipater, thou hast been but the too unnatural follower, if they were guilty, and the base murderer, if they were innocent. His excessive grief, followed with a flood of tears, which he could not refrain at the naming of those two unhappy princes, obliged him to stop short, and to beckon to Nicolas Damascen to go on and open the rest of the accusation, and then proceed to the proofs of it.
- c Antipater, who knew but too well his own guilt, and the undoubted evidence which was there ready to prove it against him, prevented Damascen's going on, and began to plead his own cause; the sum of which was the unlikelihood of his ever entertaining any thoughts of such a horrid parricide, especially after the dreadful punishment of his two brothers for the like attempt. He loudly complained against the baseness of his accusers; but Damascen being at length permitted to speak, gave such satisfactory evidence to the court, that there could be no room left to doubt of his being really guilty. Varus however told him for the last time, that if he had any thing to reply to invalidate the proofs alledged against him, he might now freely do it, seeing it was Herod's and his own earnest desire, that he might prove himself innocent. Antipater, for want of better evidence, had recourse to oaths and bitter curses, which he plentifully wished on himself, if he was guilty; but this being the usual refuge of the blackest criminals, the president, to stop his mouth at once, and bring the trial to a fair issue, ordered some of the poison which had been mentioned in the evidence, to be brought, and given to a condemned person before the court; which being ^{His defence.} done accordingly, the man died almost as soon as he had taken it. Varus immediately left the court and Judaea to return to Antioch, without declaring his opinion to any but to Herod, who ordered his son to be shut up in a prison, and sent letters to Augustus to acquaint him with the whole trial, charging at the same time the messenger to give that emperor all the further particulars of it by word of mouth ^{He is cast.}.

completed in him in that sublime sense in which he is called by that name in the law and the prophets. The Jews had two false notions concerning Christ, the one that he was born at Nazareth, and consequently that he was a Galilean; and the second, that out of Galilee there never arose any prophet (42). Since then he set up both for a prophet and for the Messiah, they thought, that the name of Nazarene was sufficient to confute both those claims, and therefore gave it both to him and to his followers; and these gladly embraced it, on account of its true and genuine signification, as he is called in Moses's writings the nozer, or keeper or depository of mercy, and by Isaiah the sprout out of the old withered stock of the house of David.

Some interpreters have imagined, that the evangelist alluded to the Nazarites among the Jews, of whom we have spoken more fully in our first volume *, or to Joseph, who is emphatically called by his father Nazir Achauf (43), separate from his brethren; or, as we have formerly explained that place †, crowned above his brethren, and whom they look upon as a type of the Messiah. But all this is supposed, for want of attending to the different spelling of these two words, viz. the first with a y, and signifies to keep, and the other with a z, and signifies to crown, separate, &c. Now the former can be the only right one here, it being given him on account of his living at Nazareth; which word is written with the zade, and not the xain.

^a PRESENTLY after there was another discovery made by an intercepted letter from Antipbilus, who was then in Egypt, and directed to Antipater; the purport of which was as follows: "I have sent you Achme's letter (I): you know what risque I run by " so doing, since I should lay myself at the mercy of two most potent families, and " my inveterate enemies. It concerns you therefore to look to it, that nothing mis- " carry." The business was to find this letter of Achme, and the messenger pretended to be ignorant of any other except that above-mentioned. At length, upon closer search, another was found sewed in the lining of his waistcoat, which, upon their reading of it, was to this effect: Achme to Antipater: I have written to your father, according to your direction, and have inclosed in the packet the forged letter from Salome to the queen my mistress; and I doubt not but the king, upon his reading of it, b will put her to death as a traitress. This pretended letter of Salome was contrived by Antipater, and dressed up by Achme, who wrote to the king as follows. Achme to king Herod: Out of a desire I have to serve you, by acquainting you with any thing that concerns your safety, I have herewith sent you a letter of Salome to the empress my mistress, in which she desires her leave to marry Syllæus (K). Pray tear it as soon as read, since the discovery of it would cost me my head. Herod, upon reading and comparing the whole, caused his son to be brought before him, bound as he was, and shewed him the letters, and at the same time asked him, what he had to answer for himself? Antipater, at the sight of them, was thunderstruck, and could not utter a word; and upon its being insisted on, that he should name his accomplices, he only mentioned c Antipbilus. Salome, who was touched to the quick at this attempt against her, after having expressed her innocence by many antick gestures and dire imprecations, strenuously insisted to have the traitor executed out of hand. Herod, on the other side, was thinking at first to have sent him to Rome to have been tried before Cæsar; but fearing, upon second thoughts, lest he should either be rescued by the way, or acquitted by his friends there, contented himself with sending a full account to the emperor, together with the intercepted letters; and remanded his son to his prison ^f.

Herod's last illness; and will.

WHILST his ambassadors were hastening to Rome, Herod, worn out with age, sickness, and numberless cares and inquietudes, fell into a violent disease, which, added to all his other misfortunes, made him so morose and cholerick, that he became d a burden to himself, and to every one about him. Finding his end approaching, he set about making his will, by which he appointed his youngest son his heir and successor, the misrepresentations and calumnies of Antipater having rendered his other two sons Archelaus and Philip obnoxious to him. He bequeathed in legacies, a thousand talents to Augustus; five hundred to his empress, and left a considerable fortune to the unworthy Salome. The rest of his estate, lands, revenues and money he ordered to be divided between his children and grandchildren.

A tumult in the city.

BUT if he was capable of receiving any real satisfaction from this disposal of his crown and wealth according to his inclination, it was soon after soured by a seditious tumult, which was raised about this time by Judas the son of Sariphaeus, and Matthias the son e of Margolothus, two Jewish doctors, equally eminent for their learning and piety. These men, at the pleasing news of his being given over, unhappily took it into their heads to stir up a good number of their disciples, at the head of the city youth, to go and pull down all the structures which that monarch had built contrary to their laws. These, with their two masters at their head, having heard a report about the middle of the day, that Herod was expired, went immediately to the temple-gate, over which he had set up a golden eagle of extraordinary bigness, and exquisite workmanship, and began their pious work with pulling it down, and breaking it into pieces with axes and hammers, as the greatest eye-sore of all. The king's commander in chief, expecting it to be the beginning of a sedition, ran immediately to f the place with a body of his troops, and was agreeable surprised to find it only a mob of youths, who immediately dispersed themselves at his arrival. Forty only of

- a them, with their two chiefs, proving intrepid enough to stand their ground, were immediately seized, and brought to the dying king; and upon their being asked what motive had induced them to such an attempt on the temple? boldly answered him, that they had long since resolved upon it; and that it was their only grief, that they had deferred it so long. They added, that they neither feared his anger, nor any punishment he could inflict on them, since what they had done was in obedience to their law, and from a pure zeal for the glory of God.

- THIS affront having raised in some measure his drooping spirits, he ordered them to be sent in chains to Jericho, whither he also caused himself to be conveyed in a litter, by reason of his extreme weakness. Here he assembled the heads of the Jews, b and, in a set speech, reminded them of the great and glorious things he had done for them, and of the sumptuous edifices he had reared to the glory of God, during his whole reign, and for which he expected to have deserved better returns, and to have endeared both his person and memory to the whole nation; but that, to his great grief, he found it quite the reverse, since they had dared, even during his life, and in the face of the sun, to offer such an affront to him; and not to him only, but much more to God, to whom that golden ornament had been dedicated; so that they had even turned their malice into an open sacrilege. The assembly could easily have told him, that his pretended dedication of a figure forbidden by the second commandment, was no other than a piece of idolatrous complaisance to the Romans; but
 c being afraid to rouse his cruelty too far, they contented themselves with disclaiming the fact, and allowing it to deserve an exemplary punishment. Herod, somewhat softened by this answer, contented himself with deposing the high-priest (L), whom he suspected to have been a private encourager of the tumult, and giving that dignity to his brother Joazar; after which he caused Mattathias the ringleader, and the rest of the prisoners, to be burnt alive, and forgave all the rest e.

Herod's speech to the assembly.

The zealots burn alive.

- THIS indignity however gave him reason enough to think what mourning the Jewish nation was like to make for him; and as his disease became more and more loathsome and intolerable (M), and made him still more desperate and inhuman, he bethought himself of such a horrid expedient to prevent their rejoicing at his death,
 d as scarcely ever entered into the heart of any tyrant. He issued out his summons for the heads of all the Jews to repair to Jericho on a set day, under pain of death; and, upon their arrival, ordered them all to be shut up in the Circus: and having sent for his sister Salome, and her husband Alexas, gave them strict charge to have them all butchered as soon as his breath was gone. By this means, added he, I shall not only damp the people's joy, but secure a real mourning at my death. About this time came back his messengers from Rome, with Augustus's approbation of Antipater's sentence, and the news that Achme had been there put to death for her treachery. Herod could not but feel a sensible joy at it, in spite of all his tortures; and finding himself at that time very hungry, he called for an apple and a knife; but his pains increase ing at that instant, and he essaying to put an end to them with the knife, made a grandson of his, who tried to stop his hand, give a great shriek, which alarmed the court, and made every body without believe that he was dead. The report of it soon reached Antipater's prison, who expressed such lively joys and hopes at the news, as hastened his execution; for his gaoler having acquainted the king with it, threw him into such a rage, that he dispatched one of his guards on the very instant to put

Herod's last legacy to the Jews.

(L) This was that Mattathias, of whom we have had occasion to speak heretofore, who having contracted some pollution in a dream on the eve of the expiation day, was forced to substitute another to perform the ceremonies of that solemnity. Josephus adds, that the moon suffered an eclipse on the night following that pontiff's deposition (46).

(M) This disease, which Josephus (47) doth not scruple to call a judicial one, was so complicated, and attended with such nauseous and frightful symptoms, that we believe our readers will gladly spare us the repetition of them here. However, the king, still flattering himself with the hopes of a cure, sent for physicians from all parts, who having tried their art in vain, advised him at length to the hot waters of Callirhoe, on the other side Jordan, which empty themselves in the lake Asphaltites. Upon his coming thither, he was ordered to be set in a vessel of oil up to the neck, which, instead of relieving him, threw him into a fainting fit, out of which he was with difficulty brought by the outcries of his attendants. It was then that he first began to think his disease incurable; upon which he ordered a donative of fifty drachms per head to all his soldiers, and proportionably to his officers, and ordered himself to be conveyed to Jericho, where he soon after issued out that bloody edict we are going to mention in the text.

him to death ^a. He outlived his son but five days, during which he altered his will afresh, left his kingdom to Archelaus, made Antipas tetrarch of Galilee and Perea; and left to Philip the regions of Trachonitis, Gaulon, Batanea and Panias, which he erected likewise into a tetrarchy. To Salome, besides fifty thousand pieces in money, he gave the cities of Jamnia, Azotus and Pbasaclis, with some considerable legacies to his other relations. He died in the seventieth year of his age, and the thirty-seventh after his advancement to the Jewish crown, and the thirty-fourth after the expulsion and death of Antigonus ⁱ (N), and to the no small joy of all the Jews.

For Salome and Alexas, bad as they were, and in spite of all the oaths and protestations their tyrannic brother had extorted from them at his death, were so far from executing his last inhuman orders, that they even strove to smother the shameful secret ^b from the nation. To this end they went immediately after his being expired to the hippodrome, where the heads of the Jews were detained, caused the gates to be flung open, and declared to them, that it was the king's order they should all depart to their respective homes, he having no further occasion for their presence; which they accordingly did; soon after which, and not till then, they published the news of Herod's death (O). They then summoned the chief officers and soldiery to the amphitheatre at Jericbo, and read to them a letter from the deceased king, in which he thanked them for their past services and fidelity to him, and desired them to shew it now to his son Archelaus, whom he had appointed his successor. His last will was read to them at the same time by Ptolemy the then keeper of the royal seal, in which ^c there was this remarkable clause, That it was to be of no force till ratified by Cæsar. The audience however, taking it for granted that that emperor would not fail to confirm it, sent out an universal shout, Long live king Archelaus; and both officers and soldiers promised him the same allegiance and attachment which they had shewn to his father.

THE new king, to shew his gratitude to him, began with preparing him a funeral answerable to his greatness and dignity. His body was laid on a sumptuous golden litter, enriched with variety of precious stones, wearing the royal crown on his head, and holding the sceptre in his hand. His sons and grandsons, of whom we have spoken in a former section, his sister and her husband, accompanied with the rest of ^c his relations, marched by his side, and were followed by all his officers both civil and military, according to their rank. Among the latter his guards led the van; then came the Thracians, next the Germans, and, last of all, the Gauls or Galatians; all of them armed, and in order of battle. The procession was closed with five hundred of king's domestics with aromatic perfumes, and proceeded to his castle of Herodion, mentioned in the last section, which was about eight stades, or one thousand paces distant

(N) Archbishop Usher dates his death on the 25th of November, the seventh month, called Chaslev (48). Another learned chronologer observes, that it gave the Jewish nation a joyful occasion for a festival, as he died hated of all wise men (49).

Our learned prelate has therein followed the Jewish book last-quoted, which places his death on the seventh day of that month, according to the Hebrew computation; but a late critic has since pretended, that the old Megillah had been long since lost, and this new one foisted into the world instead of it, and is therefore of no authority (50). We shall content ourselves with referring our readers to another learned man (1), who has fully confuted this assumption, it being quite out of our province to enter further into that dispute.

The Jewish historian sums up Herod's character in these remarkable words (2); He was a man inexorably cruel, and a slave to his passions. His will was his law; and yet no man, in the general, more fortunate than he. He mounted the throne from the condition of a private man, fell into many difficulties, but surmounted them all, and lived at last to a great age. As to his domestic broils with his children and family, how unhappy soever he may have been in my opinion, yet was he fortunate in his own; for he got still the better of his enemies.

(O) Whether this unexpected release of the Jewish heads was really owing to the less brutish temper of Salome and her husband, or whether it might not, as they gave it out, have been ordered by the relenting tyrant at his last agonies, and suppressed by the Jewish historian out of hatred to that monarch; sure it is, that the very design, much more the prosecuting it so far, must argue him to have been a monster of cruelty, and capable of the most horrid butcheries, to satiate either his ambition or resentment.

This will sufficiently take off the objection against the probability of his murdering so many infants in and about Bethlehem, drawn from the horridness of the act; and we have had occasion already to shew, that Josephus's silence of it can much less invalidate the authority of the evangelist, who affirms it as a fact well known to the Jewish nation.

a from Jericho (P), and where they deposited his remains, according to his will¹. They returned from thence to Jerusalem, where Archelaus having finished the seven days mourning for his father, according to the Jewish custom, gave the people a magnificent feast. He went next to the temple clothed in white, and in the midst of their loud acclamations; and being there seated on his golden throne, gave the people thanks for the zeal they expressed for him; but added, that he would not assume the title of king, till it had been confirmed to him by Augustus, tho' that, as well as the royal diadem, had been offered to him at Jericho by the suffrages of the whole army. He concluded with assuring them, that as soon as he was confirmed by the emperor, his chief care and study should be to deserve that love they so unanimously testified for him, and to make his reign more easy and happy, than that of his father had proved to the Jewish nation. This speech was followed with fresh volleys of huzzas; after which they began to try the sincerity of it, by a number of petitions suitable to their different exigencies. Some begged for an alleviation of their tribute, others for the total abolition of the customs, others again for the release of prisoners; all which were readily granted at this lucky juncture, Archelaus not thinking it advisable to exasperate them by a denial. The whole ceremony was concluded with suitable sacrifices, and a sumptuous entertainment, which he gave there to his friends.

speech to the Jews.*

THE Jews however soon resumed their rebellious course in spite of all these grants. That afternoon was scarcely over, before a number of malecontents, who had been for some time holding secret cabals for raising new mutinies, broke loose in a body, and, for want of a more plausible pretence, came beating their breasts, bewailing the deaths of Mattathias, and others of his accomplices, who had been burnt for pulling down the golden eagle; and demanded justice against those friends of the deceased king, who had had a hand in their deaths; particularly they desired, that the high-priesthood might be taken from Joazar, to whom it had been given upon that occasion. This unexpected indignity failed not to exasperate the new king; but as he was upon the point of departing for Rome, and was unwilling either to have his journey stopped by this tumult, or to go away before it was quelled; he sent his master of the horse to appease them by fair words, and to remind them, that the king would do nothing till he was confirmed by the emperor; but, before he could utter a word to them, they fell a pelting him with volleys of stones, so that he was forced to withdraw. He sent some fresh officers on the same errand, and they met with the same reception; insomuch that they wanted but number to have raised themselves into open rebellion. By this time the feast of the passover was come, which brought a great concourse of people from all parts to Jerusalem; during which solemnity the malecontents never stirred from the temple, but chose to beg for subsistence of the comers, rather than leave the place, or intermit their godly work, till they were drove from it by main force¹.

Archelaus, who justly feared, lest these mutineers should spread the infection among the multitudes that repaired to the feast, sent an officer at the head of some troops, with express orders either to disperse them, or to seize on such as stood their ground. They were scarcely come in sight of the revolvers, before they found themselves briskly attacked by them, and by a greater number of strangers, whom their outcries had inspired with the same rebellious spirit: a bloody encounter followed, in which most of the soldiers were killed upon the spot, and the officer terribly wounded, and narrowly escaped with his life. This fresh indignity obliged at length Archelaus to send his whole army against them, with orders to his cavalry to kill all that came out of the temple, and to hinder the strangers from assisting them. After another obstinate fight, in which three thousand of the rebels were killed, the rest were soon put to flight, and betook themselves to the mountains; upon which the king published an order for all strangers to depart to their own homes, by which an end was put to the paschal solemnity for that year, the rebellion suspended for some time, and Archelaus was left at liberty to prepare for his journey to Rome^m. He set out soon after accordingly, leaving the government of the kingdom to his brother Philip, and took with him his mother Mattæe, by nation a Samaritan; Nicolas Damascen, an old friend and counsellor of his late father, and a great number of other friends. He was likewise accompanied by his aunt Salome, with her children, and some other near relations, who pretended to assist him with their interest at the Augustan court, when their real design was to obstruct his confirmation, and to accuse him to the emperor of the massacre of his subjects lately committed in the temple.

gar era 3.

WHEN Archelaus was come to Cæsarea, he was met there by Sabinus, Augustus's intendant of Syria, who was hastening into Judæa, to take care of the rich legacies which Herod had bequeathed to that emperor. He had however been dissuaded by Varus, in his way thither, from undertaking any thing further, till the emperor's will was known, and Archelaus confirmed in his kingdom; so that he had been prevailed upon by that Syrian governor to stay in that city till he received further orders from Rome. He stayed however no longer there than till Varus was returned to Antioch his capital; after which he went immediately to Jerusalem, lodged himself at the royal palace, and summoned the king's treasurers to give him an account, and to put him in possession of those treasures; but as these had orders from Archelaus not to part with them till his return, they refused to deliver them to Sabinus, alledging they would preserve them for Augustus, till they received further directions from him. By this time Archelaus and his retinue were arrived at Rome; and among those whom the subtle Salome had brought with her to oppose his election, was Antipas, another of Herod's sons, whom that monarch had appointed his successor by his first will, and whom she designed to set up against his brother, under pretence, that that was of greater validity than his second. Antipas had been persuaded to take this step, not only by Salome, but much more by one Ireneus, an eloquent orator, and one that was perfectly versed in all the affairs of state, had been admitted into the inmost secrets of Herod's court; and being come with him to Rome, was most likely to represent that young prince's claim to the best advantage. With that orator was also another great statesman, named Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolas Damascen, and one of the late king's counsellors. Antipas had likewise brought his mother Cleopatra, born at Jerusalem, with some other relations and friends; and these were scarcely come to Rome with him, before they found means to draw the greatest part of Archelaus's relations and partisans over to their sideⁿ (Q).

Antipas opposes
him.

THERE was still another thing which very much weakened the interest of Archelaus, namely, his officers at Jerusalem refusing to deliver up Herod's legacies to Sabinus; of which both he and Varus had taken care to inform the Roman court. Archelaus was therefore forced, in his own vindication, to present a memorial to the emperor, in which he exhibited his title to the crown, the particulars of Herod's last will, together with an inventory of the treasure which that monarch had left behind him, to which he likewise added his royal signet with which that will was sealed. This memorial was soon followed by another from Antipas, in which were displayed such allegations as were most likely to invalidate Herod's last will, and his brother's title. Augustus having perused the writings on both sides, summoned a council of his friends, to examine their respective claims, and made Caius the son of Agrippa, by his adopted daughter Julia, president of it. Antipater, the son of Salome, an eloquent speaker, and sworn enemy to Archelaus, opened with a speech full of the bitterest invectives against him; such as his having assumed the royal title and authority, without staying for the emperor's consent; his having caused three thousand Jews to be massacred in the temple by his own troops at the late passover festival; his having turned out several eminent officers, and put others in their room; his having presumed

(Q) It seems by Josephus's account, as if Archelaus's party had taken some disgust at him, either from his severe manner of quelling the last tumult in Judæa, or on some other pretence, whilst Antipas and his friends took care to inspire them with hopes of a milder government under him. But there was still a third party, who liking neither of the brothers, nor indeed any of Herod's family, did what they could to make them both miscarry in their pretensions, in hopes of living solely and more quietly under the dominion of the Romans.

- a to sit on the royal throne, heard and adjudged causes, and granted considerable immunities, released all the prisoners whom his father had caused to be shut up in the Circus; all this by his own assumed authority, and in the quality of a Jewish monarch. He likewise accused him of unnatural contempt to the memory of his deceased father, from whom he had received such signal tokens of paternal love, and of his having spent the night which followed that monarch's death, in such feasting and jollity, as was like to have raised a sedition among the people, who could not behold such a flagrant instance of ingratitude, without the utmost detestation. He concluded with telling the court, that Herod, who best knew the opposite tempers of the two brothers, had not so much as dreamt of appointing him his successor, whilst he enjoyed his health and senses; but had expressly named Antipas to that dignity; but supposing that he had conceived a better opinion of Archelaus during his last sickness, he has shewn you now what a king he is like to prove; what use he is like to make of his power, since even whilst in the condition of a private man, he could send his troops into the very temple, to cut the throats of his subjects.

- Damascen* spoke next, and answered the greatest part of Antipater's accusations, by shewing, first, that, with respect to the pretended massacre in the temple, nothing less than such a severity could quell the sedition then kindled; that those men were only a band of rebellious fellows, and the first aggressors, not only in raising the tumult, but in murdering those officers whom the king had sent to appease them by the mildest means; and that he had acted nothing in this, or in any other instance, but by the advice of those who were now turned his accusers: that as to the alteration which Herod made in his will about the succession, he being in his perfect senses at that time, had doubtless very good reasons for what he did, and might probably have observed something in Antipas's behaviour or character, which obliged him to prefer his brother to him; and as a further proof that he had altered it upon cooler thoughts, he urged his submitting the validity of it to the emperor, without whose approbation it was to be of no force. As soon as he had made an end of speaking, Archelaus went and threw himself at Augustus's feet in such humble guise, as moved his compassion towards him. Cæsar raised him up, pronounced him worthy of the Jewish crown, and promised to do nothing contrary to his father's will; after which he dismissed the assembly without any further decision, being desirous to take some time to consider whether he should bestow the kingdom solely upon him, or divide it among Herod's children, seeing they all applied themselves alike to him for redress.

- WHILE these things were transacting at Rome, the restless Jews had raised a new insurrection in Jerusalem, which was however suppressed by Varus's speedy arrival from Antioch, and the punishment of the ringleaders; but, upon his return to Antioch, having left Sabinus with a Roman legion to keep that metropolis in awe, this general seeing himself superior to the Jews, made a bold push upon the fortresses of the city, and the treasures of the Herodian family, with a design to convert them to his own use. He chose however a wrong time for such an attempt; and the Jews, who came flocking thither to the approaching feast of pentecost, not perhaps so much out of devotion, as to oppose his designs, did quickly divide themselves into three bodies, one of which besieged him and his troops in the royal palace, whilst the other two went and possessed themselves, the one of the Hippodrome, and the other of the temple on the east and north sides of it; so that he was inclosed on every side, and in danger of being overpowered by the Jews. These were the more exasperated against him, because he had forced his way into the treasury of the temple, and brought away four hundred talents out of it, besides other rich plunder which his soldiers had carried off, in spite of all their opposition. This desperate attempt had happened as follows:
- f the Roman general seeing himself hemmed in on all sides, and on the brink of being assaulted by the resolute Jews, sent an express to desire Varus to come immediately to his assistance; whilst himself getting up on the top of one of the towers of the castle, named Phasaël, from thence beckoned to his troops to make a sally on the enemy. They did so, and had an obstinate skirmish with them, in which they killed a number of Jews. The rest, not at all discouraged at this loss, got up on the outer galleries of the temple, from which they galled the Romans with stones and arrows, whilst those of the enemy from below had quite lost their strength before they could reach them. Tired at length, and ashamed to see the advantage the Jews had over them, they brought vast quantities of wood and other combustible matter to the foot of the wall, and setting it on fire, plied it so briskly with fresh fuel, that the flame reached at length to the cornices of the gallery; which being of timber, and covered with paint and wax, on which the gilding was laid, were easily set on a blaze. A great number of the Jews on the battlements perished in the flames, whilst the rest casting themselves down headlong, either died by the fall, or by the enemies sword; so that not one of all those brave men was left alive, the Romans giving no quarter to any of them. As soon therefore as the flames were so far abated, that these could wade through them, they broke into the sacred treasury, from which they carried off the plunder above-mentioned.

THESE two actions therefore could not but highly exasperate the Jewish nation, and make them double their vigour against him. Accordingly, whilst one part was taken up in undermining the palace, another was endeavouring to cause a defection from the Roman general, by promising an amnesty, and free leave to march off unmolested, to as many as should leave the place. They added the like promise to Sabinus, upon the same conditions, and assured the Roman troops, that they had no other design in taking up arms, but to free themselves from the tyrannic yoke of the Herodian family. Sabinus would have gladly embraced the offer; but the injuries he had done the Jews would not permit him to rely on their promise, so that he chose rather to wait for the reinforcement he expected from Varus. During this time new troubles were raised in other parts of Judæa; among others two thousand valiant veterans of the late king, who had been discharged from the service, assembled themselves in a body, and fell upon Archelaus's forces commanded by his nephew Archibabus; but this young general not daring to face them upon equal terms, knowing them to be old experienced soldiers, went and secured himself as well as he could in some fortresses, and other places of difficult access.

WE have heretofore had occasion to mention one Ezechias, a captain of a gang of banditti, whom Herod had with much difficulty caught and put to death, with about forty of his troops. This man left a son named Judas, who seeing now the country labouring under a kind of civil war, took this opportunity to revenge his father's death; and having got together a band of most desperate fellows at Sephoris, a city in Galilee (R), after several incursions into the king's dominions, forced at length into the royal armory, where he equipped his men cap-a-pée, and from thence into the treasury of all the places where he came, and being thus furnished with men, arms and money, injected terror into the whole province, and plundered all he could come at; and so successful was he for some time, that he began to aim at the supreme power, whence he is thought, not without good grounds, to have been the same which is mentioned by St. Luke 9 under the name of Theudas (S).

A second by Simeon.

HE was not the only one that aimed at the crown during these troublesome times. There started up another, named Simeon, a person of comely stature, strongly built, and well esteemed by the Jews, and sufficiently conceited to think himself worthy of it. He had been employed by Herod in affairs of great importance with credit. As soon therefore as he appeared at the head of a party, the people saluted him king of the Jews; and he, to shew his zeal against the two rival sons of his late master, led his men directly to Jericho, where they set the royal palace, a rich and stately building, in flames. He proceeded to do the like to several others, giving his men the whole

(R) This city, tho' not to be met with in Joshua or any of the sacred writers, at least by any thing like that name, is frequently mentioned by Josephus; and we have had occasion to speak of it in a former section, as one of the five places in which Gabinus settled his independent tribunals. It was in the tribe of Zebulun, not far from the mountain and plains of Thabor, and was one of the first cities in Galilee on the road from Ptolemais. It became afterwards the metropolis of that province in Nero's time, when that emperor gave it to young Agrippa.

It has been since known by the name of Diocæsarea. It is placed at about twelve miles (more or less, for authors are not agreed about it) from Tiberias, and near the famed mount Asmon, or Asamon, which was looked upon as the center or navel of Galilee (7).

(S) This seems more than probable, not only from what each historian says of him, the one, that he aimed at the crown; and the other, that he gave himself out to be some eminent person, or great deliverer; such as the Jews were in more than ordinary expectation of at this time; but likewise from the affinity of their name תודא Theudah in the Syriac, answering to the Hebrew יהודה Jehudah, and to the Greek Ιούδας (8).

- a plunder of them. What further mischiefs such a leader, at the head of such resolute fellows, might have done, if their career had not been timely stopped, is easy to guess; but, happily for that country, Gratus, Archelaus's general, or, according to *Tacitus, Varus, the Syrian governor, fell suddenly upon them, and, whilst they fought with more courage than skill, gave them a total overthrow. Simeon was caught in his flight in some narrow defile, and being brought to the general, had his head immediately struck off. Whilst these were plundering and burning the royal palaces in one part of the country, another gang was doing the same in another; particularly that of Amatha on the Jordan, built probably by Herod for the benefit of the hot waters, which that city was famed for†, and took its name from (T).
- b BUT the most desperate and dangerous of all those seditious gangs, for they raged in every place like an epidemic disease, was that of one Athronges, heretofore an obscure shepherd, of no merit or worth but what he challenged from his gigantic stature, and brutish stoutness. This fellow set up likewise for the royal authority. He had four brothers of the same monstrous size, whom he made his lieutenants over the multitudes that came flocking to him for the honour of fighting under his banner. He took upon him the royal diadem, and tho' he often consulted his council, yet acted according to his arbitrary will. He hated the Romans and Herodians alike; but the former felt oftener the effects of his cruelty. He gave no quarter to either side, when they fell into his hands; but he seemed rather to bend his force against the Romans, because their late plunders and cruelties were fresher in every body's memory. He laid an ambush against one of their convoys of corn near Emmaus, and fell upon them so suddenly, that he left their commanding officer, and forty of his men, dead on the spot, and would in all likelihood have cut them all off, had not Gratus come in good time to their assistance. At length, after many such exploits, the mock monarch fell into the hands of Archelaus, after his return into Judæa. One of his brothers was taken by Gratus, and another by Ptolemy. The last of them surrendered himself upon good conditions; and so the whole gang was dispersed. But all this while the whole country was still in a flame from fresh insurrections, as well as from that of the Jews against Sabinus, whilst the Herodian competitors were waiting at Rome for the emperor's decision.
- By this time Varus being apprised of the danger Sabinus and his legion were in, took the road to Judæa, at the head of his other two, which was all that he had then in Syria, and with four troops of horse, and some foot, which he had got from the neighbouring tetrarchs. He ordered their rendezvous at Ptolemais, where he received some fresh auxiliaries, besides fifteen hundred more, which the king of Arabia sent him to Berytus, more out of hatred to the Herodian family, than love to the Romans. With part of his army Varus marched towards Samaria, whilst the rest, under the command of his son, made an inroad into that part of Galilee which was nearest to Ptolemais. This last having put to flight all that opposed him, went and took Sepphoris, sold all the inhabitants by auction, set fire to that noble city, and reduced it into a heap of rubbish. His father, on the other hand, passed by Samaria, because he heard, that it had had no hand in the Jewish insurrections, and marched straight to Jerusalem. In his way he suffered his Arabian troops to plunder and burn several villages and towns; such as Arus, because it belonged to Ptolemy, a friend of Herod; Sampho and Emmaus; this last in revenge of the slaughter which Athronges had made of the Romans near that place; but the inhabitants of it foreseeing the storm, had timely forsook it. Whilst this was doing without the city, the besiegers, who were just going to storm the palace, having heard of Varus coming with such a force, raised the siege, and marched off in a fright; upon which the besieged came forth, with the grandchildren of Herod, to compliment him on his arrival, and to thank him for his timely help. Sabinus was the only one who did not follow their example; but stole away privately towards the sea. Varus gave a very severe reprimand to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for the late hostilities against the Roman legion; but was soon appeased, when he was apprised, that they neither had a hand in it, nor were able to hinder it, being themselves pent up by those foreign Jews who were come to the feast, and had begun the tumult. However, as he thought it expedient to make a severe example of the ringleaders of it, he sent some of his troops through the whole a kingdom, with orders to make a strict search after them, and bring them prisoners to him. Upon their return they brought a vast number of those wretches, two thousand of whom he caused to be crucified, and released the rest. This severity did not hinder another body of ten thousand from taking up arms against him, which prevented his disbanding his auxiliaries, as he had designed, and obliged him to send them to quell this new revolt. They easily compassed it, because the enemy, instead of standing the brunt, surrendered themselves at discretion. Varnus forgave the common people, and contented himself with sending the chiefs of them bound to Augustus ^a.

ALL this while Archelaus was soliciting the emperor to ratify his father's will, and b to name him king of Judaea. About this time Martace his mother died; soon after which there arrived a deputation from Judaea, consisting of fifty of the heads of that nation, who were sent to oppose his election, and to beg of the emperor, that their country might be made part of the province of Syria, and subject to the governors of it, without kingly government. They were seconded by above eight thousand Jews then settled at Rome; who all professed an aversion to a kingly government, and a desire of living under that of the Romans, provided they might be allowed the free exercise of their religion and laws. Augustus referred the matter to a council of his own friends, whom he convened at the temple of Apollo, which he had lately built, and where both sides were to be heard in their turn. Here the Jewish ambassadors c began with inveighing against Herod, who, they affirmed, had governed their nation not like a monarch, but like a tyrant, violating all their laws both sacred and civil; impoverishing a nation, whom, at his first accession to the crown, he had found rich and opulent; sacrificing an infinite number of his subjects either to his ambition, jealousy or resentment, not sparing even the matrons and virgins of distinction, either in his fury or his lust; notwithstanding all which they would gladly have accepted of his son Archelaus for their prince, had he not given them so many convincing proofs of his tyrannic disposition, an instance of which they urged in the massacre of the three thousand mutineers in the temple, before he had received the imperial confirmation. They concluded with a petition to Augustus, that he would put their nation under the d Syrian governors, and then he would soon be convinced whether the Jews were really such rebellious people as they had been represented to him; and not on the contrary, men of the most steady loyalty to the superior powers. All this was immediately answered by Damascen, who took upon him to vindicate the deceased, as well as the new king, from the charge of tyranny and cruelty. And Augustus having heard both sides thus far, dismissed the assembly, without declaring his resolution, till further consideration.

sion of the Jewish king-

HE was not long however before he decided the controversy in such a manner, as convinced the world of his friendship both to Herod and to his offspring. He bestowed e the half of the kingdom on Archelaus, under the title of Ethnarch, or governor of a nation, and backed it with a promise that he would give him that of king, as soon as he heard that he had rendered himself worthy of it. This part or ethnarchy contained Judaea Propria, Idumæa and Samaria; but he exempted this last of one fourth part of their taxes, in consideration of their peaceable behaviour during the late troubles in Judaea and Galilee. However this partition, as well as change of title from a king to an ethnarch, plainly shews, that he was nothing less than satisfied at his proceedings; and indeed whatever Damascen might urge to colour his too speedy assumption of the regal power, it is plain he had not paid that regard to the emperor which he ought to have done; all which was sufficiently aggravated by the opposite party. And as f he looked upon that young prince as too likely to follow his father's violent measures, nothing could be more prudently thought on to keep him within due bounds, than such a conditional promise. He likewise dismembered from Judaea the cities of Gaza, Gadara and Hippon, because they followed the customs of the Greeks; and joined them to the province of Syria. Josephus reckons the whole yearly revenue of this new ethnarchy to have amounted to six hundred talents. The remainder of Herod's kingdom was divided between his other two sons Philip and Antipas; the former of whom had the regions of Batanea, Trachonitis and Auranitis, to which Cæsar added that part of Galilee which had formerly belonged to Zenodorus, mentioned a little

- a higher, and which alone amounted to about one hundred talents per year. The latter had the greatest part of Galilee, and the countries beyond Jordan, amounting to two hundred talents a year. Salome had for her share, besides half a million of silver, the cities of Jamnia, Azotus and Pbasaelis, to which Augustus added that of Ascalon. The rest of Herod's legacies, particularly the fifteen hundred talents which he had bequeathed to him, he generously distributed between his other relations, his grandsons, and two virgin-daughters, whom he married to Pheroras's sons, reserving for himself only a few of his moveables, not so much for their value, as out of regard to the memory of his deceased friend *.

- THIS new division of the Jewish kingdom was scarce settled, before there started
 b up a new pretender, who quickly drew a numerous party after him. He was a Jew, A pseudo Alexander sets up for the crown. brought up at Sidon, and so like the late Alexander the son of Herod by Mariamne, formerly put to death; that, when he came to give himself out to be the same, and to have been preserved alive, he easily deceived, not only the bulk of the Jews, but even those who had been acquainted with that unfortunate prince. He was assisted in this imposture by a cunning fellow, who had formerly gone through all the intrigues of Herod's court, and who finding the young man capable of carrying it on with great likelihood of success, advised him to set about it immediately. These two accordingly began with giving out, that the two young princes, Alexander and Aristobulus, whom the Jews supposed to have been put to death pursuant to their father's order, c had been preserved by a faithful friend, and two other persons substituted in their stead. These two went first to Crete, thence to Melos, where they raised considerable sums of money from the Jews that were settled in those islands. Having succeeded so well at their first setting out, they resolved to sail for Rome; and being arrived at Puteoli, were met by all the heads of the Jews, especially by those who were in the interest either of the Herodian, or of the Asmonean families, of both which they looked upon him as the immediate heir, and consequently as the only rightful king of the Jews. Upon this supposition, they spared neither pains, cost nor acclamations, to render his entry into Rome as splendid as possible. The litter or chair of state in which he was carried, the vast crowds that accompanied him, and the reception he d met with at every place he came to, were all answerable to the high notion they had conceived of him.

- As soon as they were come to Rome, whither the rest of the Jews flocked in crowds, to pay their homage to this new-risen offspring of the Asmonean race, Augustus, who knew Herod too well to believe that he could be imposed upon in a matter of such importance, sent one of his free-men, named Celadus, formerly a companion of the two brothers, to bring this new Alexander to him. Celadus was as easily imposed upon as the rest; but Cæsar, who examined him with a more curious and unerring eye, soon discovered a manifest deficiency in the port and majesty of this upstart, from what he had observed in that young prince, besides a certain callosity
 e in the hands of the former, which convinced him of the cheat. He therefore asked him and his instrument, What was become of his brother? and why he did not likewise come and make out his claim to the Jewish crown? and was readily answered by both, that Aristobulus had staid at Cyprus to wait the issue of this journey, that if one of the sons of Mariamne miscarried, the other might be preserved to keep up the Asmonean race and title. Their mutual agreement, which still helped to confirm the rest, served only to make the emperor look upon the whole as a forged story; and, to be further convinced of it, having taken the young man aside, he, partly by threats, and partly by a promise of sparing his life, extorted a full confession of the whole imposture, the consequence of which was, that the young man was sent to the f gallies, and the other, who had been the contriver of it, was condemned to be hanged. As for the Jews who had assisted them with money, Cæsar thought their loss and disappointment a sufficient punishment *.

BUT neither the dislike which the Jews had shewn upon this occasion to the Herodian family, nor the prudent caution which Cæsar had given Archelaus, proved sufficient to keep him within due bounds. He was no sooner returned into Judæa, than he began to betray some marks of his arbitrary and resenting temper. He began with the deposition of Joazar from the high-priesthood, on pretence that he had sided with some of the late mutineers; and bestowed that dignity on Eleazar the brother of ^a the deposed pontiff. He next repudiated his wife Mariamne, and married Glaphyra, the widow of his brother Alexander, contrary to the Mosaic law, because she had had several children by him, and had been married, since her first husband's death, to Juba king of Mauritania. He deposed soon after the new-installed pontiff upon some disgust, and raised Jesus the son of Sias to that dignity. He bestowed an immense deal of cost in rebuilding and beautifying the royal palace at Jericho, and bringing down one half of the stream, which watered the village of Nerea, into the grove of palm-trees which he had planted in the neighbouring fields ^v. About this time Caius, coming from Egypt into Judæa, expressed his contempt of the Jewish religion, by refusing to offer up sacrifices at Jerusalem, for which he is said to have been com- ^b mended by Cæsar ^a.

THE first years of Archelaus proved peaceable enough; but the people at length, both Jews and Samaritans, being tired with his tyrannical reign, joined in a petition to Augustus against him; which had no sooner reached him, than he sent an agent of his into Judæa, without any other letter, to fetch the Jewish ethnarch to him. Archelaus, tho' warned, as well as the incestuous Glaphyra, by some portending dreams (V), had given so little heed to them, that Cæsar's messenger found him in the height of his mirth, when he came to acquaint him with his orders, and obliged him to hasten with him to Rome. Upon their arrival there, Augustus, with his usual equanimity, heard both the charge and the defence; after which he condemned Archelaus to be banished to the city of Vienna, in Gaul or Dauphiné, and all his goods to be confiscated. Judæa, by this sentence, being reduced into a province of the empire, was ^c ordered to be taxed, and Cyrenius, the then governor of Syria, and a man of consular dignity, was sent thither to see it executed (as we have lately hinted upon another occasion); after which having sold Archelaus's palaces, and seized upon all his treasure, he returned to Antioch, leaving the Jews in no small ferment upon the account of this new tax ^b.

Coponius, the Roman general of horse, and governor of Judæa under Cyrenius, had accompanied him in that expedition; and his presence, as well as the good offices of Joazar the then high-priest (W), had, for a while, kept the nation under some restraint, till Judas the Gaulonite, of whom we have spoken in the last section, and one Saducus, a turbulent Pharisee, set it again into a flame. We hinted before, that ^d this boutefeu took upon him to condemn this taxing as Unlawful, idolatrous, and inconsistent with their duty to God, the only sovereign who could claim any homage or allegiance from the children of Abraham. This topic seldom failed to make an impression on a people, who were taught to look upon themselves as the only favourites of heaven, and upon the rest of the world as designed to be their slaves; but it wrought much more effectually at this time, when their hopes of the Messiah or temporal deliverer inspired them with a tenfold disdain against the yoke which their

(V) These dreams, which, whether true or false, shew how much the Jewish nation was addicted to them, our author gives us the following account of:

Archelaus saw ten ears of corn full ripe, and ten oxen devouring them; which vision made such an impression on him, that he consulted the wisest and most expert magicians and Chaldeans about it (9); but they differing in their opinion, one Simon an Essenian interpreted the ten ears of the ten years of Archelaus's reign, which, he said, was to have a speedy end, signified by their being devoured by the oxen. The event verified his interpretation, as appears by the sequel.

That of his wife needed not, it seems, a conjurer to expound it. She dreamt, that her first husband, the unfortunate Alexander, came to her; and whilst she was preparing to receive him with open arms, upbraided her with her faithless incontinency, in marrying Juba, and then his brother Archelaus, after she had had so many children by him; but, added he, I shall soon rid thee of this reproach. The consequence was, that she just lived long enough to tell her dream, and died within two days after it (10).

(W) Josephus has forgot to tell us how he was reinstalled into this dignity, of which he had been deprived by Archelaus some years before, to make room for the son of Sias, hunted a little higher; but it is probable, that, after that prince's banishment, Joazar found means to recover that dignity under the Syrian governor; and this might be the motive of that zeal which he shewed in appeasing the discontented Jews (10).

But this last action, instead of confirming him in his pontificate, proved the cause of his second deposition, it having rendered him so obnoxious to the Jewish nation, that Cyrenius was forced, for quietness sake, to turn him out of it, and to put Ananus in his place (11).

- a conquerors were then laying upon them. Judas therefore could not have wished for a more favourable juncture to make himself the head of a numerous and powerful party; And therefore, added he, it is high time that you should make a strenuous push for your country's freedom, and without expecting new miracles to be wrought for you, do but depend on the favour of providence, and you need not doubt of coming off conquerors. There wanted but this last incentive to set them a madding after the promised liberty. Accordingly, we find that his speech worked them into a kind of furious phrensy, which quickly vented itself into the most horrid butcheries and cruelties; his party plundering, burning, destroying, and murdering every-where, indiscriminately, Jews as well as Gentiles; and in a word, all that opposed his specious pretence of religion and liberty. The war being thus kindled within and without, brought on a grievous famine, and next a pestilence; all which did end at length in the total ruin of that rebellious and unhappy nation c. All this was owing to the ambition of this new upstart sect or faction, of whom we have already given an account in the close of the last section; to which we shall only add, that after the death of their chief, they distinguished themselves by the godly name of zealots, and under that specious title committed the most unheard-of cruelties, and carried their violence even into the very temple.

- ALL this while the Samaritans had not forgot their old grudge against the Jews, though they had been so long quiet. Cyrenius was scarce gone out of Judaea before they began to hatch new mischiefs against them; they waited till the next approaching feast of the passover, when on the eve of it, a number of them having by private means slipped into the temple, strewed the galleries and other places of resort with dead mens bones, so that the priests on the next morning, finding that sacred place polluted, were forced to put a stop to the solemnity. How they afterwards purified it, and what other remedy they took to renew the festival, Josephus doth not tell us; he only adds, that it made them more cautious for the future, to guard the avenues from all such insults. However, the ceremony was soon resumed, and it was on this festival that Christ, being then twelve years of age, came with his parents to that solemnity, according to the Jewish custom, which obliged all the males that have attained to that age, to repair to the temple on the three grand festivals †. Here the holy child chose to stay unknown to his parents, who were departed with the rest of the company. They did not miss him till night, when having in vain sought him among their relations and acquaintance, among whom they supposed him to have been, they returned immediately to Jerusalem. Here after a three days sorrowful search, they found him at length in the temple, sitting among the Jewish doctors, and surprising them with the wisdom of his questions and answers, so far beyond his mean education, and tender years. His pious mother, though ravished at so pleasing a scene, could not forbear expressing some tender resentment at the solicitude which his absence had given her. The short answer he returned was not presently understood by them, but yet was a lecture full of excellent wisdom: Wist ye not, said he, that I must be about my father's business? and so he really was; for as he had been sent to be a teacher of the world, and as he now commenced what the Jews called a son, or disciple of the law, it became him, who was to be our pattern, to make his first access to his future office of instructor, by coming to learn of those whom God had appointed to preserve and teach the knowledge of his laws. His mother suffered none of these sayings to slip out of her memory, and she and her husband gladly returned with him to their mean habitation, where he continued in a dutiful subjection to them. In this humble privacy, his wisdom increasing with his stature, he attracted the eyes and hearts of all that beheld him, and continued exercising the trade of a carpenter (X) till

(X) This is the common received opinion, founded on an ancient tradition, that Joseph dying soon after this feast, he being by that time very old, the child Jesus was obliged to work at that trade, to maintain himself and his mother; and is further confirmed by the Jews calling him sometimes the carpenter, and sometimes the carpenter's son (12).

We beg leave to take notice here also, that this increase of knowledge which the evangelist attributes to him, is very inconsistent with Strius's notion of the λόγος or word supplying the place of the soul in him; neither has any of his followers, either ancient or modern, been as yet able to take off the difficulty. The Socinian system would indeed more effectually

Cauponi was soon after this feast succeeded by Ambivius, in whose governorship Salome died; and bequeathed her three cities, mentioned a little higher, together with the fine grove of palm-trees planted by Archelaus, and all her vast treasure, not to either of her nephews, who still held their small toparchies, but to the empress Julia, or, as Josephus affects to call her, Livia. Ambivius after a short time was succeeded by Annius Rufus, and Augustus died at Nola in Campania, as shall be seen in the Roman history, and was succeeded by Tiberius, after this latter had been somewhat above two years admitted into the copartnership of the empire. From this latter mult the fifteenth year of Tiberius, mentioned by the evangelist ^d, be taken. Tiberius, upon ^b his coming to the empire, recalled Rufus, and sent Valerius Gratus into Judaea, who was the fourth Roman governor or procurator of it, and continued in that government eleven years ^e. About five years after his being entered into it, he deposed the high-priest Ananus or Annas in the fifteenth year of his pontificate, and raised Ishmael the son of Fabus to that dignity. Being soon after displeased with his choice, he took it from Ishmael on the next year, and gave it to Eleazar the son of Ananus, whom he had lately deposed. Eleazar in a year's time was forced to resign, and was succeeded by Simon the son of Camith, who within the compass of another year was turned out, and Joseph, surnamed Caiphas, and son-in-law to Annas above-mentioned, was put in his room ^f; so uncertain and venal was that dignity become by this time (Y). ^c

Gratus himself was soon after recalled, and succeeded by Pontius Pilate, a person who exceeded all his predecessors in injustice, extortion, and cruelty, and so thoroughly wedded to his own interest, that he was capable of the vilest actions to promote that favourite end. Josephus has been somewhat sparing of his character; but Philo ^g has left us a lively draught of it, a short sketch of which the reader may see in the margin (Z); by which he may judge how qualified he was for the part he was shortly to act, in passing the most unjust sentence on the most innocent of men.

We hinted a little higher, that the other sons of Herod had still kept possession of their toparchies, notwithstanding Archelaus's deposition and banishment; it will be ^d therefore very proper here to give some further account of them before we enter into a new and different scene. They had each of them settled themselves the best they could in their small territories. Antipas, better known by the name of Herod, who had the country of Galilee, began with rebuilding the city of Sephoris, which had but a little before been reduced into ashes by the son of Varus, and surrounded it with a strong wall and towers, so that it became the bulwark, and one of the best cities of that canton; and as he had been successful enough to ingratiate himself with the new emperor, he built another, a fine city, on the northern banks of the lake of Genesareth, and called it Tiberias, in honour of him (A); and from thence that lake came to be called the sea of Tiberias. This city he was forced to people mostly with Galileans ^e and strangers, because it being built on a ground, which was full of sepulchres, the going over which pollutes the Jews seven whole days, he could hardly get any of effectually do it, were it not in too many cases diametrically opposite to the doctrine of the gospel. There remains therefore no other way to remove it, than by owning that Christ had a human soul as well as a human body, and that the former, notwithstanding its union with his divine nature, was as capable of improvement in wisdom, as the latter was of increase in strength and stature; which is undoubtedly the ancient doctrine of the christian church.

(Y) These are the two high-priests that are mentioned in the gospel to have prosecuted and condemned Jesus Christ to death; and Caiphas, or, as he is there called, Caiaphas (13), was the person who adjudged it necessary that he should be cut off to save the nation from ruin.

(Z) His whole administration, according to this author, was one continued scene of venal justice, rapine, tyranny, and every wicked action; of racking and putting innocent men to death, untried, and uncondemned, and of every kind of savage cruelty.

(A) Josephus adds, that it was not far from the hot baths of Emmans; for which reason we think it necessary to remind our reader of what we observed in a former note, that the Jews gave the name of Hamah and Hammah to all places that had any such waters; that of Emmans is the same, only softened and grecified. We must therefore not confound this last with another in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (14), which bears the same name, and most likely upon the same account.

a that nation to settle there, though he endowed it with considerable privileges, and gave its inhabitants the greatest encouragement, viz. lands to some, houses to others, to take off their qualms of conscience about treading on dead bodies. Another city formerly called Betaramphtha he rebuilt; and called by the empress's name, Julias. His brother Philip followed his example, and built the village of Bethsaida, on the opposite end of the same lake, into a magnificent city, and called it likewise Julias, and gave the name of Cæsarea to Paleas, the place where the Jordan has its spring-head, after he had greatly enlarged and beautified it^b. During this time came out that edict of Tiberius, which obliged all Jews and Egyptians to depart from the city of Rome^c, or, according to another, out of the territories of Italy^d. The cause of this edict being some vile practices, which a few mean persons of each of those nations had been acting in in the imperial city, is foreign to our present subject; we refer our readers for a further account to Josephus^e, and the two authors last quoted. All that we need add to it is, what Philo has observed more than once^f, that this severity against the Jews, whatever pretence it might be coloured with, was hatched underhand by Sejanus. That wicked minister, who knew how opposite his plots and designs were to the known loyalty of the Jews, could not but conceive some dreadful jealousies from them, which obliged him at length to rid himself of them (B).

c HITHERTO Judæa, though in a violent ferment on account of the late tax, and some other tumults which the Romans had appeased by main force, had not however broke out into such a violent and universal flame, as it did after the coming of Pilate. It was this governor, whose fierce, obstinate, and cruel temper, hastened on those seditions and revolts, which did not end but with the total extirpation of the Jewish state. His predecessors had hitherto wisely forbore to bring the Roman standards into the city, because their bearing the images of men, and living creatures, made them to be had in abomination by the Jews. But Pilate, who thought it beneath him to shew them the same complaisance, ordered his troops, which were to winter in that metropolis, to enter it in the night, with those standards covered, and caused them on the next morning to be displayed. This new and shocking sight put the whole city into an uproar; they went to him in a body to Cæsarea, where he then was, and begged of him that they might be removed to some other place; but were answered, that he could not comply with their request, without glancing an affront on the emperor. As they stood stiff in their petition, and he in his denial six whole days, five of which the former had continued prostrate on the ground before his palace, night and day^g, he at length came out to them, as with design to give them audience; and being mounted on his tribunal, which he had reared in the circus, gave the signal to some of his troops, whom he had conveniently posted, to fall on them, and to murder all that should not immediately depart, and who instantly came out and surrounded them. The Jews however, far from being terrified at so horrid a perfidy, did meekly hold out their necks to those butchers, telling them and the governor, that the loss of their lives was nothing so terrible to them as the violation of their laws; and Pilate, who expected nothing less than such a passive constancy in that turbulent nation, was so moved at it, that he at length granted their request, and ordered the standards to be removed out of their metropolis^h.

f BUT as he seems to have been wholly bent upon mortifying and spighting of the Jewish nation, he soon resumed his usual course. A project came next into his head to set up a number of shields in the royal palace of Jerusalem in honour of Tiberius (C); but which the Jews failed not to resent as an indignity offered to them, rather than a compliment to that emperor. He had, it is true, taken care that there should be no carved images upon them that might give them offence; but the very inscription of them was, they thought, contrary to their law; otherwise there was nothing more common both before and after the Jewish captivity, than for the Jewish mo-

(B) What seems to confirm what our author says on that subject is, that after the death of that faithless minister, the emperor expressed himself more favourably with respect to the Jews, in the orders

narchs to cover even the front of the temple with such ornaments, as the reader must have often observed through the course of their history. The magistrates therefore of that metropolis, with the sons of Herod (D) at their head, went to represent to him in the most civil terms, that such a consecration was contrary to their laws, and to beg of him that he would pay a greater regard to them. Pilate repulsed them with his usual scorn and obstinacy, till they ventured at length to advise him, not to push things so far as to exasperate the nation into an open revolt. They added, that if he had received any such command from Cæsar, he need but shew it to them, and they would immediately dispatch a deputation to Rome to petition the emperor against it. These last words threw the governor into a strange dilemma: on the one hand, he dreaded nothing so much as such a deputation, which would in all likelihood lay open all the iniquities of his administration: on the other, if he complied with their request, in removing the shields, he not only gave an advantage to a people he hated and despised, but exposed himself to the resentment of the emperor, who might probably look upon such a compliance as an affront to himself, and a compliment to the Jews. The magistrates perceiving the trouble he was in, immediately withdrew, and sent soon after a very pressing, but submissive letter, to Rome, which had the desired effect. Tiberius immediately dispatched another to Pilate, wherein he highly blamed him for what he had done, and ordered him to remove the shields into some other place; which he accordingly did, and sent them to be hung up at Cæsarea ^P.

the Jews infidelity and de-

His next project to vex the Jews was, to find out some specious pretence for drawing money out of the sacred treasury. This was indeed the most effectual way to touch them to the quick, next to the rising of the temple; for he knew but too well their invincible attachment to those two places. The plausible pretext he chose for it was, the bringing of an aqueduct about two hundred furlongs off, into Jerusalem; the expence of which he expected should be supplied out of the sacred depository, and demanded accordingly of them, that a tax should be levied upon it. However, as he knew that this would not fail to provoke the people into a mutiny, so he took care to provide against it, by causing a number of his soldiers to mix themselves with the croud, with clubs hid under their coats, to be ready upon a signal to fall upon the mutineers. He was hardly seated on his tribunal, before it was surrounded accordingly by a vast concourse of Jews, who came exclaiming against his project, and where some of the meaner sort, as is usual in such mobs, accompanied their clamour with bitter invectives against him. Pilate had not heard them long, before he gave his men the signal, who immediately fell on the Jews pell-mell with their clubs, wounded, lamed, and even killed many of them indiscriminately, and dispersed the rest ^Q. Josephus doth not tell us, whether Pilate went on with his design, neither is it easy to guess either from him or from Philo at what year of his government the three last-mentioned transactions happened. All that can be gathered from the whole is, that he took all the pains he could to make it uneasy to them from the beginning to the end of it, and that the Jews were not behind-hand with him, either in opposing his designs, oppressions and cruelties, or in giving him fresh troubles by their tumults and seditions, in which every sect joined to give a helping hand, though at ever so great variance in other points. This was the dismal state of Judæa, when the Saviour of the world made his first public appearance into his ministry: miserably torn by their intestine broils: oppressed with the heavy yoke of the Roman emperors, and of their more rapacious substitutes: divided into factions and sects, which treated each other with greater rancour and inhumanity, than their very oppressors: deceived, and often led to their ruin by upstart demagogues, false prophets, and pretended Messiahs; and soothed and flattered to a degree of judicial insatiation, into the mistaken notion of a speedy temporal deliverer, and of a glorious and lasting scene of conquests, triumphs, and other earthly happiness, under his auspicious reign. All which proved so many invincible obstacles to their embracing that salvation, which Christ the true Messiah came to offer them, and made them run into the very jaws of

- a that destruction, which their rejection of him and his doctrine, joined to all their other impieties, did shortly bring upon them. All which will be best seen by a shorter view of the three last years of his life : of the irrefragable credentials he brought with him, and the obstinate and unreasonable opposition they made against him : of his love and tenderness towards them, and of their malice and ingratitude to him : of his irreproachable innocence, and of their injustice in condemning him to death : and lastly, of the innumerable evidences given to them after his resurrection, of his being the true promised Messiah, and of their invincible hardness and obstinacy in rejecting him to the last. We shall therefore close the present section with a short account of those three last signal years of his life, and his doleful exit on the cross ;
- b confining ourselves chiefly to such particulars as have an immediate connection with the two main points in our view ; the divinity of his mission, and the justice of the Jews punishment in the destruction of their city, temple, and commonwealth, and total dispersion of their nation, for their obstinate rejection of him and his doctrine (E).

It was now the thirtieth and last jubilee since its first celebration in the land of Canaan †, when Christ, in the thirtieth year of his age, came to preach a more glorious and acceptable one, not to the Jewish nation only, but to the whole world. The Christ enters into his ministry.

(E) It will be perhaps objected, that in entering thus far into those two religious points, we go out of our limits as historians, and that instead of writing a continuation of the history of the Jews, we are going to prove the truth of christianity against them. But let it, we pray, be considered, that though this were the real case, the harm would not be great ; and that, provided both points are kept going still hand in hand, and we do not so fix our eye upon one, as to lose sight of the other, we still answer the two main ends of history, to make men wiser and better.

We should moreover be guilty of a flagrant injustice to the insatuated Jews, if we should neglect so fair an opportunity of reminding them of the source of all their misfortunes, and pointing out to them their only remedy. We have heretofore taken notice of a promise made to them by God, that though their sins had caused them to be dispersed through the four quarters of the world, yet, as soon as they were brought to an humble acknowledgment and confession of them, he would gather them home again into their own land.

Accordingly, before their total dispersion, the longest captivity they underwent was but of seventy years, though it was brought upon them by the horrid crimes, such as idolatry, murders without number, sacrileges of the blackest nature committed by Manasse, and his wicked successors ; and yet they had this comfort in the midst of their punishment, that the same prophets who had foretold their captivity had likewise set a period to it ; and were still encouraging them to bear their chastisement patiently, since God would certainly put a happy end to it at the time prefixed.

What crime can they then charge themselves with of so atrocious a nature, as to bring this more dreadful captivity of seventeen hundred years upon them, without one prophecy, or even comfortable glimpse, when they shall see an end to it ? If they know of any such sin, why do they not confess and acknowledge it, and thereby put a period to their misery ? for God's promise stands as sure now, as it did three thousand years ago.

Since then they are ignorant of this grievous crime ; Why should we make a difficulty to point it out to them, when we have so fair an occasion offered ? Why should we not tell them, that it was their putting the Messiah to an unjust and inglorious death ?

and which they are so far from acknowledging, that they justify and glory in it, and by so doing murder him still in their hearts, as often as they think or speak of him, and so become partakers of their ancestors guilt as well as punishment.

Again, The scripture doth in several places, but more expressly St. Paul (16), assure us, that there will be a time when they shall be all recalled ; and their having continued so long unblended with other nations, notwithstanding their dispersion through every part of the habitable globe, is a strong proof of it. For whatever superficial heads may imagine, an impartial thinker will easily observe, that nothing but a particular providence could have kept them in that unmixed state as they have continued in these seventeen centuries, when he sees even in our own land a multitude of nations, in a much less time, as much blended and absorbed into one common name, as their bodies are into one common earth. Especially when we consider by what weak supports or rather poor mean evasions, their faith and hopes have been kept up, ever since they have seen all scripture calculations concerning the time of the Messiah, so long elapsed ; to say nothing of the many discouragements they have at one time or other met with from every nation under heaven.

We are assured by the same apostle (17), that this recall of the Jews will not be till after the fulness, or total conversion of the Gentiles. Were the former once rightly apprised of this, it is likely their zeal in obstructing the one would insensibly abate, when they saw that it was the fatal means of retarding the other.

We may add, that since the best historians have not thought it out of their province to plunge into the deep abyss of obscurity, to find out the causes of the decadence and fall of kingdoms and empires, but have even endeavoured to discover them in certain aspects of the heavenly bodies, transits of comets, and such-like amusing dreams ; may we not much more be allowed to venture to trace this remarkable one of the Jews under the conduct of such infallible guides, as the scripture and history affords us ? All which will be best seen, when we come to compare Christ's prophecies against that unhappy people, and the wonderful accomplishment of them, as we have it related by one of the best historians of their own nation.

Of Christ 32.

Baptized and manifested by John.

Jewish was usually ushered in by the sound of the trumpets, the new christian one by a the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and so on ^a. This was the miraculous son of Zecbarias, a priest, prophet, and fore-runner of the Messiah, who having left the wilderness, where he had spent his younger days, came now to preach repentance, and the kingdom of the Messiah, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, and in the high-priesthood of Joseph, surnamed Caiaphas, mentioned a little higher. The austerity of his life (F), and the newness of his doctrine, drew daily great numbers of Jews to be baptized by him in the Jordan, supposing him to be the Messiah; but he quickly disclaimed that glorious title, assuring them that he was only sent as his precursor, and to point him out to them, as the person who was to baptize them with the Holy Ghost. Jesus came accordingly to the place soon after to be baptized ^b among the rest, and John in an humble guise excused himself from that high office; but being at length prevailed upon to go into the river with him, upon their coming out of the water, the Holy Ghost visibly descended and lighted upon him, whilst a voice was heard from heaven, saying, This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased ^c. Whereupon the baptist took that opportunity to manifest him to all that were there present, and to bear this ample testimony of him, that he was the very Christ, and the lamb of God, who was to take away the sin of the world ^d.

As John continued baptizing and preaching in the neighbourhood of Bethabara (G), a great concourse of people flocked to him from all parts, especially in their return homewards from Jerusalem, where they had been celebrating the feast of tabernacles, which fell out about the beginning of November ^e. Among them was a great number of the Pharisaic sect, whom he severely rebuked upon several accounts, particularly on their pretended privilege of being Abraham's posterity; assuring them at the same time, that as long as their lives were so opposite to that of that glorious progenitor, they must expect to be cast like the chaff, into the fire, whilst God could raise a posterity to the father of the faithful out of the very stones they were trampling upon. On this year was born to Herod Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, a son named also Agrippa, who was the last king of the Jews, and before whom St. Paul was allowed to plead

(F) His dress and manner of living seems to have been the same with the ancient prophets, of whom we have spoken in a former volume ^a. His food was wild honey and locusts, which a modern traveller tells us are very common in those parts, and good for food; from whence he concludes, that they were the creatures which the Israelites fed so plentifully upon in the wilderness, and which all the versions have misrendered quails. We have had occasion heretofore ^b to confute the latter part of this assertion. As for the locust, which the baptist fed upon, the generality of interpreters understand it of a real insect so called, whence some eastern nations have been called Acridophagi or locust-eaters (18). Others understand it of a kind of bean or pulse so called; the reader may consult interpreters about it, if he pleases; but the other notion is much more probable, that insect being common, cheap, and particularly permitted in the Levitical law to be eaten by the Israelites (19).

Archbishop Usher supposes, with great probability, that this preacher of repentance began his ministry on the grand fast, or expiation day, of which frequent mention has been made in this history, it being enjoined to every Israelite to fast, and afflict their souls on that day, under the penalty of being cut off from his people. This day fell, as we elsewhere observed ^c, on the tenth day of the seventh month, called Tishri, answering to about the nineteenth of our October; and on that solemnity the jubilee was to be proclaimed through all the land

(10). Upon both which accounts no time could be more proper to begin the work of proclaiming the more spiritual and universal jubilee, which was now at hand.

(G) So called from the Hebrew בית-עברה, beth-habarah, the house of passing over, or ferry-house, supposed by some to have had that name from the passage of the Israelites over Jordan ^d; but whether so or not, its name shews it to have been probably some great ferry, and so very convenient, not only for baptizing, but on account of the concourse of people at such places.

But the word beth-habarah may be also, and perhaps, more properly translated a custom-house, as the officers of it, whom we render publicans, were called בעלי העברה, bahale bahabarah, masters or overseers of the customs; a great many of whom came accordingly to the baptist, to inquire what kind of repentance was proper for men of their profession; and were answered, they should exact no more than their due (21); to the soldiers, which are usually set to guard such avenues, he forbid using violence, false accusations, extortion, &c. to the rest, who on the same supposition, dealt in the mercantile way, he enjoined likewise a practice opposite to their common one; that is, liberality, hospitality, charity, &c. instead of covetousness, fraud, &c. Thus was he fulfilling what was foretold of old (22), Every valley shall be filled, every mountain levelled, &c.

- a his cause ; and on the next year was his sister Berenice born, who was also present at the trial ¹, she being sixteen, and her brother seventeen years of age, when their father died ².

John the Baptist having given such an ample testimony to the Saviour of the world, the two first that became his followers, were two of his own disciples, viz. Andrew the son of Jonah, and Simon his brother, to whom he gave the surname of Cephas, or Stone. On the next day, as he was returning to Nazareth, he called Philip to follow him ; and this went and gave notice of him to an honest Israelite, named Nathanael, who is generally believed to be the same, who is by the other evangelists called Bartolomew, assuring him that they had found the promised Messiah, namely Jesus of Nazareth. Nathanael's mean opinion of that city, and of the whole Galilean region, could scarcely permit him, at the first news, to believe that any thing so good as a prophet, much less the Messiah, could come from such a mean quarter. He was however soon undeceived, when Jesus told him some of the private discourse which Philip and he had had together under a fig-tree, far enough out of his hearing. These two therefore, and some others, followed him into Galilee, where they were all invited to a poor couple's wedding. Here the wine beginning to fail, Jesus's mother, who was one of the guests, acquainted him with it (H), who arose soon after, and, of his wonted compassion, miraculously supplied them with a fresh and sufficient quantity. This wonderful change of such a quantity of water into excellent wine, filled the company with admiration, and further confirmed his new disciples, that he really was what they thought him, the true Messiah. From Cana he went to Caper-naum, a small city on the west shore of the lake Genezareth, where we shall often find him in the sequel ; and where he made but a short stay at this time, by reason of the approaching feast of the passover, to which he repaired with his disciples, it being the first festival of that kind he celebrated since his entrance into his ministry ³.

UPON his coming to the temple, he found it crowded with people that sold cattle, poultry, and other such things as were used in the Jewish offerings, and had been set up there for the convenience of those that came from far to the feasts, and bought them on the spot, rather than bring them from their homes. This had likewise introduced a number of money-changers for the use of those who brought foreign coin instead of victims, and whose tables and trade were equally a profanation of that sacred place. It is likely, that the priests, who might and ought to have made them keep their stalls and counters at a greater distance, made a perquisite of their indulgence, and consequently aggravated the abuse. Against them therefore Christ chose to exert the first essays of his authority and zeal, by turning them all out of that sacred building, after a severe reproof for their mercantile profanation of it. But whilst his disciples admired his zeal for the house of God, so worthy of the son of David, the dissatisfied Jews were questioning and demanding the signs of his authority ; and received this remarkable answer from him, that they should destroy this temple, meaning that of his body, and he would raise it up in three days. It was upon this occasion that they, mistaking his meaning, reminded him of the forty and six years it had been a building ; of which we took notice a little higher. His disciples however understood him much better after he was risen from the dead ⁴. In the mean time he did not omit giving them many other pregnant proofs of his divine mission, in the many miracles which he did before them, and which still increased the number of his

(H) The answer which ours and most other versions makes him, who was to be the pattern of all perfection, give to his mother on this occasion, has given just offence to all serious readers ; notwithstanding the specious glosses which commentators have put upon it, such as if he expressed himself to her in those contemptuous terms, to prevent, if possible, that extraordinary worship, which he foresaw his followers would in time pay to her, and the like.

Whereas a learned critic of our own (13) has lately proved beyond all contradiction, that the words, if rightly rendered, are full of the deepest filial respect ; for the word γυνή, woman, is so far from being a term of contempt, as it sounds in our language, that he has proved it from the best authors to have been given even to queens. We may say the same thing of the word יְהוָה, israh, in the Hebrew, which is used in the same respectful sense by the Jews.

As for the phrase which is there rendered, What have I to do with thee ? it is well known to be a Hebrew idiom, which implies no more than, What is so you or me (14) ?

disciples; but he who knew their hearts, easily judged that many of them would soon turn their backs upon him, especially when the sanhedrin and the Pharisaic sect came to denounce their sentence of excommunication against them (I). However, though that sect was the most inveterate against him, we shall find some of them of a more

(I) It is doubtless a matter of great wonder how the Jews could see such a vast number and variety of miracles wrought by Christ on the sick, halt, maimed, deaf, dumb, blind, paralytic, lunatic, demoniac, and other objects of pity, and yet believe him a false prophet, a deceiver, or any thing rather than a person sent from God: how they could see him give sight to those that were born blind, life to one that had lain four days corrupting in the grave, feed so many thousands with a few loaves and fishes, still the winds and seas by his single word; in a word, to display, as it were, his irresistible power over the universal creation; and yet either condemn him as a cheat, or be ever asking for some further and more convincing signs of his being the Messiah (25).

We have already accounted in part for this strange proceeding in the detail we gave of their several sects, whose tenets being for the most part diametrically opposite to the doctrine and spirit of the gospel, proved so strong an obstacle against it, as few were able to surmount. To this we may add, that Christ chusing the sabbath day for working the major part of those miracles, gave them still a greater offence; their foolish superstitious prejudices making them look upon even such works of mercy to be a violation of that holy day, notwithstanding all he could urge to the contrary; a flagrant instance of which we have in the cure of the man born blind, in the chapter last quoted out of St. John.

But what most helped to confirm them in this absurd judgment of him, was a passage in Deuteronomy (26), which, rightly understood, is only a prudent caution against their being drawn aside by false prophets, and pretended wonder-workers; but which they did, and still do understand to this day, so literally, and contrary to the plain design of the law-giver, as to infer a possibility of a man's working many and great miracles, either by the help of the devil, by magic or other means, and without any other view but that of withdrawing people from the service of God.

Now, when men are once prepossessed with such an absurd notion, what miracles can any person work that may not be reduced under that class, if they have any dislike either to his person or doctrine, or can find any plausible objection against his manner of working them? All which concurred here against those of our Saviour, and were upon those accounts rejected by the generality of the Jews, even to this day, as we hinted above. Accordingly, they are so far from denying him to have done great and signal miracles, that they have invented the most stupid stories to prove that he did them either by magic, which they say he learned in Egypt, or by going privately into the temple, and stealing thence the ineffable name of God, by virtue of which he could perform all those great wonders; and many more such shameful and childish evasions, the bare mentioning of which is a sufficient confutation of them. Those that desire to know more of this Jewish trash, may consult, among others, the book intitled Sepher Thaleoth Jesu, or the history or book of the generations of Jesus, and some others which the reader may find in the margin (27).

But to give our English readers a short specimen of their opinion concerning him out of those books, some affirm him to have been the son of one Panther, begotten on a milliner of his debauching, and that the soul of Esam, whose memory they have in great abhorrence, passed into him, which is, according to their doctrine of the soul's transmigration, mentioned at the close of the last section. That he stole into the temple, and took from thence the name of God; and having made an incision into his thigh, stuck it into it, and let the flesh and skin grow over it. That he became by it a very great conjurer, and wonder-worker. That Judas was another of the same stamp, and his competitor. That they had a great number of contests, which we shall forbear inserting on account of their ridiculousness as well as impiety; and that Judas was still conqueror in all, and gave him at last a total defeat.

One would be apt to think these to be idle tales, invented only to amuse their children, and breed them up in a contempt of christianity; and some of them have even affirmed it, to wipe off the just imputation they would otherwise incur; and yet they are chiefly founded on some as ridiculous stories fetched out of their Talmud, where mention is made of Christ's miracles, and of the means by which he attained to the power of performing them; and pass as current amongst them, as the book out of which they are taken.

But what can they say for one of their greatest rabbies (28), who affirms one Jesus the son of Barachia, or Perachia, to have been tutor to Jesus Christ, and to have taken him into Egypt, and to have turned him off for his debaucheries; though in order to these two having been contemporaries, the latter must have been born under Alexander Jannæus, and have died in the thirty-sixth year of his age, in the reign of Aristobulus. This anachronism another learned rabbi (29) has endeavoured to rectify by substituting a second Jesus, who lived in the time of Hillel and Shammai, and was tutor to Jesus Christ. But this, like their history of the second temple, which makes Pompey to have taken him prisoner, doth but lessen, but not clear the anachronism (30); and only exposes their ignorance, not to call it worse, in attempting to invalidate his miracles by such poor shifts.

But, lastly, if we consider the vast superstition which then reigned among the Jews, how addicted they were to astrology; what strange power they attributed to the heavenly bodies, or rather to the angels which presided in each of them; what prodigies they thought might be done by the right evocation of them; what supernatural efficacy they ascribed to the right pronouncing of the name of God; how extensive they supposed the power of magic to be; and that it was not only lawful, but necessary, to learn it in one's own defence; and lastly, that those were not the notions of a small number, but of the whole nation, except perhaps some few more judicious and unprejudiced; such as was Nicodemus, and some others, whom we shall mention in the sequel, and who made a more impartial judgment of Christ's miracles; we need not wonder that the rest, who neither liked his person, character, nor doctrine, should attribute those stupendous works to any other cause, than to the power and finger of God.

- a upright temper, who making a more equitable judgment of his miracles and doctrine, came to be instructed by him, and became his disciples, though privately, and for fear of their unbelieving brethren ^a.

AMONG these was one Nicodemus, a venerable ruler, who rightly concluding that such stupendous works could not be wrought without the divine assistance, and in confirmation of some new signal doctrine, such as the thinking part of the Jews expected the Messiah to bring with him; came privately one night to have a conference with him about it. Jesus, who took a singular delight to encourage such sincere inquirers ^b, and knew him to be a doctor of the law, immediately entertained him with the main and grand point of regeneration, without which he assured him it was impossible for a man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. He expressed himself moreover in such terms as he might have justly expected to be well understood by him, by comparing it to a new birth, such as the Jews affirmed to be that of their new proselytes, concerning which the reader may see what we have said in a former volume [†]. But Nicodemus, better versed perhaps in the reigning disputes of his and the other sects, than with such fundamentals of moral divinity, as had been quite swallowed up by the present polemic contagion, seemed wholly at a loss how to understand it. Our Saviour therefore, having given him a further explication of that heavenly doctrine, requested of him to embrace it upon his own authority for the present, assuring him that it was one main purport of his coming down from heaven, to teach it to mankind. He added, that the miracles which he had seen him work should not be the only proof he would give men of his divine mission, since they should see him shortly lay down his life in confirmation of it; and in so doing, fulfil all the prophecies and types of the Old Testament, and the decrees of the divine love and providence, by dying a piacle for the redemption of mankind ^c. And therefore he justly concluded, that if men receive not his divine testimony, but will shut their eyes to that marvellous saving light which he has brought into the world, it is because their evil deeds, which are manifested and reprov'd by it, make them prefer their own darkness; and this it is which aggravates their guilt, and will hereafter their sad punishment (K) ^d. Nicodemus, who felt

(K) We have contented ourselves to give the bare substance of this divine colloquy, which contains indeed the quintessence of christianity, viz. the redemption of the world by the death of Christ, and the reformation of mankind by the help of this new light which he brought down to them. This light, upon due attention, not only to this discourse to the Jewish ruler, but on the tenor of the whole gospel, will appear to consist in these three particulars:

1st, That he came to teach us a more perfect rule of life than human reason could by its own unassisted strength ever discover. For whatever some sanguine men may imagine concerning the sufficiency of that faculty, an impartial review of the world, and of the most polite parts of it, before the sacred writings of Moses and the prophets were published in other more known languages, will easily confute that fond conceit.

2^{dly}, He came to communicate a superior degree of strength to our corrupt nature, without which the lessons of that divine master would have been lost upon the far greater part of mankind; whilst, like persons infected with cuticular diseases, they would still have preferred the pleasure of scratching to the benefit of a cure; and therefore to inforce the observation of this new rule of life, without which man could be happy neither here nor hereafter, and to make him accept of and seek for that divine assistance, which alone could enable him to live up to it.

He was 3^{dly}, to inforce it by the worthiest and most powerful motives, the rewards and punishments of another life; both which he has set before us in the strongest light, that those who could not be allured to the virtues of his gospel by the beautiful prospect of the one, might at least be frighted into it by the dreadful apprehension of the other. That is, in other words; that since our too great attachment to the things of this world was the unhappy source of all our disasters, this double prospect of a future one might effectually wean us from them, by the assurance he has given us of the fatal consequences of an inordinate pursuit after them, and of the ample rewards which a generous neglect of them will intitle us to at the end of our race. All which is still more strongly inforced upon us from a due consideration, that he who best knew the value of that immortal life, which he came to reveal, thought not his life too dear a price to purchase it for us.

On this manifestation of the love of God to us, is founded our love to him as our sovereign bliss and benefactor, and of our neighbour, as partakers with us of the same divine favour. Nor is the fear of his punishments low and base, as it may seem at first, less conducive to it. For how can a man be rightly frighted out of the paths of sin and punishment into those of virtue and reward, without feeling a secret love and gratitude towards his gracious deliverer, insensibly kindled in his heart, and rising by degrees into most pungent remorse for his past follies, and into the most fervent desires of pleasing him for the future?

Now the foundation of all this must be laid on such a stedfast faith as Christ speaks of to Nicodemus (31), grounded on those irrefragable credentials felt the force of all these truths, became his disciple from that very night, but without daring to make open profession of it, for fear of the Jews. However, when their sanhedrin was once plotting to put him to death, he had the courage to oppose it^c; and when they had really crucified him, he and Joseph of Arimathea, another Jewish ruler, were the only two of that high rank who joined to give him an honourable burial^f.

Jesus left Jerusalem soon after to go into the other parts of Judæa, where he set his disciples on baptizing those who received his doctrine. This brought on a dispute between them, and those of the baptist, who was not yet cast into prison, but was still baptizing a little higher on the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Salim and Ænon, more towards Galilee (L). The difference between them being about Jesus's making a greater number of proselytes than John, was referred to the latter, who quickly decided it in favour of the former, adding thereto this noble testimony of him, that he was from heaven, and was above all, and testified the truths he had seen and heard; so that those who received his testimony, did set to their seal, that God is true, whereas those who reject it make him a liar, and are therefore obnoxious to his divine displeasure, whilst they continue in their unbelief^g (M). Soon after this, tials which he brought with him, such as the many and plain prophecies concerning him, his innumerable miracles, his resurrection, effusion of his holy spirit, and several other concomitant evidences which will further appear in the sequel. This heavenly testimony, he adds therefore, will be rejected by many, because their deeds are evil; for if his doctrine is confessedly so divine, and so excellently calculated for promoting our happiness here, and hereafter, that men of unbiassed reason might embrace it without those heavenly credentials, there must sure be some evil root in the hearts of those that can oppose it, after they have seen it confirmed by so many miracles, prophecies, &c. and illustrated by his godlike example.

'Tis therefore to convince us of this, that he assures us in another place (32), that if any man will, or is sincerely disposed to do his (God's) will, he shall soon know whether or not his doctrine be of God; if he has a real desire to be virtuous and holy here, in order to be happy hereafter, he shall receive a more feeling testimony of the divinity of my doctrine, than all those outward ones of miracles, &c. for these, through the depravity of man's nature, may in too many of them produce but a kind of historical faith, which descending no lower than the head, seldom brings forth any other fruit than speculative systems. They were designed to convince the understanding, and silence the gainayers; but the change of the heart, and the conquest of mens inordinate passions, not being to be attained but by the assistance of the divine grace, which is now freely and more plentifully going to be offered to every believer, those only will receive and feel the efficacy of it, who seek and pray for it from a sincere desire to comply with the terms of the gospel, and from a due sense of their wanting that superior assistance to enable them to it. When these therefore come to feel the wonderful changes which this divine grace shall work in them; that it inspires them with new affections, new thoughts and desires; that it rectifies their corrupt nature, subdues their irregular appetites, enables them to live quite other lives, and to forego all things, even life itself, rather than lose the favour of God, and the assurance of heaven; it will prove an inexhaustible source of evidence of the truth and divinity of my doctrine, and of joy and comfort to them; because that blessed Spirit which worketh all these wonders in them, will bear witness with their spirit, that they are now the sons of God (33); whilst the careless and self-sufficient will ever fall short of it, for want of this sincere desire after holiness, or of a sense of their standing in need of any other assistance to attain it.

Thus much we thought necessary to premise in order to the better understanding of the design and economy of the gospel; for since the bare belief of it, or a faith in Christ, its divine author, without practice of his precepts, will never intitle a man to the rewards of it; and this practice, whatever may be pretended to the contrary, cannot be attained without the divine assistance; and this last is only to be obtained by prayer grounded upon a right belief in the truth and faithfulness of our heavenly redeemer and law-giver; but all three must co-operate towards that main end; the miracles and other outward testimonies of the christian dispensation were highly necessary to attract a degenerate world to a religion so opposite to theirs, and so contrary to their depraved appetites; but it is this wonderful change, which the divine grace it communicates, works in us, that gives the finishing stroke and strongest light to its other evidence; and the man once thus happily transformed into a new, a heavenly creature, becomes more sure of the truth and certainty of the gospel, than if he had seen its divine author giving sight to the man born blind, or raising LAZARUS from the dead; because he justly thinks them alike the effects of an almighty and miraculous power.

(L) Ænon was about eight miles south of Scythopolis (34); Salim in the neighbourhood of it was the same with the Salem of the Old Testament, where Melchisedech was king, and where some of the ruins of his palace were still to be seen in St. Jerom's time (35). The reader may see what we have said of it heretofore†.

(M) Since the bare light of reason assures us that the nature of God is incomprehensible, it follows, that he cannot make any revelation of himself to us, but what must include mysterious truths vastly above our reach; and that it must consequently be a strange perverseness in man to reject them upon that account, when they come attested to us with the seal of heaven, for that is in fact to give the lie to eternal truth. Whereas the belief of them being only an open acknowledgment that God is true, cannot but be the most reasonable as well as acceptable sacrifice we can make to him of that faculty.

a John, whose extreme sanctity had raised him to the esteem, not only of all the Jews, but even of Herod Antipas, the then tetrarch of Galilee, this last often took pleasure in hearing and advising with him ^b for a time; till having ventured to take Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, into his bed, he received so many severe reproofs from that holy person for his incest, that he at last caused him to be thrown into a prison, where he soon after ordered him to be beheaded, through the hellish intrigues of that incestuous lady, and to all outward appearance much against his own will ^c. The occasion of this unlawful marriage was as follows:

Herod, whose first wife was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, was since fallen in love with that of his brother Philip, whom he had teen at his castle, where he had stopped some days in his journey to Rome. Herodias was the daughter of Aristobulus, and grand-daughter of Herod the Great, as has been hinted in a former note. Herod made no difficulty to discover his passion, and to propose marrying her, to which she consented upon condition that he divorced his first wife. This last having received some information of her husband's design, wisely concealed her resentment; and having obtained his permission to retire for some time to the castle of Macheron, which was then in her father's hands, she, instead of going thither, made all the haste she could to the Arabian court, where being at length arrived, she acquainted the king with the whole intrigue. This caused a rupture between Herod and Aretas, which ended in a war, which lasted till the death of Tiberius, four years after their falling out. Herod, thus rid of his wife without a divorce, made no scruple to marry his sister-in-law, though she had had children by his brother Philip, which was contrary to the Mosaic law. John the Baptist was not the only person who condemned that marriage as incestuous; the whole nation ventured to cry out against it; but as his character gave him a freer access to the court, he had the courage to reprove both the king and his paramour in the severest terms. Herodias, being at length stung to the quick with his frequent reproaches of incest, and infidelity to Philip, resolved to ruin him, and easily persuaded the easy king to cast him into prison. His presence for it, according to Josephus ^d, was his drawing such multitudes after him to be baptized; but the true reason was that given by the evangelists above-quoted, namely his and Herodias's resentment.

^e THE place where he confined him, is not mentioned by the latter, but the former tells us it was the castle of Macheron; though he should have told us how it came so soon again into his possession, after he had just hinted before that it belonged to the Arabian king. But it is not unlikely that he regained it from him after their rupture. All this while Jesus continued preaching in Galilee, and working so many singular miracles, that the fame of it came to the Baptist in his confinement. John therefore, supposing his own death to be near at hand, as he had formerly foretold it, sent two of his followers to inquire of him, whether he was the expected Messiah, not so much for his own satisfaction, as for that of his disciples. They came opportunely to him, whilst he was healing of a number of sick, halt, maimed, and blind, so that he only bid them return and acquaint their master with what they had seen, leaving it to him to explain the matter to them. All this while Herodias had not been able to prevail on the king to attempt the life of his prisoner. His fear of the people, who looked upon him as an extraordinary prophet, had hitherto outweighed his base complaisance to her. But she soon after compassed that by her hellish policy, which her persuasions had not been able to do. Herod's birth-day being celebrated with suitable solemnity before a number of his head officers, and other persons of distinction; she took the opportunity, when they were in the height of their mirth, and the king most probably heated with wine, to send her daughter Salome to dance before him; and she performed her part so well, that he promised with an oath to gratify her in whatever she should ask of him, even to the half of his kingdom. This was what Herodias was waiting for, and for which she had given her instructions to her daughter; so that the young princess, taking the king at his word, desired the head of the Baptist to be given her instantly in a charger. Herod, surprised at her demand, expressed no small concern at it, whether out of respect to that holy person, or the fear of a tumult. But at length the consideration of his oath, and of his guests, having turned the scale, he ordered an executioner to go and perform her bloody request; which being done accordingly, his disciples, upon hearing of it, came to take away the rest of his body, and gave it an honourable burial. Thus fell that great good man, and more than a prophet, according to his own prediction ^a; of whom Josephus, in the place above-quoted, gives us the following character: That his whole crime was his exhorting the Jews to the love and practice of virtue; and, first of all, to piety, justice, and regeneration, or newness of life; not by the bare abstinence of this or that particular sin, but by an habitual purity of mind and body. Now, continues he, so great was the credit and authority of this holy man, as appears by the multitude of his disciples, and the veneration they had for his doctrine, (for he could do what he would with them) that Herod not knowing how far the reputation of a man of his spirit might influence the people toward a revolt; resolved at length to take him off before it was too late, &c. He adds, that Herod was very unsuccessful in his war with the Arabian king, all which the Jews looked upon as a just judgment of God upon him for that impious murder. An ancient father tells us [†] further, that when Herodias received the Baptist's head from her daughter, she pierced his tongue with a bodkin, and shewed it some other indignities, such as one may easily suppose from a person of her loose character.

Jesus goes from Judæa into Galilee.

We return to Jesus Christ, who upon the news of John's imprisonment on account of the great number of disciples that followed him, began, it is likely, to fear, lest Pilate should take some umbrage at him upon the same account. For there came, as we observed a little higher, rather a greater resort of people to be baptised by his disciples; for himself, the evangelist assures, baptized none. This made him therefore leave Judæa after a stay of about eight months ^k, and depart for Galilee; where passing through Samaria, he converted the woman, and afterwards the inhabitants of Shechem, or, as the Jews by way of reproach called it, Sychar ^l, which signifies drunk, according to the phrase of the prophet, who calls the rebellious Jews the Shicore Ephraim, the drunkards of Ephraim ^m (N). After a few days stay at that place, he went on into Galilee, where he was well received by the Galileans, who had seen his late miracles at Jerusalem at the late passover, and preached in their synagogues. Whilst he was at Cana, the place where he had turned water into wine, a nobleman came about a day's journey to him, beseeching him that he would come down and heal a son of his, who was at the point of death, and expressed himself in such pressing terms, as sufficiently testified the sincerity of his faith. Jesus therefore, unto whom it was equally easy to heal at a distance, or at a greater nearness, dismissed him with these words: Go thy way; thy son liveth. He obeyed, and upon his inquiring of his servants at his return, found that he had begun to recover from the very minute in which the promise was come out of Jesus's mouth; so he and his whole family believed on him ⁿ. He went from thence into his old city of Nazareth, and being entered one sabbath-day into their synagogue, where the lesson out of Isaiah ^o was given him to read, in which there is a lively description of the Messiah's preaching the gospel, and of his confirming it with many godlike miracles of mercy; he expounded it of himself, with such powerful and majestic grace, as raised the admiration of the whole audience. But some of them being offended at his exquisite wisdom, whom they knew to have had so mean an education among them, he reminded them of several other cities in Judæa, and of many persons in Israel, who had rendered themselves unworthy of the divine favours by the like unseasonable partiality. This reproof was so highly resented by the Nazarites, that they rushed upon him with one consent, and hurried him to the brow of the hill on which their city was built, with a design to have cast him headlong down; but he slipping through the croud, escaped their malice, and went to dwell at Capernaum, a city situate on the coasts of Zebulon and Nephtalim; and preached among them, according to another oracle out of the same prophet ^p, importing that those regions of Galilee should in time be called from their native darkness, unto the marvellous light of the gospel. Being on another day preaching in one of their synagogues, there stood a demoniac before him (O), in whom the unclean

Him Jesus having put to silence by his powerful word, cast him out, and healed the man, to the admiration of the people, who spread his fame throughout all that region; insomuch that before he had taken a little refreshment at Peter's house, and healed his mother of a fever, under which she had languished some considerable time, they had brought from that whole neighbourhood all that were afflicted with diseases, and set them before him; and Jesus, according to his wonted compassion, laid his hands on every one of them, and sent them all home healed.

- BEING come to the lake of Genesareth, or sea of Tiberias, the crowds followed him so thick, that he was forced to get into a boat belonging to Simon Peter, whom from a fisherman he had called to be one of his apostles, and bid him launch out a little way, and taught the people from thence. As soon as he had done speaking, he bid Peter cast his net for a draught; and was answered, that though they had toiled all night in vain, yet at his word they would try afresh. They did so, and caught such a large draught, as was like to have sunk the boat. Peter, surprised at it, fell at his feet, and besought him to depart from such a sinner as he was; but Jesus taking him up, bid him be of good courage, for he would from thenceforth make him a fisher of men. During his abode in Galilee, he continued still confirming his doctrine with such numbers of miracles, that his fame had reached all the neighbouring provinces of Syria, Phenice, &c. insomuch that many people came from thence to be healed of their infirmities by him. be the souls of the wicked, and others, that they were a kind of imperfect creatures, whom God was forced to leave unfinished on the sixth day, because the evening of the sabbath came upon him before he had given them the finishing stroke (37). Upon either of these accounts, they believe them to find some pleasure and refreshment in possessing and annoying the bodies of the living. Of this kind they reckon also the satyrs, incubusses, fauns, familiar spirits †, &c. The Christians on the other hand believe them with greater countenance from holy writ, to be fallen angels, who have borne a constant enmity to mankind ever since the creation of Adam.

But it is here objected against either hypothesis, that if those malicious spirits had such an extensive power as these possessions seem to attribute to them, there would be no end of their mischiefs, till they had made an end of mankind. Whereas whatever we may read of them in former days, of ignorance and superstition, we see nothing like it now even pretended among the more civilized nations, and only hear some imperfect accounts among the more remote and less cultivated ones, which yet may be either mere cheats, or at best mere delusions; and this has made a great number of our moderate sceptics believe them all to have been of this last kind (38), as being less derogatory to the honour of God, than the supposition of his giving so great a power to evil spirits.

But these learned critics seem not to observe, that all these plausible pretences rather confute than countenance their notion; for who can believe that Christ, who was so jealous of his Father's honour, would not only have overlooked, but both by his words and actions even countenanced and confirmed a national error so opposite to it, if he had not known that God, for some ends best known to his infinite wisdom, had suffered those evil spirits to afflict and punish mankind? If he had known that all these pretended obsessions were the mere effects of melancholy, hypochondria, lunacy, and such-like disorders, incident to our nature, would he not have equally displayed his miraculous power in curing of them under this notion? and would not his pretended interrogations of those pretended devils, and their petitioning to him; his (39) distinguishing between their several kinds, and the different means of expelling them (40), have been acting a farce unworthy his divine character? how much more his promising to his disciples the same power of casting them out (41)?

That these devils are every-where represented in scripture as enemies to mankind, is beyond all dispute; and that they are not as yet confined to the place of their punishment, appears not only from their frequent expostulations with Christ, Art thou come to torment us before the time? but much more from that dreadful and definitive sentence to be pronounced against the wicked, Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil, &c. which if only prepared for them, implies that they are not yet sent into it. If therefore we stick close to the plain and obvious meaning of the inspired writers, we must suppose those possessions to have been something very different from such pretended disorders of the body or mind; and where lies the unreasonableness of the supposition of a vast variety of spiritual beings, some of a good and benevolent, others of a bad and maleficent nature, but all under the government of the supreme Being?

(P) This city was situate on an eminence by the lake of Genesareth, though the exact place be not known. Our Saviour exchanged it instead of that of Nazareth, where the stubbornness and incredulity of the Nazarites had been an obstruction to his doctrine and miracles. He made it his chief abode during the three last years of his preaching, and wrought a great number of miracles there; but as they made him no answerable returns for those favours, he forewarns them, that though their city was then exalted up to the clouds, it should shortly be brought down to the lowest abyss (42); which came accordingly to pass in the Jewish war, so that no footsteps remain of it.

heard of his fame, got himself transported thither in his couch born on mens shoulders, to be presented to him; but the house, in which he was, being so thronged within and without, that they could get no access to him, they got him up to the top of the house, and having untiled part of it, let him down by ropes, and so set him before him. Jesus beheld their faith with pleasure, and addressing himself to the paralytic, bid him be of good cheer, for his sins were forgiven; which, according to the Jewish notion, that such infirmities were the effects either of our own or of our parents sins, was no more than telling him that he was healed of his palsy. But the scrupulous Jews, not understanding it in that sense, accused him in their hearts of blasphemy, in assuming a power peculiar to God; but Jesus by the immediate cure of the sick man, soon convinced them of their error, and of his being equally empowered to forgive sins, and to cure any infirmities. It was his custom, by reason of the great resort of people that came to hear him, to go out of the city from time to time, and to teach them by the sea-side; and upon his often passing to and fro, he observed a publican sitting at the receipt of custom, named Levi, or Matthew, and bid him follow him (Q). Matthew did not hesitate one moment, but left his office, and followed him; and to express the sense he had for this gracious call, he made him a sumptuous feast at his own house, to which many of the same profession were also invited. This gave a fresh occasion of offence to the scrupulous Jews, who made some severe complaints of it to his disciples; but Jesus soon silenced their clamour, by assuring them that he was come to call, not the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

AFTER several other miraculous works done during his stay in this place, Jesus departed for Jerusalem to be present at the approaching festival of the passover, where there used to be a great concourse of Jews, who came before-hand to purify themselves against that feast. In this city there was a famous pool or reservoir, adorned with five porches or piazzas, and called in the Hebrew Beth-esdab (R), whose water being at some

(Q) The other evangelists give him only the name of Levi, which was his Jewish name; for he was a Jew, and the son of Alpheus, and native of Galilee. He is therefore thought to have called himself by that of Matthew, which is supposed to have been significant of his profession, to express his grateful sense of his vocation. His chief residence and office was at Capernaum, and there it was that he was called from the profession of a publican, to the dignity of an apostle and evangelist.

He has been highly reflected upon by Porphyry and Julian, surnamed the apostate (43), for thus lightly following a man, whom he had so little knowledge of; but as it is scarce probable that he should live in the same city so long, and not have heard of his doctrine and miracles; so it is rather a wonder he did not become his disciple sooner, considering his great readiness in following him as soon as he was called; but it is likely, he thought his profession was as odious to him, as it was to the Pharisees, and the rest of the Jews, and would prove an obstacle to his reception. But as soon as this gracious invitation had convinced him of the contrary, he sufficiently shewed how ready and glad he was to embrace it, by his forsaking all to follow him.

His being here called the son of Alpheus, has led some ancients (44) into a notion that he was the brother of James, who is also called the son of Alpheus (45); and they have, it seems, been followed in it by the generality of modern Greeks; but there seems to be no foundation for it. The gospel gives us no further particulars concerning him, saving that he continued a faithful disciple of his master; and therefore all we shall venture to add is, that he is universally allowed to have been the first that penned any succinct history of the gospel. He is said to have wrote it at the desire of the apostles, and Jewish converts of Palestine, before his departure from it, to go and preach in the provinces allotted to him (46), about eight or ten years after Christ's resurrection. The last-quoted father tells us, it was written in the Chaldaic-Syriac tongue, which was then the common one, and in Hebrew characters. We refer our readers for the further particulars of it to the controversy lately started about it. As for St. Matthew, he is most commonly believed by ancients and moderns, to have preached the gospel in Peria and Parthia, and to have suffered martyrdom in Caramania, a province then subject to the Parthians.

(R) Probably, as some conjecture from the words בֵּית-חֶסֶד, beth-chesdab, the house of mercy, alluding to the merciful cures which were wrought there on the sick, lame, &c. The vulgate however read it beth-zaida, which some render the Probatic pool, on a supposition that the sheep designed for sacrifice were first washed in it, which sheep so washed, were called Probata. Others, who read it בֵּית-אֶשְׁדָּא, beth-esdab, render it the house of defluxion, from another supposition, that the waters, in which the entrails of the victims offered in the temple, were washed, emptied themselves by a subterranean sewer into this pool or reservoir, whence some have taken it into their heads, that the blood, dung, and other filth of those creatures running along with them, gave that medicinal virtue to the pool. Persons of such witty conceits are seldom solicitous about the character of the sacred historians, or else the evangelists attributing those cures to a miraculous motion of the water, would make them more cautious how they set up a bare conjecture against their testimony.

- a some particular seasons miraculously stirred, had the virtue of curing the first person that jumped into it, of whatever disease he was troubled. Here Jesus beheld among the crouds of sick folk that waited for the motion, a man who had laboured under an incurable palsy thirty-eight years, but for want of some charitable hand to throw him into the water, had hitherto been deprived of the benefit of that place. Jesus, moved with compassion at his misery, healed him by his powerful word, and bid him take up his bed and go to his home. This cure being done on the sabbath-day, Cures a paralytic on the sabbath. gave fresh offence to the Pharisees, who looking upon him as a sabbath-breaker, began to think of putting him to death for it. To disculpate himself, and convince them that works of mercy were so far from being a violation, that they were the proper business of the sabbath, he expressed himself to them in words to this effect: As my Father worketh hitherto, so do I work; intimating thereby, that though God had rested on the seventh day from creating, in memory of which the sabbath had been instituted, yet did he not cease on that day from the work of preservation, which work himself was now imitating, in preserving a number of wretched perishing objects, whose misery claimed his pity and assistance. But the Jews, ever watchful for matter of new accusation against him, instead of admiring his godlike imitation of that ever-benificent Being, accused him of blasphemy for having presumed to call him his father, making himself thereby equal to God. Jesus tried in vain to remonstrate to them, by many convincing arguments, that he had arrogated nothing to himself, but what his miraculous works did evince his undoubted claim to; and by
- b affirming them that they should shortly see greater and more stupendous ones than those wrought by him, such as had never been done since the creation of the world. He tried in vain to convince them from the testimony of the prophets, and other sacred writings, from that of John the Baptist, but especially of his heavenly Father, who had declared him his beloved Son, and had given him moreover such a miraculous power over the whole creation^w. He was at length obliged to silence their false accusation, by reminding them that even the scripture gives the title of gods to mortal men^x. If then, added he, they be called gods, against whom the sentence of mortality had been pronounced by God (S) himself, why should you reckon me guilty of blasphemy, whom the Father has thus sanctified and sent into the world, because I
- c call myself the Son of God?

His defence of it censured by the Jews.

Jesus observing however, how strenuous the blinded Jews were against his doing works of mercy on the sabbath, resolved, if possible, to convince them of their error, by chusing that day to display some of the most signal ones, and exploding their censures by such cogent arguments as they could not gainsay. Accordingly, after his departure out of Jerusalem, he went into one of their synagogues, where there stood a man, St. Jerom says he was a mason, who had a withered hand. He began with asking the Jewish doctors, whether it was lawful on the sabbath, to do good or evil, to save or to destroy, intimating that the omission of the one, when a proper occasion

d offered, was near equivalent to the commission of the other. As they had nothing to answer to this reasoning, they stood silent to let him do as he thought fit; but when he had restored the man's hand, by bidding him to stretch it forth, the ruler of the synagogue, instead of being convinced either by the miracle or argument, in a kind of indignation, fell a censuring those objects of pity for offering themselves to be healed on the sabbath, and not rather on any other day of the week. This strange behaviour extorted a severe rebuke from the meek Jesus; he asked him, whether

The five porches mentioned by St. John, seem to argue this pool to have been built in the form of a pentagon. Eusebius and St. Jerom (47), tell us, that they shewed still in their time a kind of double pool or reservoir, the one of which filled itself every year with rain water, and the other, which retained still a kind of redness, as if from the blood of those victims above-mentioned, which the temple sewer carried into it. The reader may see what has been said of its remains in a former volume †.

(S) This is certainly the meaning of Christ's words here, and not as ours, and other versions render it,

Those unto whom the word of God came. For the place referred to in the psalms is, I have said ye are gods, but ye shall die like men. So that, according to the most literal sense of our Saviour's words, they should run thus: If they are called gods, against (not unto) whom the word of God came forth, meaning this sentence of death. Those that are acquainted with the Hebrew idiom, to which the evangelists were used, know that the context must decide the meaning of those particles, which are capable of several even opposite significations, which the sense alone can determine (48).

they did not think it lawful to help an ox, an ass, or a sheep out of a ditch, or a even to lead them to the water or pasture on that day? An undeniable argument, that they thought it lawful to do good to brutes on the sabbath, and how much more was it to do so unto men? He urged also upon the like occasion the circumcision of children on the sabbath, the priests killing and dressing their victims, and other such-like works, which were usually done on the sabbath, and yet were far from being reckoned a profanation of it.

His disciples censured for plucking the

BUT there had one thing happened to him in the going to that place, in order, as is supposed, to preach at that synagogue, which had already highly exasperated them. One of the evangelists observes^a, that it was the second sabbath after the first^b; when as they were going through some corn fields, his hungry disciples ventured to pluck the ears, and rub them between their hands to eat them. The Pharisaic croud, who beheld this kind of labour with a malicious eye, began to exclaim against their master for suffering it, it being in their opinion a manifest violation of the sabbath. Jesus was forced to excuse it by reminding them of the prophet's words, I (will have or, more properly I) delight in mercy rather than in sacrifice; intimating thereby, that necessity takes away the rigour of the law, and justifying it by the example of David, who, in the like emergency, ventured upon the sacred shew-bread, which was prohibited to all but the priests; and not only eat of it himself, but distributed it among his retinue. Their stubbornness was proof against all that he could urge in their or his own defence, and his silencing of them by such convincing arguments, made them only the more inveterate, till they came at length to a resolution of putting him to death. Jesus having timely notice of their wicked design, withdrew himself towards the sea-coasts, whither he was soon after followed by multitudes from all the maritime parts, and to whom he still extended his wonted compassion, both by his teaching them, and healing their sick.

twelve apostles.

ONE night having withdrawn himself both from them and from his disciples, he went up to a mountain apart, and spent the whole night in prayer; and on the morrow, calling them together again, he chose twelve from among the rest, to be the more immediate witnesses, preachers, and recorders of his life and doctrine; and to whom he gave the title of apostles, which word signifies a messenger or ambassador. The reader may see their names in the margin^b (T). All that we shall say at present of them is, that he did not give them this preference to all the rest, either on account of their great sense or learning, for they were some of the most rude and illiterate; nor for their credit, rank, or high birth; for they were mostly, if not all, poor

(T) These were, 1st, Simon, whom he surnamed Peter, and whom we have mentioned a little higher; and, 2. Andrew his brother; 3. James, surnamed The Greater, an inhabitant of Bethsaida, and John his brother, who were the sons of Zebedee and Salome, often mentioned in the gospel. These as well as Andrew had lately been the baptist's disciples, but had left him to follow Jesus, and on the account of their resolute constancy, or more likely perhaps from that question they asked him; Wilt thou that we command fire from heaven, to consume, &c. (49) were surnamed by him Bonnerges, or the sons of thunder or tempest; that word being only a corruption of the Hebrew בְּנֵי-רָחָם beni-rahm, or rather פְּלִיפִּי phlippi, rahaph; 5. Philip mentioned before; and, 6. Bartholomew, supposed the same with Nathanael; 7. Levi, or Matthew, the publican and evangelist; and, 8. Thomas, surnamed Didymus, which signifies a twin; 9. James distinguished by the name of The Less, and the son of Alphaeus, or Cleophas, and of Mary, the first cousin, if not the sister of the virgin Mary, for which reason he is often called the brother of our Lord; 10. Simon, surnamed The Cananite, from Cana the place of his birth, and Zelotes, probably because he had belonged to that sect; 11. Judas, otherwise called Jude, and brother to James the Less, surnamed also Lebbeus, and Thaddæus; and Judas the traitor, and surnamed Iscariot.

Concerning the surname of this last, there have been various conjectures; some thinking that he was so called from Kerios, a city in the tribe of Judah (50), from which he is supposed to have come; ish in the Hebrew signifying a man. St. Jerom and Eusebius speak of a town in the tribe of Ephraim, called Iscariot (1); others, who make him of the tribe of Issachar, think Iscariot only a corruption or abbreviation of Issachariotes; others fetch their etymologies of it still further. The reader may see them in the vocabularies at the end of the vulgate and other bibles.

Were we to offer our conjecture on such a dark and dry subject, we should rather fetch it from the Hebrew שֵׁשֶׁן-בָּאֵשׁ, ish-chirres, literally the man of the bag, or the bag-bearer. We have formerly observed †, that the proper signification of the word chirres, is a bag, in such a one Naaman is said to have tied his present to Gehazi (2); and St. John acquaints us, that Judas was a thief, and carried the bag: Why might not this nick-name then have been given him on that account by the disciples, when they knew how fond he was of his office, and how unfaithful he was in the discharge of it?

- a fishermen, and either natives or inhabitants of Galilee, the most obscure and despised canton of the Jewish kingdom; much less for their courage, who proved all rank cowards in the time of danger. They had no relish or propensity to his pure and exalted doctrine; for they dreamt of nothing, but of an earthly kingdom, and temporal happiness. In a word, they were in all respects the most unqualified for the great task to which they were appointed, the conversion of the world. But this was a work, which, as a great prophet had long ago foretold ^c, and the apostle has since observed ^d, was to confound the counsels of the wise, swallow up the understanding of the prudent, and defeat the power of the mightiest. We have already seen it in a great measure fulfilled in the person and character of their divine master, and in the circumstances that accompanied his low and humble birth and education, as well as in that vast series of wonders, which he wrought since his entrance into his public ministry. And we shall see the same infinite wisdom display itself still more surprizingly throughout the whole sequel of this chapter.

- In the mean time the wondering crouds flocked to him from all parts of Judea, and the neighbouring provinces, attracted by that divine and efficacious virtue which flowed from him, inasmuch that the bare touch of his garments wrought the most surprizing cures, on the sick, lunatic, demoniacs, and other afflicted persons. He led them therefore one day to a convenient spot of ground (U), where he preached to them that celebrated sermon, commonly known by the name of his sermon upon the mount. We shall not take upon us to repeat it here. The reader may read it in its native, but powerful simplicity, in the places quoted in the margin ^e. All that we shall observe of it is, that he began it with a most comfortable display of the blessed state of those, whom both Jews and Gentiles accounted most miserable; that through the whole course of it, he not only exploded the wretched glosses by which the Jewish doctors had almost obliterated every moral precept of the Mosaic law, but substituted such new and excellent ones of his own, as exalted them to a pitch, which the world till then had neither heard nor dreamed of. To instance in one or two of his precepts amongst the many sublime ones there delivered, how highly had that negative precept been admired by all the wisest heathens, of not doing to others, what we should not desire to be done to us! and yet how vastly short is it of that new and noble one of his, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, that do ye unto them ^f. We observed a little higher, that the Pharisees thought themselves free from guilt, provided they abstained from the very act of sin, though they indulged themselves in every thought, desire, and complacency, that came short of it; but here the ax is laid to the very root, and every sin, even in the least degree of it, condemned, even in the heart. Well might then his ravished audience cry out, that he taught with a power and authority, vastly above what they had observed in the scribes, and Jewish doctors ^g.

- He concluded this excellent discourse with assuring them, that not every one that should call him Lord should enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that performed the divine will, and complied with the precepts he had been delivering to them. For the latter, added he, like the wise man that builds his house on a rock, builds his hopes on a sure foundation; whereas the former, like the fool that builds on the sand, is liable to have them overthrown by every blast, by every wind of doctrine, and by every temptation.

- On his descent from the mount, to return to Capernaum, he was addressed by some of the heads of the city in the behalf of a worthy centurion, from whom their nation had received some signal favours, and whose servant was then very ill of a palsy. Jesus offered to go to his house and heal him; but when the Roman officer heard of it, he sent him an humble message, in which he acknowledged himself equally unworthy

(U) St. Matthew (3) tells us, that he went up into a mountain, and St. Luke (4) hints, that he stood in a plain, or champain place. The difference may probably be smaller than we are aware of. Those mountainous parts have their plains as well as valleys; so that he might only stand on a higher ground than his audience, for the conveniency of being better heard, whilst they stood or sat on the plain ground below him. For St. Luke doth not expressly say, that he preached in the plain; but that he came down to it, to heal those that waited for him.

to receive him under his roof, as he had been to come and offer his request in person, ^a but that he wholly depended on his efficacious word for the cure of his servant; For, added he, if my authority, small as it is, can yet enforce obedience from those under my command, how much more will your all-powerful one be obeyed, where-ever you are pleased to exert it! His singular faith and humility did not go long unrewarded; and Jesus, highly pleased with him, healed his servant at that instant, and greatly commended his faith, as far surpassing all that he had beheld even in Israel; upon which account he took occasion to assure his audience, that many strangers should be admitted from the four corners of the world into his heavenly kingdom, whilst the children of it should be miserably cast out for their disobedience and unbelief ^b. On the day following he went to Naim (W), and, upon his entering the city, he met a large croud of people accompanying the corpse of a young man, the only son of a poor widow, and, in compassion to her, touched the bier, and raised her son to life, whilst the astonished multitude spread forth his fame through all that country, and proclaimed him the prophet sent by God to redeem his people ^c. It was probably at this time that the baptist sent his two disciples to him, of whom we have lately spoken, and upon which Jesus took occasion to censure the unjust judgment which the unbelieving Jews passed upon that more than prophet, and himself: John, said he, was a very abstemious and mortified person, and you cried him down as a demoniac; me, who came in a more sociable and affable way to call sinners to repentance, you represent as a drunkard and glutton; but wisdom will, in spite of your slanders, be still justified by her children ^d. It was upon this account that he so severely upbraided those neighbouring cities, which had been witnesses of his stupendous works, assuring them that their fall would be much more dreadful than that of Sodom and Gomorrab, whom such miracles would have wrought into the deepest repentance ¹. He concluded his discourse with a solemn thanksgiving to his heavenly Father, who, in his infinite wisdom, had chosen the humble and infant-like to impart the mysteries of his gospel to, whilst the proud and conceited worldlings rendered themselves unworthy of them; and with a gracious invitation to all that laboured under their sinful burdens, to come and experience how easy the yoke, and how light was the burden, which he laid on his followers (X).

THIS discourse moved a Pharisee, named Simon, to invite him to take a meal at his house, where he had not been long, before he was accosted by a woman formerly of a loose character, but now a sincere penitent. This woman came behind him in the humblest guise, accompanied with a flood of tears, with which she washed his feet; and having wiped them with her hair, began to anoint his head with a costly perfume

(W) This city was situate in the plain near mount Tabar, and within about two miles of that mountain, and was divided from it by the brook Kedron (5). The same author places it at a small distance from Endor and Scythopolis (6). There was another city of that name in Idumea, where Josephus tells us (7), Simon the son of Gorias made his retreat after he had strongly fortified it.

(X) This is a truth indeed that is best understood from one's own experience; yet as there is not one positive or negative precept of the gospel, that is not excellently adapted to our own exigencies, and founded upon the solidest wisdom, it highly concerns us to listen to this, rather than to our corrupt appetites, which will always make us look upon God as a severe task-master, rather than a kind and skilful physician, whose sole aim is to cure us of our diseases, and to restore our souls to that perfect state of health, which alone can make us happy here or hereafter.

Were we indeed commanded to purchase this desirable state at as dear a rate as the miser doth his gold, the ambitious his rise, the soldier his fame, or the labourer his poor livelihood; though, even here, it would be our highest wisdom to comply with the conditions, since the consequence is of infinitely greater weight; how much more must it be so, when every duty is not only easier and more worthy of a rational soul, but absolutely necessary to fit us for that happiness for which we were created!

Let those therefore, whom a wrong bias has warped into a prejudice against christian duties, but view them with an impartial eye; and the more they consider them, the more they will be convinced of this truth, that they are so far from being the arbitrary impositions of a supreme Being, that there is not one positive one, but is as necessary to the soul, as food is to the body; nor a negative one, that is not as expedient as abstinence from gross food is to a man in a high fever, or from drink to one in a tympany; but with this sure and comfortable advantage, that the divine grace and assistance here promised, will remove all difficulties and discouragements, and make every part easy and pleasant; so that our own happy experience, which it is our fault if we fall short of, added to God's infallible word, will make religion yield us the truest happiness we can be capable of in this life, as well as the glorious assurance of a better in the next.

- a she had brought with her. A sight so shocking to the proud Pharisee filled his head with a strange notion, that, if his guest were a prophet, he would of course have spurned such a notorious sinner from him; but Jesus, whose peculiar character it was not to break a bruised reed, or quench the least good spark^m, but rather blow it into a flame, viewed her with a more compassionate and unerring eye, and dismissed her with an answer as full of comfort, as her heart was of the sincerest repentance and love. Neither did he let his host go unanswered or unsatisfied; but, by a fit and pathetic parable, made him pronounce her a more worthy object of his mercy and regard, than all his own pretended sanctity and hospitality could intitle him to (Y)ⁿ.

- UPON his return to Capernaum, he was followed with such throngs of people, on account of his continual miracles, particularly the cure of a poor demoniac, deaf and blind, which he had just then wrought, that his mother and relations fearing, lest he should be stifled (Z) by the croud, came to disengage him from it. As they could not get into the house for the throng, they sent to desire him to come to them; but when it was told him, that they stood without, desiring to speak to him, he told the audience, that none were more nearly related to him, than those who came to him to hear the will of God, and practise it. In the mean time, whilst his miracle on the demoniac had extorted an open confession from the better part of the by-standers, the Pharisees, moved with their usual indignation, cried out, that he cast out devils by Beelzebub the prince of devils†. Jesus easily confuted that slander, by shewing the folly of supposing Satan so far divided against his own interest; and that nothing but a superior power to his, could force him to it; but, to assure them farther of the fatal danger of such malicious and impious suggestions, he added, that tho' every sin or blasphemy against the Son of man would, upon due repentance, be forgiven, yet that those against the Holy Ghost should find no forgiveness either in this or the next world (A); and therefore he concluded with this warning, that men would give a

(Y) None of the evangelists has told us where this last scene happened. Our Lightfoot and some others think it was in Bethany, a city of Judaea; and that the Simon here mentioned, is the same with Simon the leper mentioned by the two other evangelists above-quoted, to which our bibles refer as a parable; but it doth not appear that this woman was the Mary mentioned by St. John; and we find our Saviour immediately after in Galilee working of miracles, followed by a great multitude, particularly by some pious women, who attended on him, and anointed him with their perfumes, whilst he was taken up with his ministry.

These were Mary Magdalen, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel; Johanna, the wife of Chusa, Herod's steward; Susanna, and some others, who became part of his holy college.

(Z) So the word ought to be properly rendered, and not, as ours and most versions do, that he was beside himself (8).

(A) It is neither our design nor province to repeat here, either the various opinions of divines concerning the nature of this sin, or the dreadful effects which a wrong notion of it has caused among weak and melancholy christians, especially among some sectaries in the predestinarian system. It might indeed be of greater comfort to insert some of those elaborate expositions, which confine that sin to those Jews only, who made so perverse a judgment of Christ's miracles, against the light of reason and conscience; but as we cannot come into that notion, so neither would we lead our readers into it.

A late critic (9) has endeavoured to take away all the difficulty, by affirming, that what we render blasphemy, or sin against the Son of man, means no more than the offences which one man commits against another. But if none but such are to be forgiven, and those against the Holy Ghost, or, as he understands it, against God, are either wholly excluded, or, at best, will, with great difficulty, be pardoned, it is to be feared we are left in a more woe-ful case than that out of which he endeavoured to extricate us; but who doth not see, that whenever Christ speaks of the Son of man, he always means himself and not man in general?

Might we presume so far as to give our opinion of this sin, it would be this, that every slander or blasphemy committed against Christ whilst upon earth, and his divine mission as yet wanting some of its most authentic evidence, should be capable of pardon; but after these last seals of his mission were superadded, viz. his resurrection from the dead, ascension, and effusion of the Holy Ghost, attended, as it was, with such miraculous gifts, such as prophecy, gift of tongues, miracles, and the like; there remained no excuse for unbelief, and consequently no forgiveness either to the present or future generation of the Jews, who should obstinately persist in it, nor indeed to any other persons or nations, who should reject the glorious light and evidence of his gospel when offered unto them.

This may be thought to lean a little hard against our modern unbelievers; but let them consider, whether the pretended grounds on which they reject the gospel, bear any proportion in point of evidence with those upon which we believe and embrace it; and if they do not, as all their united force never could, nor, we may safely add, never will be able to prove they do, let them lay the blame at the right door. Now, the gospel plainly tells us, that nothing but faith in Christ, accompanied with a sincere repentance, can obtain us the pardon of our sins; how should they then hope for it, who have neither the one nor the other to intitle them to it. Hence, we think, it plainly follows, that this is that only unpardonable sin pointed out by our Saviour. See the next note but one.

severe account for every pernicious or hurtful (B) word at the day of judgment. Here ^a the Pharisees, being stung to the heart, began, according to their usual custom, to ask him for a more convincing sign of his divine mission; but he left them with this remarkable answer, that since those he had already shewed them were not able to convince them, there should be no other or greater given them than that of Jonah; for as that prophet was three days and nights in the fish's belly, so should the Son of man be as many in the bowels of the earth, or grave, and rise again on the third (C) ^p.

FROM thence he went to the sea-shore, still followed with great multitudes, and being got into a boat, he began to teach them again, not indeed in the manner he had lately upon the mount, but by a more familiar way, and more suitable to their gross understanding; namely, by parables, such as were very well known and understood ^b by all the eastern nations, and not (as ours and other versions sadly intimate) that they might be lost upon his ignorant audience; but as we have spoke fully on this important point in a former volume, we shall desire our readers to turn to the place *. When he had finished his discourse, he ordered his disciples to get him a ship to cross the sea of Galilee, into the territories of Philip the tetrarch, Herod's brother. Before he entered into the ship, there came some men who expressed a desire to become his disciples, and follow him. One of them in particular just begged, that he might go and bury his dead father; and another to go bid farewell to his relations and friends. To the first of these he answered, Let the dead, such namely as are so to the hopes of a future life, perform that office ^q, and come thou and preach that eternal life ^c which I am come to bring to light; but to the second he gave this severe rebuke, that such a retrospection as he expressed after those worldly considerations, was wholly inconsistent with the character of one of his disciples, whose mind and heart should be so fixed on the concerns of another life, as to be wholly indifferent to all besides; and so bid him follow without delay ^r.

Still, the winds and sea.

BEING entered into the ship, whether to refresh himself from the fatigues of the day, or to try his disciples faith, and manifest his own power, he withdrew himself into the stern, and there fell asleep. There arose soon after such a furious storm of wind as was like to have overset them, and made them run to him, and awake him, crying, Master, save us, else we perish. Jesus, seeing them in such consternation, blamed ^d their pusillanimity and want of faith; then, with his powerful word, rebuked the wind and sea, which immediately obeyed. When his disciples and the rest of the company had beheld their danger and deliverance, they came and threw themselves, trembling, at his feet, wondering, as well they might, what kind of man he was, who could command those unruly elements to be so quickly calmed; soon after which they landed on the other side, in the country of the Gergasenes (D) ^s.

(B) That this is certainly the plain import of the phrase πῶτα ἀπόρρον, which ours and other versions render idle or unprofitable word, appears from what goes before, that they proceed from an evil heart, which is therefore no more capable of producing better, than a corrupt tree can bear other than bad fruit (10).

(C) This saying confirms what we lately, and elsewhere before observed, that the resurrection of Christ was to give the finishing stroke to the evidence of his mission. Before that, if his other miracles had convinced them that he was the Messiah, they would not have put him to that shameful death, which yet it was decreed and foretold he should undergo; and it is upon this account that St. Peter excuses that atrocious deed, as being done through ignorance. But after this his resurrection was proved by so many irrefragable tokens, those who rejected him became inexcusable, and made way for the Gentiles, who embraced christianity. All which the reader may be fully satisfied of, by comparing, among a great number of others, the places quoted in the margin (11).

There are two difficulties started against what Christ here says of himself and Jonah, the one, that whatever the latter might be, Christ was far enough from being three days and three nights in the grave; and this has made some affirm, that he must have been crucified on the Thursday, and not on the Friday. But the objection will easily vanish, when we observe, that, according to the Hebrew idiom, the particle וְעַד and, is often used for or, and that it may, and ought properly, be rendered three days or nights.

The other is from the impossibility of a whale's swallowing up of a man whole, seeing the diameter of its swallow, when stretched at farthest, is little above three inches. To which it is rightly answered, that the word here used signifies no more a whale than any other large fish that has fins; and that there is one commonly known in the Mediterranean by the name of charachias and lamia, of the bigness of a whale, but with such a large throat and belly, as is able to swallow the largest man whole. There was one of this kind caught within these twenty or more years, on the coasts of Portugal, in whose throat, when stretched out, a man could stand upright. We may add, that the word used in Jonah is דַּגְּגָדֹל daggadol, a great fish.

(D) So the Greek manuscripts of St. Matthew have it. Those of the other evangelists call them Gadarenes. Some read Gergasenes, which makes it very difficult

- a HERE he was met by two demoniacs, so very fierce, one especially more than the other, that no chains could confine them; but they chose their habitation among the tombs, and made it unsafe to pass by that way, till the sight of Jesus brought them trembling at his feet, where the devils began to acknowledge him to be the Son of God, and besought him not to torment them before their time. Our Saviour beheld the poor possessed with his wonted pity, and asked the most furious of them, What was his name? and was answered, Legion, because a multitude of those evil spirits had taken possession of him. These therefore besought him, that, if he cast them out, he would permit them to migrate into the neighbouring herd of swine; which being permitted, the whole herd was immediately seen to tumble headlong down into the sea, to the number of two thousand, whilst the two poor objects were restored to their health and senses (E). The news of this singular miracle were presently spread through that whole region, and brought vast multitudes to the place; where they beheld with wonder the two men clothed, and in their right minds; but whether through fear, lest any ill consequence should attend the loss of the swine, or, which is as likely, lest they should receive some further or more grievous punishment from him, they meekly besought him to depart their coasts; which he readily complied with.

- UPON his return to Capernaum, he was addressed by the sorrowful ruler of the synagogue, whose daughter, about twelve years of age, was then expiring, and followed him to the house, attended, as usual, with numerous crowds, among which was a poor woman, who had laboured a long time under an unnatural hemorrhagy, and consumed her substance in seeking for the vain help of the physicians. She had such a strong faith in the world's Saviour, that she thought the bare touch of his skirt would give her an immediate cure; and so it really did, but not without being perceived by him; for notwithstanding his being so thronged by the multitude, he knew, by the virtue that was gone out of him, that somebody had touched him, and inquired of his wondering disciples, who it was? The woman, finding, by this question, that she could not go undiscovered, fell trembling at his feet, and owned herself the blessed object of his miraculous power, and had this gracious answer superadded to her cure, Daughter, be of good comfort, thy faith hath made thee whole (F). By this time they were come so near the ruler's house, that they could hear the mournful tunes and cries that were made over the dead damsel, who had expired in the interim; and difficult to know the situation of this canton, or of the city from which it took its name. Origen (12) thinks the name of the city to be neither Gedara nor Gerasa, since none of those two cities were near any sea or lake, but Gergesa, situate on that of Genesareth or Tiberias, where they shewed still in his time the rocky declivities, from which the swine were hurried down into the water. If so, that place might still retain its name from the Girgashites, ancient inhabitants of Canaan, of whom we have spoken in a former volume*.

This canton, where-ever it was, must have been inhabited partly by heathens, which is the reason of the herd of swine being suffered to feed in that neighbourhood, which was not permitted in any place where they were all Jews, because that creature is forbid by the Mosaic law (13).

(E) Those who pretend to censure this miracle, as a wrong done to the owners, would do well to consider how they question the justice and authority of a person, who had given such irrefragable proofs of both. Had the evangelists supposed any men capable of such a presumption, it is likely they might have given us such reasons for this action, as would have stopped their mouths.

If the owners of the swine were of that kind of apostate Jews, of whom we have had frequent occasion to speak in some former sections, the punishment must be allowed to have been rather too mild than too severe. If they were Romans, Syrians, or of any other nation, they were still guilty of a breach of faith to the Jews, who, though under a foreign yoke, were to be governed by their own laws; so that they might as well have introduced some of their idols into that country, as herds of a creature forbid by their law, and abhorred by the whole nation.

However, if the singularity of the miracle proved a means to convert them to christianity, that was abundantly sufficient to repay their loss; and it is perhaps for this reason that Jesus would not suffer the cured persons to follow him to the other side, but bid them stay in their own country, to be standing monuments of his miraculous power and goodness; and that the change he had wrought in them was not a transient action, done by some delusion or fascination, but a permanent and real, and consequently miraculous cure.

(F) Eusebius tells us, that the woman, out of gratitude, erected a brass statue to her miraculous physician, in which she was carved kneeling behind him, and laying her hand on the skirt of his coat. The story is much questioned, and if ever there was any such monument of this miracle, she can hardly be supposed to have been in a capacity of rearing it, because St. Mark and St. Luke tell us, that she had spent all her substance on physicians; so that it must have been done by some of the inhabitants of Caesarea Philippi, of which city Eusebius says she was.

Jesus,

Jesus, who beheld with pity his paternal grief, bid him not fear, but firmly believe; ^a and entering the house with him, and with two or three only of his disciples, ordered the mourners to cease their doleful music, since the child was only asleep; but, whilst these derided him, he took Peter, James and John, with the girl's father, into the upper room, and taking her by the hand, bid her rise; which she immediately did [•]. This miracle did still the more increase his fame, notwithstanding all his prudent cautions to prevent it (G).

Comes to Nazareth.

He soon left Capernaum, to go and revisit his ungrateful city Nazareth, and, in his way thither, cured two poor blind men. He went, as usual, into their synagogue, and preached to them with such powerful eloquence, as astonished the whole audience; but they, remembering the meanness of his education and parentage, were offended at him, instead of admiring him the more for it. This stubbornness of theirs ^b prevented his working any signal miracles there; so that he contented himself with healing such sick persons as offered themselves in his way, and departed, never to visit them again. By this time Sejanus having been put to death at Rome, and Tiberius been undeceived with regard to the false accusations of that hellish minister against the Jews, sent orders to all his governors to have them treated with greater mildness, as we observed a little higher out of Philo; and Tacitus [•] observes thereupon, that they enjoyed a long peace under that emperor; which could mean no more, than that they neither disturbed his government, nor he their tranquility; but they were at this time in too great a ferment among themselves to be properly said to have been at peace. But these intestine feuds of theirs were beneath the notice of a Roman historian, if he knew any thing of them; for these troubled themselves no farther about ^c what was done in foreign provinces, than the interest or fame of their commonwealth was concerned in it; and this, as a judicious historian of our own observes [•], is probably the reason why they are so silent about the glorious transactions of these three last years of our Saviour's life.

Sends his apostles to preach.

We are now come to the third year of his public ministry, which he began with making a thorough progress through all the cities of Galilee; where beholding, with his wonted compassion, the multitudes that followed him every-where, and how few the labourers were in comparison of the plentiful harvest in view, he sent his twelve apostles, two and two, to preach also through all that country. To qualify them for this high office, he endowed them with his own miraculous gifts, commanding them to ^d dispense them with the same gratuitous liberality as they had received them, and at the same time forbidding them to incur themselves with any worldly conveniences, but depend upon providence for a supply and reward worthy their charitable labour. He reminded them however, that they must not expect it so much in this life as in the next; for, added he, I send you as lambs among wolves; and since you have been witnesses of the ill returns which I have met with from this blind and ungrateful generation, you must not expect to fare better than your master; but rather rejoice to be, like him, despised, rejected and persecuted; for they will hurry you many a time to the judgment-seat, and inflict many a grievous punishment on you; but be not terrified at it, nor solicitous what answer you shall make to their puzzling and ^e ill-natured questions; for ye shall be endued with such wisdom at those times, as all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay [•]. In other cases, remember always to

(G) Christ often injoining secrecy to the persons whom he cured, has been censured by some of our unbelievers, as unreasonable, and contrary to the design for which they were wrought, the proving of his divine mission. But he had several cogent reasons for preventing his miracles being too much blazed abroad, at least till after his resurrection; one of which was most probably, that he might not hasten the effects, as well as aggravate the guilt, of the Pharisaic malice, which, he knew, was to fall on him, before he had gone through every part of his work.

But there was a much greater motive to have these miracles concealed for the present; for the multitudes, who had already beheld so great a number of them, had conceived such notions of his being the Messiah, that upon his feeding five thousand persons with a few loaves, they made a bold push to take him by force to make him a king (14); so that he was obliged to withdraw himself from them into some private mountain. Such attempts might therefore have proved of dangerous consequence, either by causing an insurrection, and bringing the civil power upon him; all which, and many others of the like nature, were opposite to his design, and the scheme of providence concerning the time, nature and manner of his death.

- a join the innocence of the dove to the cautiousness of the serpent (H). Blessed indeed will be the case of those who receive you and your doctrine; but miserable and dreadful, beyond that of Sodom and Gomorrab, shall be the fate of those who reject you: And as for yourselves, depend upon it, that he, without whose permission not a sparrow falls to the ground, will be still your sure guide and protector¹. With these excellent gifts and instructions they departed, whilst Jesus tarried still at or in the neighbourhood of Capernaum, where he heard, about this time, the news of the baptist's death, mentioned a little higher, and whither his disciples soon after returned, and with no small joy acquainted him with the success of their late mission².

- Herod all this while had only laid his conscious fears asleep by the death of his b troublesome monitor, which were soon awaked again at the fame of Jesus, whom he supposed to be that prophet risen from the dead, whilst others took him for Elias, or some other of the ancient prophets. This obliged him to withdraw himself, with his disciples, into a desert place, where he was however followed by a great multitude, and taught them there. The day being far spent, and victuals being scarce in such a place, Jesus, unwilling to send them away fasting and faint, made the troops sit down in a convenient place, and having blessed his mean and scanty provision, which consisted in all of five barley loaves and a few small fishes, multiplied, and distributed it amongst them; and, after they had all eaten to satiety, his disciples were ordered to gather the remaining fragments, and filled twelve baskets with them, c over and above what had been eaten by the multitude, which amounted to five thousand men, besides women and children. This stupendous miracle made them look upon him as the promised Messiah. They therefore were consulting to have made him king by main force; but, as soon he perceived it, he resolved to convey himself far enough out of their reach^b. He bid therefore his disciples to cross over the lake towards Bethsaida, whilst he stayed to dismiss the people, after which he was to follow them. Whilst they were on the water, he withdrew into a retired part of the mountain, to spend some part of the night in prayer. The wind being then contrary, and very fierce, hindered them from reaching the shore; but whilst they were rowing and toiling in vain, Jesus came towards them, about the fourth or last watch of the d night, walking on the boisterous waves, and made as if he would pass by them; at which they gave a hideous cry, supposing that they had seen what the Jews call a mazik or spectre of the worst kind, concerning whose power of doing mischief their rabbies tell us wonders too absurd to deserve a place here^c. Jesus soon recovered them of their fright, by assuring them that it was he; but Peter, between doubt and surprize, answered him, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come to thee on the water; and being permitted, ventured to walk towards him. A sudden gust of wind having swelled the surges, and his faith beginning to fail, he found himself sinking, and cried out to his master for help. Jesus stretched forth his hand to save him, upbraided his want of faith, and led him into the boat, where himself being also entered, there e followed a calm, and they were agreeably surprized soon after, with the sight of the wished-for shore^d. Here he was again met by innumerable multitudes, who brought to him their diseased from all parts to be cured. Among them were a great number of those whom he had lately so miraculously fed, who had missed him, and came seeking after him, and expressed a more than ordinary joy when they had found him. Jesus however blamed their untimely diligence, because it did not so much proceed from a love to his doctrine, or from an earnest desire after that eternal happiness which he preached to them, as from the temporal advantages which they expected from his carnal reign, as they believed him to be the Messiah. He therefore exhorted them to seek after those more spiritual ones, which he was come to ten-

(H) That seems the most obvious sense of the Greek πονηρος, and not wife, as most versions render it. We have elsewhere shewed upon what account that creature is ironically called cunning and crafty in several parts of the scripture, and refer our readers to what has been said there†. But here our der to them. This unexpected turn had a strange effect upon them, inasmuch that a they, who, at the first sight of his late miracle, had cried him up for the great deliverer promised by *Moses, began now to question him, and to ask for some fresh and surer tokens of his being so. Moses, they said, had proved his mission, by giving their forefathers manna from heaven; but as for him, he had done nothing like it for them, but only talked of his coming down from heaven, tho' they knew him to be the son of Joseph and Mary, and promised them no other food and drink than that of his body and blood, which was still a stranger and more offensive doctrine. Jesus tried in vain to persuade them, that these were not so imaginary or unnatural food as they apprehended, but such a real and efficacious one, as could alone fit them for, and raise them to a happy immortality. All these, and several other spiritual topics, served only to convince them, that he was not the Messiah they wanted, and were taught to expect; so that the greatest part of them forsook him from that very hour. Jesus was nothing less than surprised at this defection, which, he observed to his disciples, was owing to a want of such a true disposition of mind, as nothing could work in them, but the miraculous grace of his heavenly father, since nothing less than that could rectify the carnal warp, which their prejudices had given to their minds. He addressed himself next to his disciples, to know of them, whether they felt any inclination to leave him, as the rest had done? To whom Peter gave this glorious answer in the name of the twelve, Lord, whither, or to whom should we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life, and we are now fully assured, that thou art the Christ, the son of the living God. Jesus took occasion here to hint to them, that he had indeed chosen them twelve, but that one of them was a devil, meaning Judas Iscariot, who was to betray him†, tho' he continued to follow him with the rest (1).

confession.

THESE things happened a little before the third passover after his entrance into his ministry; for the evangelists hints, that that festival was at hand; but whether Jesus went up to it, or stayed in Galilee, is no where expressly said. Only the former is most probable, not only from his constant and zealous attendance on all other festivals, but because his absence at this time, on any pretence, might have shewn an ill precedent to his disciples, and given the Pharisees an occasion of scandal and accusation. But, if he went up to Jerusalem, he did it so privately, and stayed so short a time there, by reason of the plots which the heads of the Jews had laid against his life,

* Conf. DEUT. xviii. 15. JOHN vi. 14, & 30, & seq. † JOHN vi. 30, ad fin. ‡ Ibid. ver. 4.

(1) The choice of this traitor into the apostolic college was not without a manifest providence, not only as he was thereby to fulfil that prophecy, that Christ should be betrayed by one of that number (15), but as his character and actions justified the admission of him into it. It is plain from what Christ says here of him, and the apostles elsewhere, that his offering himself a candidate for the apostleship was wholly from sinister motives, and this made him put in presently after for the office of treasurer.

On the other hand, he saw enough to have made him a true convert to Christ and his heavenly doctrine; for he not only was a witness to all his stupendous works, and excellent sermons, but was, like the rest, endued with the same miraculous power, and christian knowledge; so that if he continued in the same hellish disposition of mind, it was not out of any doubt concerning either the miracles or doctrine, much less from any knowledge, or even suspicion he could possibly harbour, that his master was acting some grand imposture; for had either of these been the case, he would have been so far from hanging himself out of remorse for his treachery, that he would have gloried in the action, and justly too. The great horror therefore which he expressed for his guilt, and his desperate end, when he saw him unjustly condemned by the sanhedrim, could proceed from nothing else but a full conviction, that the person whom he had thus betrayed was the true

Messiah, that his miracles were real, and his doctrine altogether divine.

If it be asked, how a man, under such conviction, could act such a perfidious deed? it may be answered, that he did it in a fit of anger and resentment, when he disdainfully beheld the profusion of a precious ointment bestowed on his master, which, he thought, might have been better sold for three hundred pence, and put into his bag (16). He might perhaps not foresee all the ill consequences of his treachery, but might suppose, either that the sanhedrim would acquit him, or that he would work some signal miracle to extricate himself out of their hands; so that when he found it quite otherwise, it threw him into that horrid despair and madness in which he died.

We shall have occasion in the sequel to speak more fully of the nature of his death. In the meantime we beg leave to observe, after an eminent critic, an error which has crept into most translations concerning him, which seems to intimate as if there had been some worse place than ordinary appointed for him in the other world on account of his crime. The words run thus in the version (17), Lord,—show whether of these two thou hast chosen, that he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go into his own place. Whereas these last words ought more properly to be rendered, that he, viz. the person now to be chosen, may go into his (that is, Judas's) place, that is, may fill his vacant office (18).

a that it was not known to them till he was gone back into Galilee, where we find him presently after ^b. It is at this passover that Pilate is supposed to have made such a severe example of the rebellious Galileans or Gaulonites, whose blood he mingled with their sacrifices, as they were performing their devotions in the temple ^c; the news of which being afterwards brought to Jesus, as well as the misfortune of those eighteen men, whom a tower in that metropolis, named Siloam, crushed to death, he assured them, that neither of them came to such a dreadful end, because they were greater sinners than the rest; but that without a speedy repentance, they should all share in some such-like dreadful fate.

THE feast being over, the scribes and Pharisees, who missed him there, sent some b of their spies after him to watch his words and actions, and to catch some matter of accusation against him. The first thing these laid hold on was his and his disciples eating with unwashed hands, contrary to the traditions of the ancients, and the constant custom of the Pharisaic sect. Jesus easily exploded this accusation, by shewing them the hypocrisy of cleansing the hands, dishes, and other vessels, whilst their hearts, which did most want it, were carelessly left in all their filth of rapine, deceit, and other real defilements. But he went further to show the mischiefs arising from too close an adherence to those traditions, a great part of which, though plainly opposite to the divine law, were yet preferred to it in point of authority and observance. He instanced in several particulars, especially that abominable one, by which they had
c made void the only command with a promise, that of children honouring and succouring their parents ^d. He not only showed them the impiety of some, but the unreasonableness and stupidity of others of those traditions; such as those that absolved a man that swore by the temple, but not him that swore by the gold of the temple, or him that swore by the altar, though not him that swore by the gift that was on it; though, as he justly observed to them, it was the temple that sanctified the gold, and the altar that sanctified the gift. These severe reflections did so much the more gravel these Pharisaic spies, as they seemed to come down to the capacity of the meanest of his audience, and could not but inspire the people with a singular contempt for those expounders of the law, as well as with a great veneration for himself.

To avoid therefore the persecutions which were likely to be raised against him from that quarter, he withdrew himself towards the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into a house privately, being unwilling to be known there; but it was soon beset by a great number of sick folk, who flocked to him to be cured. Among these was a Pagan woman (K), who yet addressed him with the title of Lord, and Son of David, and earnestly intreated him in behalf of her daughter, who was tormented with a devil. Jesus at first seemed so far to overlook her, that his disciples begged of him either to grant her suit, or dismiss her with a denial. The woman, becoming thereupon more importunate, received this unexpected repulse from him, that it was not fit e to deprive the children of their bread, to cast it unto dogs; but she, nothing discouraged at so mortifying an answer, threw herself at his feet, and owned herself indeed unworthy of a child's portion; but at the same time humbly expostulated with him, that the whelps were permitted to feed on the crumbs that fell from their master's table. Jesus highly commended her singular faith, and pronounced her daughter healed; and the woman highly satisfied with his promise, returned home, where she found her daughter sitting on the bed, and perfectly cured ^f.

SHORTLY after this, Jesus went more eastwards towards the head of Jordan, and took a progress through Decapolis (L), where, among other miraculous cures, he gave speech and hearing to a man born deaf and dumb, insomuch that the astonished multitude cried out, That he had done all things well, and made the deaf to hear, and the

dumb to speak^m. He was followed by the multitude from thence into some desert mountain, where he tarried three days with them, teaching them, and healing all their sicknesses, of whatever kind. But as they had brought no sufficient quantity of provisions, Jesus pitying their case, and being unwilling to send them away empty, signified his design to his disciples; and finding they had still seven loaves, and a few fishes, he multiplied both, as he had done before, into a sufficient quantity, to satiate four thousand men, besides women and children; and seven baskets full, which the disciples gathered of the remaining fragmentsⁿ; after which he dismissed the multitude, and crossed the lake of Tiberias towards the south-east parts of Magdala or Dalmanutha (M). Here he was accosted again by some of the Pharisees and Sadducees, who came to ask of him a sign; to whom having answered as formerly, that they should have no other but that of the prophet Jonah, he sailed back, and left them to make the application. In their passage, he bid his disciples beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, which caution gave them a strange kind of an alarm, because they had forgot to take some provision with them; but after he had put them in mind of his two late miracles on the loaves, they came at length to understand, that the leaven he forewarned them against, was the pernicious doctrines of those two sects^o. Upon his landing at Bethsaida, the native place of some of his disciples, a blind man was brought to him to be restored to his sight. Jesus could not refuse his help to such objects; but as he had received such ungrateful returns from the people of that city for the many miracles he had wrought among them^p, he was unwilling to aggravate their guilt by fresh ones. Taking therefore the blind man with him out of the town, he restored him to his sight, and bid him go directly to his home, without entering into the city again^q.

BEING come to the borders of Syria, in the neighbourhood of Cæsarea Philippi, a city built by Philip the tetrarch of that canton, the son of Herod the Great, as was hinted a little higher; he began to question his disciples, who had by this time been about a year chosen into the apostleship, what the Jews commonly thought of him? Being answered, that he was supposed by some to be John the Baptist, by others Elias, or some other prophet, he asked them, what their own opinion was of him? To this Peter answered for himself, as well as for the rest, whose judgment concerning him he could not but know, and affirmed him positively to be the Messiah, the Son of God. It was upon this noble confession that Christ surnamed him Peter, or Rock, and promised him upon that rock to build his church, to give him the keys of his heavenly kingdom, and the power of binding and loosing; so that which of the two sentences he pronounced upon earth, should be ratified in heaven. But he charged him and the rest of his colleagues not to let it be so much as whispered abroad, that he was the Messiah or Christ, till he was risen from the dead^r.

(M) It is not easy to know whether these be two names of the same place, or two different ones, nor to guess where their situation was, only some where upon the coasts of the sea of Tiberias. For so much St. Mark intimates, when he says, that Jesus crossing that sea, came to Dalmanutha (20); and St. Matthew speaking of the same thing, says, he came to the coasts of Magdala (21). Some manuscripts of this last have Magedan and Magdan instead of Magdala. This makes it next to impossible to guess with any probability at their situation; for which reason we shall refer those who have a mind to know the conjectures of the learned, to the authors quoted in the margin (22).

The last-quoted author supposes Dalmanutha to be the same with Medan, a pleasant place near the Phiala, or spring of the Jordan, where a kind of fair is kept, and much resorted to all the summer.

Hegesippus, it seems, calls that place Melda and Meldan, from which he thinks Dalman to be a corruption, by degrees stretched out into Dalmanutha. This is going very far for an etymology, and yet it is by far the best we have met with, and perhaps nearer than that of our learned Hammond, who takes it to be the Meggiddo mentioned by the prophet (23), and famous for the death of two Jewish kings, Ahaziah and Josiah (24).

Magdala is a corruption of the Hebrew Migdol, signifying a high tower. There might be many places of that name in Judæa, as well as in the neighbouring provinces; and if this Medan or Meldan was the same with Dalmanutha, then Magdala may have been some famous tower or land-mark leading to it, or some strong castle or fortress belonging to it. All which is at best but conjecture.

a FROM this time finding their faith so well founded, he began to open a mystery to them, which they little dreamed of, but which it was high time for them to be acquainted with; namely, that of his sufferings and death at Jerusalem. Peter, thunder-struck, as it were, at such an unexpected discovery, could not forbear crying out, Lord, far be it from thee, that ever any such thing should befall thee; but he presently received such a severe rebuke from him, as gave him to understand that he was but a novice in the doctrines of man's redemption and self-denial. He took therefore that fair opportunity to rid them of all their prejudices concerning a temporal kingdom, and to assure them that there was no way for them, or any other of his disciples, to enter into his heavenly one, but by treading in his steps, and going from the cross to that glorious crown, which waited for them at the end of their race. He concluded this sorrowful discourse with assuring them, that some of those that were there present should not see death, till they had seen the beginnings of this his kingdom powerfully displayed before them^(N). But as he had given such a kind of foretaste of his sufferings and death, as could not but make a deep effect upon them, considering that they had always looked on him as the restorer of the kingdom of Israel, and continued to do so even after his resurrection[†]; he thought fit to give some of the most intimate of them a specimen of his future glory.

c THESE were Peter, and James and John, whom he took up with him to an exceeding high mountain, generally believed to have been mount Tabor or Thabor, described in a former volume[†], and was there transfigured before them. This happened whilst he was at prayer[‡], when they suddenly beheld a lustre darting from his face, outshining even that of the sun. His garments contracted a splendid whiteness, exceeding that of snow. Moses and Elias appeared immediately after, in all the brightness of their glorified state, and conferred with him about the sufferings and death which he was shortly to undergo at Jerusalem, and for which he was to be exalted above every name in heaven or earth[¶]. During this extraordinary intercourse, the three apostles, whether overpowered with the heavenly vision, and fallen into a kind of trance; or whether it happened at night, when their eyes were used to be closed with sleep; they found themselves in a kind of slumber for some time, from which being at length recovered, they beheld the glory, wherewith their master, and his two heavenly visitors, were surrounded; and Peter, in a kind of ecstatic surprize, cried out, Lord, how good is it for us to be here! Let us make three tabernacles, one for you, one for Moses, and the third for Elias (O), being scarcely sensible of what he said. Their surprize increased, when they found themselves surrounded by a bright luminous cloud; soon after which they heard a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: bear ye him. At these words they remained prostrate on the ground, struck with wonder and amazement, till their master came, and raised them up; when upon their looking about, they were surprized to find him alone, and in his usual dress and appearance^{*}.

e THEY came down soon after to rejoin the rest of their company, and in the way, Jesus gave Peter and his two associates a strict charge to conceal the vision, till he was risen from the dead. These last words caused a fresh question among them, what the expression of his rising from the dead should mean? for, it seems, they could not yet persuade themselves of what he had so lately told them concerning his death at Jerusalem. However, they took care not to speak of his transfiguration till after his resurrection. St. Peter, by his second epistle, which he wrote a little before his own death[‡],

(N) Accordingly, he gave them soon after several sure indices of it: First, in his glorious transfiguration, then in his resurrection, ascension, in the wonderful change that was wrought on them by the descent of the Holy Ghost, when they came to see and taste of that spiritual kingdom which they had before but the most imperfect notion of; in the success of the gospel, through the greatest part of the world, in spite of all the opposition of the Jews and Gentiles; and lastly, in the dreadful vengeance

he took against the former, by the arms and power of the latter, according to his formal prediction of that last catastrophe. All which will be best seen in the sequel.

(O) Bede informs us (25), that in consideration of this request of the apostle, the christians in after-times built three sumptuous churches on the top of that mount, which were had in great reverence, and very much resorted to by the devout pilgrims.

appears to have retained still the most lively impression of it, by that short, but elegant description he gives of it there², though he owns at the same time the evidence which is drawn from the testimony of the prophets to be superior to it. By that time they were got to the foot of the mountain, where a great multitude, and among them some Pharisees, waited for them, and had had no small strife with those disciples of his, whom Jesus had left behind him; before he could well inquire into the occasion of their dispute, a man pressed through the croud, and fell prostrate at his feet, and implored his assistance in the behalf of his son, who was miserably tormented with a dumb demon, by whom he was sometimes hurried into the fire, and at other times into the water, and was become such a dismal object of pity, that he had brought him to his disciples, but that they had not been able to give him any relief. Jesus, moved with the deepest compassion at this doleful story, could not forbear upbraiding both his disciples, and the whole Jewish generation, with their want of faith; and to convince them the more powerfully of it, ordered the child to be brought before him; and whilst he was in the strongest convulsions and agonies, and his sorrowful father beseeching him in most moving terms, only returned him this answer, that if he could believe, the cure of his son would be easily performed. At these words the father immediately cried out, Lord, I believe; supply my unbelief; and Jesus rebuking the evil spirit, forced him to go out, not without hideous cries, and leaving the boy breathless on the ground, insomuch that the by-standers believed him dead. But Jesus soon undeceived them, and taking him by the hand, raised him up, and delivered him to his father, perfectly cured. As soon as they had withdrawn themselves from the astonished multitude, his disciples begged of him to know the reason, why they had in vain attempted to cast this devil out? to whom he answered, that all their disappointments in general were owing to their want of faith; but that this particular one was owing to their neglect of fasting and prayer, which alone could obtain a sufficient power from heaven to expel that kind of evil spirits³.

Jesus having observed the three, at their coming down from the mount, questioning about his resurrection, took this opportunity, as they were moving towards Capernaum, and freed from the crouds, to speak to the twelve afresh concerning his approaching death; and to assure them, that he should be betrayed into wicked hands, to be crucified, but that he should rise again on the third day. But their heads seem to have been so filled with a notion of an earthly kingdom, that instead of desiring him to explain further to them the grating mystery of his cross, they were rather debating how he was likely to dispose of his new dignities, which they had more immediately in view. This dispute lasted till they were got to the city, where the collectors asked them, whether their master did not pay the usual tribute (P)? and Peter, who knew his disposition to give God and Cæsar their due, answered them in the affirmative. Jesus however expressed himself to him in such manner, as plainly hinted that tribute to be due only from strangers, and not from the children, or those who are free-born. Nevertheless, added he to Peter, to prevent giving any offence on that account, go and cast thy hook into the lake, and in the mouth of the first fish thou takest, thou wilt find a piece of money (Q); pay that for thee and me⁴.

(P) Several interpreters have thought the tribute-money here exacted to have been that which every one was to pay yearly to the temple; and that Jesus pronounced himself exempt from it on account of his being the Son of God. But we rather think with Beza, that it was the capitation money which had been made in the time of Cyrenius, after Archelaus's banishment; of which we have lately spoke. For as our Saviour seems to observe to St. Peter here, it was a tax imposed upon the Jews by the arbitrary will of Cæsar against justice and equity, because by their former alliances with Rome, they were to be free from all such imposts. However, to avoid giving offence, or too great a countenance to the pernicious Gaulonizish faction, Jesus rather chose to work a miracle, than refuse to conform to the law of the conqueror, and bringing thereby a greater mischief upon himself and nation.

It seems as if by this law or tax every man had been obliged to enroll himself in some city, whether of his nativity or abode. Jesus had made his chief residence at Capernaum, after he had forsook Nazareth. Peter had done the same in all likelihood, and that is the reason why he bids him give the piece of money for them both, without mentioning any thing of the other apostles, who might be enrolled at Bethsaida, or some other town near the lake.

(Q) This piece the Greek calls Stater, and the Hebrew or Syriac מָנָה, mana; it was equal to the double shekel, and was worth about half a crown of our money (16).

- a As soon as Peter was returned, Jesus asked them, what they had been disputing about in their way thither, whilst they, conscious of their ill-timed ambition, held their peace. But Jesus, who knew it perfectly well, taking a child in his arms, expressly told them, that the only way of becoming great in his heavenly kingdom, was to become like that little child in innocence and humility; and that the more nearly they resembled him in those two excellent virtues, the peculiar foundation of his religion, and of all christian virtues, the greater and higher would their rank be there; whereas pride and ambition, the bane of his new and divine institution, were the ready means to exclude them from having any share or title to that glorious kingdom. Here one of the apostles interrupted him, to acquaint him that they had observed a man take upon him to cast out devils in his name, and had forbidden him, because he thought himself above following them. But Jesus blamed his untimely zeal, since no man could work miracles in his name, but out of some due regard to his person and character; then resuming his figurative discourse, he told his audience, that whosoever should receive one of these little children, or meek and humble disciples, the least favour bestowed on them, though but a cup of water, in his name, should not fail of a reward. On the other hand, added he, whosoever shall presume to despise or give them just cause of offence (as it is indeed scarcely possible for men of that low and humble character to escape such a contemptuous treatment from a haughty and degenerate world) such indignities will meet with the same severe punishment, as if offered to my own person, or even to God himself, whose greatest favourites they are. But whilst mankind entertain a spirit so contrary to that of my gospel, they will hardly ever be free from such pernicious offences; and this is the reason why I, who am come to save that which is in danger of being lost, am so earnest in warning you against them. If a good shepherd find that one in a hundred of his sheep is gone astray, how readily doth he leave the rest, to go and fetch back the stragling one! and how much greater pleasure would it be to me to recall every poor stragling mortal, who know how desirous my heavenly father is that none of them should perish, but that they may all be saved!

Reproves the ambition of his disciples.

Recommends humility.

- But I tell you moreover, that you should be so far from offending these meek disciples of mine, who are incapable of giving you the least just provocation to it, that you ought to avoid even retaliating the wrongs and offences that are done to you. You all stand in great need of forgiveness from your heavenly father; but how can you ever expect it from him, if you refuse it to your fellow-creatures. In offences of a different nature, and of ill tendency to religion, your duty is to admonish the offender, first in the privatest manner; if this fails, repeat it before one or two witnesses; if this doth not reclaim him, declare his offence to the church; and if he rejects their admonition and censure, let him be rescinded from it; and till he return and submit, look upon him as an infidel; pity and pray for him, but avoid all familiar intercourse with him. For here I repeat it again, whatever sentence is thus regularly passed upon such an obstinate offender by you here on earth, shall be ratified in heaven. For whatever any number of you, though ever so small, thus gathered in my name and spirit, shall agree to ask from above, I will surely be in the midst of them, to direct and help their prayers, and send them home with the desired blessing.

Charity.

- Here Peter, finding that an offender was to be forgiven, if private admonition reclaimed him, asked his master, how often he must repeat that forgiveness? whether so far as seven times? and was answered, not only as far as seven, but as seventy times seven times. But to prevent their being scared at such an unlimited number, he explained to them the unreasonableness as well as danger of an unforgiving temper, by the significant parable of a wicked servant, who having had the vast debt of ten thousand talents mercifully forgiven by his lord, went and arrested a fellow-servant for a poor hundred pence, and without any regard to his intreaties and tears, threw him into a gaol; for which merciless cruelty his lord condemned him to a condign punishment. The application was easy, and the force of the parallel easily felt; but Jesus was pleased to corroborate it, by assuring them on his infallible word, that they must expect no forgiveness from his heavenly Father, unless they were willing and ready to forgive each other their trespasses.

Forgiveness.

AFTER a short stay at Capernaum, the feast of tabernacles drawing near, some of his near relations, who were, it seems, the backwardest to believe in him, observing what a long stay he had made in Galilee, and how the fear of the Jews had made him avoid going into Judæa ^a, took upon them to reprove him for it, telling him, that if his design was to make himself known to the world, he ought to go and shew himself at Jerusalem to the great concourse of people that were just ready to flock to that feast, instead of hiding himself in those obscure corners of Galilee. Jesus, instead of reproving their temerity, only took occasion to remind them, that they indeed had nothing to fear there from the Jews; but that it was otherwise with him, against whose life the heads of that nation were more busily plotting at this time than ever. He therefore told them that they might go thither as soon as they pleased; but as to himself, he would take his own time. He staid not long however after them, but went thither in the privatest manner he could, for fear of awaking the jealousy of his enemies ^f. He chose to go through some parts of Samaria, and sent one or two of his disciples to prepare a lodging for him at one of their towns on the road; but these, according to their usual rancour, understanding that he was going to Jerusalem to the approaching feast, refused to give him any entertainment; which so exasperated his company, that the two Boanerges, whom we mentioned in a late note, were for bringing down fire from heaven to consume that ungodly place. But Jesus gave them so severe a rebuke, as made them sensible how diametrically opposite such a revengeful and murdering spirit was to that meek and charitable one, which brought him from heaven to save mankind ^g.

Jesus goes to the feast of tabernacles.

Appoints seventy disciples.

Teaches in the temple.

BEFORE he reached Jerusalem, he was pleased to appoint another college of disciples, ^c to the number of seventy, answering to the number of the elders chosen by Moses to be his assistants ^h, as that of the twelve apostles did to the twelve tribes of Israel (R). These he sent also by two and two, and with the same instructions and miraculous power which he had given to the twelve apostles; with this difference only, that the former were permitted to go to any city of Israel, but these only to those particular cities where himself designed to come after and preach ⁱ. By this time the feast of tabernacles was come, when there was no small search after, nor small strife about him; some doubting whether he would venture himself there, some affirming him to be a prophet, others an impostor. He appeared at length publickly in the temple about the latter end of the feast, and to their great surprize, taught boldly and openly there; ^j and displayed such a superior knowledge of the sacred books, that they could not forbear asking one another in a kind of amazement, whence a man of so mean an education could ever attain to it? When Jesus heard this reasoning, he assured them, that his doctrine was not from men, but from heaven; and that if any of them were but sincerely disposed to do the will of God, they would soon be convinced of the truth of what he said. Whilst therefore some admired his courage, in speaking such bold truths at the hazard of his life, and affirmed his miracles to demonstrate him to be the true Messiah, others, more obstinate, objected the meanness of his birth and parentage. To these he answered, that whatever they might know of his earthly descent, they were wholly ignorant of his heavenly one; all which he enforced by such irrefragable proofs, that a great number of them began to believe openly in him, which when the Jewish magistrates knew, they sent some of their officers to apprehend him. But as his time was not yet come, instead of following their instructions, they came back filled with admiration, and told those chiefs that they never heard a man speak like him ^k.

a have said in a former volume *, Jesus took occasion to entertain his audience with a discourse on those living waters, which were to be imparted to those who believed in him, alluding, as the evangelist observes, to those gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, which were shortly after to be poured on his church. This last speech caused a fresh division among them, some believing that none but the Messiah could express himself in that exalted manner; others objecting his being an obscure Galilean, whereas the Messiah was, they rightly said, to be born in Bethlehem; for so he was, though they knew it not. But the Pharisees, more exasperated than the rest, to hear such numbers of the multitude, and particularly the officers sent to seize on him, declare themselves so openly for him, were the loudest in their invectives against him and b them, alledging that none of their learned rabbies or rulers, or indeed any but an accursed ignorant mob, had believed on him. Here Nicodemus, who was his disciple, though secretly, undertook to moderate the difference, by reminding those hot-headed zealots, that the law did not permit them to condemn a man in that rash and mercilefs manner, and without hearing what he had to say in his own defence. This speech galled them so much the more, because, though they were conscious of the charge, they dared not bring it to so fair an issue. They therefore asked him in a tumultuous manner, whether he was a Galilean? and bid him go and search the scriptures, and he would find that that province never yet produced a prophet (S); after which the assembly was broke up for that time †.

c Jesus went that night out of the city, and retired towards the mount of olives, and returned again early in the morning, and taught in the treasury of the temple, where the Scribes and Pharisees brought an adulteress before him, said to be taken in the very act (T). We have seen in a former volume, that the Mosaic law condemned such offenders to death ‡, and they failed not to remind him of it; but pretended to have a desire to know what he thought was to be done in this case, that they might find some accusation against him, such as his too great severity, if he condemned; or if he did not, his too great indulgence and disregard to the law; or in either case, his assuming a judicial power. Jesus, who easily perceived their malicious design, stooped down, and made as if he did not hear them, but was writing something with his finger on the d ground. This made them more earnest to make him declare his mind, upon which he rose up, and told them, that he, who was free from sin, should cast the first stone, and then returned to his former attitude. This unlooked-for answer filled those hypocrites not only with wonder, but with such shame and remorse, that they withdrew themselves one after another, and left the woman alone with him. When Jesus stood up and found all her accusers gone, he dismissed her with this mild reproof, Go thy way, and sin no more, and then resumed his discourse to his audience ¶.

An adulteress
him.

He began with telling them, that he was the true light of the world, and that those who followed him were free from darkness. This expression exasperated the Pharisees afresh, who thought that title to belong to them alone. They therefore despised e him, as bearing testimony of himself, but were answered, that they indeed were peculiarly famed for bearing a pompous testimony, and complimenting one another; but as for him, he had the testimony of Moses and the prophets, of John the Baptist, and above all, that of his heavenly father, of which the stupendous works, which he wrought before them, were an undeniable proof. But, added he, this will more evidently appear after ye have lifted me up on the cross; for then shall my disciples find themselves truly freed from that yoke and thralldom, under which the rest of the world doth groan. Here the Pharisees, not perceiving that he spoke of the freedom from sin and guilt, told him with their wonted assurance, that they being Abraham's

(T) This whole story of the woman is omitted in the Syriac and some other ancient versions. Those who conclude from our Saviour's absolving, or rather refusing to condemn her according to the Mosaic law (31), that adultery ought not therefore to be looked upon as a capital crime under the gospel, may as well argue against the lawfulness of dividing inheritances, because he refused in the like manner to intermeddle with such an affair, when desired by one of the parties (32).

children, it was out of his power to make them freer than they were, since they had ^a never been in bondage to any ; but Jesus, instead of exploding the falshood, told them, that if their actions were to determine whose children they were, their pride, avarice, persecuting and murdering spirit, and their perverse opposing of all saving truths, rather proved them the children of the devil, and the slaves of sin, than the free-born offspring of a righteous Abraham. The Jews, unable to refell so just a censure, contented themselves with calling him a Samaritan and a demoniac, but were answered that the zeal which he had constantly expressed for his father's honour, and the malice which they had as constantly opposed him in it, could easily determine which of the two did most deserve the appellative of demoniac. However, he added, turning to his audience, this I assure you of, that he who obeys that divine law which ^b I am preaching unto you, shall never die. This equivocal expression raised new arguments as well as new invectives from the carnal Jews, which in this and some other occasions, we shall for brevity omit ; tho' they rose to such height, that they attempted several times to stone him, but he as often miraculously conveyed himself away from them ^c.

The seventy return with joy.

UPON his departure from the city, the seventy disciples rejoined him, and with no small joy acquainted him with their success, and that the very devils became subject unto them. Jesus, though pleased with the approaching downfall of satan's power, yet observing that his disciples seemed to express too great a satisfaction at their miraculous power, bid them rather rejoice at their having their names written in heaven. ^c Whilst he was giving them some further directions for their rightly dispensing of these new gifts, a certain doctor of the law asked him, what he must do to be saved ? Jesus referred him to the Mosaic law, the sum and substance of which consisted in loving God above all things, and our neighbour as one's self. But as the strait-laced Jews scarcely accounted any but those of their nation and sect for their neighbour, the lawyer asked him further, whom he ought to look upon as such ? Upon which Jesus put forth that most excellent parable of the Jew that fell among thieves ; and after having been overlooked and neglected by priest and levites, was at length happily relieved by the charitable Samaritan. From which he concluded, that our duty to our neighbour was not confined to sect, nation, or any other circumstance, but extended to all mankind. ^d In his way to Galilee, he stopped at a small village called Bethany, situate on the furthest part of the mount of olives, where he was entertained by Lazarus and his two sisters. These upon his arrival were very differently employed, Martha in preparing an elegant supper, and Mary in listening at Jesus's feet to his heavenly discourse. Martha, vexed to see her sister Mary (U) leave the whole care of the feast to her, went and complained of it before him ; but instead of her help, she received this severe rebuke from Jesus's mouth, that she incumbered herself too much about the trifling affairs of a supper, whilst her wiser sister was minding the one thing necessary, the concerns of another and a better life ^e.

Teaches in Galilee.

FROM Bethany he proceeded to Galilee, where he went about teaching in every ^e synagogue, and other convenient places, instructing his followers with many excellent parables, and confirming all still with some new miracles ? Among the last, he wrought one on the sabbath day, in some Jewish synagogue, on a poor decrepid woman, whom old age and sickness had so bowed down, that she had not been able to raise herself up during the space of eighteen years. Jesus, moved with her misery, called her to him, and having laid his hands on her, pronounced her free from her infirmity, not without moving the Pharisaic indignation and resentment ; but Jesus retorted their reproofs with such powerful arguments, and familiar parables, as did at least silence them, though all too little to convince them that doing such good deeds was the proper work of that day. The following is a very pregnant instance of it. ^f

Jesus, after frequent peragrations through Galilee and Judæa, was come to the feast of the dedication of the temple, instituted by Judas Maccabeus, and mentioned in a former section *. He chanced one day, which was the sabbath, to meet in the street

(U) This Mary has been wrongfully confounded with that sinful woman, mentioned a little higher, out of the same evangelist, who doth not tell us her name, but only that she came to be absolved by Jesus. It doth in no case appear that Mary, Laza- rus's sister, was ever a woman of that loose character ; on the contrary, Jesus, who often lodged at their house, is expressly said to have had a particular affection for the whole family ; we shall see a pregnant instance of it in the sequel.

- a a man that was born blind, concerning whom his disciples asked him, whether the sins of his parents, or his own, had brought that calamity upon him (W)? Jesus answered, that neither his own nor his forefathers sins were the cause of his blindness; but that God suffered such things to happen for the greater manifestation of his unlimited power, adding, that he was chiefly come to make a fuller display of it. Having thus said, he spit upon the ground, and anointed the blind man's eyes with the moistened earth, and bid him go and wash himself in Siloam's pool. He did so, and obtained his sight to the no small admiration of all that saw him, who could hardly persuade themselves that he was the same person, till he had assured them of it. The news of this wonderful cure was soon brought to the sanhedrin, whither the man was also brought, and carefully examined; but upon his acquainting them with the circumstance of Jesus's anointing his eyes with the clay made with his spit, a great dissension arose among them, one side affirming this action to be a breach of the sabbath, and the other asking them, how they could suppose it possible for a sinner and sabbath-breaker to work such an extraordinary miracle? To be therefore satisfied of the truth of the fact, they ordered his parents to be brought before them, who upon examination owned the man to be their son, and to have been born blind; but pretended to be ignorant how he had recovered his sight. Upon their receiving this further evidence, they called the young man in again, and bid him ascribe the glory of his cure to God alone; for as to the man, who had wrought it, they knew him to be a sinner, and a cheat. After several other inquiries, in which they betrayed the most unaccountable partiality, and inveterate rancour against his divine physician, the young man at length took the liberty to plead in his defence; and to remind them, that since the creation of the world, no such cure had ever been wrought on a man born blind, and that it was consequently not only above the power of such a hateful sinner as they represented him, (since all such are in the highest detestation with God) but even above the power of any but a true prophet sent from above.

that was born blind.*

- Such strong reasoning, accompanied with so much candor, and honest boldness, might have wrought on any hearts, but those of the Pharisaic mould; but these, exasperated to hear themselves so justly reprov'd by a man whom they accounted altogether born in sin, after a severe and contemptuous rebuke, ordered him to be turned out of the assembly (X) 9. But Jesus, who found him soon after in the temple, gave him a more gracious reception, and then turning to the audience, took occasion, from the late partial behaviour of the sanhedrin, to exclaim against those false and pernicious teachers, under the similitude of shepherds, and their flocks, and to shew them that many of those climbed up into the sheep-fold by private and unlawful ways, like thieves and robbers, only to kill and destroy the sheep. That others, who were only hirelings, and had neither property in, nor true concern for their flocks, minded nothing but their fleece, and their milk; so that when they saw them in danger from ravenous beasts, they left them to become a prey, instead of protecting and defending them. Hence he proved himself to be the true shepherd, because he came to give his life for his sheep, and to procure them wholesome and lasting pasture. He concluded with telling them that he had other sheep, than those of the Jewish kind, to bring into his fold, which would prove more tractable and obedient to his voice, intimating thereby the conversion of the heathen world.

This discourse had likewise a different effect on his audience, some calling him a demoniac, and blaming the rest for listening to him; others asking, when they had ever known a demoniac utter such excellent truths, or open the eyes of a man born blind?

9 JOHN IX. per tot.

10 JOHN X. pass.

(W) This question plainly proves that the Jews believed the doctrine of the soul's sinning in a pre-existent state, and being punished for it in another. Else a man born blind could not be supposed to have been born so on account of his own sins.

(X) The text doth barely say, that they ordered him to be turned out; but some understand it of his being cast out of the synagogue, or in other words, that they excommunicated him. It is true, they had passed that sentence on every one that should acknowledge Jesus to be the Christ (33), and his actually doing so before them all, had laid him liable to it; but it doth not appear from the evangelist, that they pronounced excommunication against him: if they did, he seems to have been the first confessor, as John the Baptist had been the first martyr, for the testimony of Christ.

flood 4035.
Of Christ 36.
The last year of Christ's ministy.

WE pass now to the fourth and last year of his public ministry, an epoch full of the most surprising and signal events that ever the world beheld; the redemption of mankind by the blood of the Son of God; his resurrection, ascension, mission of the Holy Spirit: miraculous change wrought on the apostles, and first preachers of christianity; the church of Christ planted by the powerful preaching of a few plain and illiterate fishermen, confirmed by great and glorious miracles wrought by them, by many supernatural gifts bestowed on them, and by them on the first believers and preachers, and in a little time cemented by the blood of innumerable martyrs, and founded on so firm an immoveable rock, that neither the powers of earth or hell have since been able to destroy it. We shall omit a great number of his excellent sermons, parables, strenuous struggles with the incredulous Jews, and frequent persecutions from the Pharisees and Sadducees; but especially a much greater number and variety of miracles which he wrought within this short interval, to come to that celebrated one, which determined the sanhedrin at length at any rate to put him to death. We mean the raising of his friend Lazarus from death to life, after he had been four days buried, and corrupting in his grave, and in the presence of a great multitude of considerable Jews, who by reason of the nearness of Bethany to Jerusalem, were come thither from that metropolis to the burial, and were eye-witnesses of this stupendous fact.

He raises La-
dead.

Jesus had designedly conveyed himself away at some distance from him, during the time of his sickness, and had at last acquainted his disciples with his death, adding to it, that he would now go and raise him up to life. Upon his approaching to Bethany, Martha, who was informed of his coming, went to meet him at some distance from the place, and complained to him with tears, that if he had been there, her brother would not have died. Jesus comforted her with the promise of his rising again, but she understanding it of the last resurrection, earnestly intreated him that he would now use his never-failing intercession with his heavenly Father to have him restored to life. Having obtained a gracious promise from him, she went in haste to call her sister, who came accordingly, accompanied with a great number of Jews, who were come to comfort her, and by her hasty departure supposed that she was going to vent her tears at her brother's grave. As soon as she came in sight of Jesus, she fell on her knees, and expressed her grief in such a pathetic manner, as drew some sighs and tears from him, as well as from the rest of the by-standers. At length, seeing fresh multitudes coming towards him, he desired the two sisters to conduct him to the grave, the sight of which drew a fresh shower of tears from him; insomuch that the Jews wondered, that he, who could give sight to a man born blind, should not interpose the same miraculous power to have saved so dear a friend from death. Whilst they held this discourse, Jesus ordered the grave-stone to be removed, at which Martha cried out, Lord, by this time he stinketh! But he, after a gentle reproof for suffering her faith to fail so soon, addressing himself to heaven in a pathetic prayer, called out aloud, Lazarus, come forth. Upon which he that was dead, came out, bound, as he was, in his funeral dress (Y); from which he was at Jesus's desire immediately loosed.

IT

(Y) This circumstance, expressly mentioned by the evangelist, renders the miracle still more authentic and unquestionable. We are told by him in another place (34), that the custom of the Jews (those at least that could afford it) was to embalm the dead with an aromatic mixture of myrrh, aloes, and other gums, mixed with spices, with which they rubbed their bodies all over, more or less profusely, according to their circumstances, or regard to the dead person; after which they wrapped their heads all over with a napkin, and their whole body with a shroud or winding-sheet, both which they afterwards sweated as tightly as they could with proper bandages (35).

We formerly observed also, that they buried their dead very soon †, seldom or never keeping them twenty-four hours above-ground. Lazarus therefore, having been dead four days, must have lain at least three of them in his grave, which was a cave cut into the rock, and covered with a large stone; so that it was impossible for any cheat or imposture to be transacted with all those circumstances, since if it could be even supposed that a person could live so many days in such a damp and airless cave, yet the lining sweated on his face and body, and over such a gummy composition, must have smothered him in less than so many hours.

This was so plain and unquestionable, that neither any Jews there present, nor even any of the sanhedrin, pretended to deny or doubt of the fact, but rather condemned him upon the notoriety of it, and as tending to give rise to a new sect, which would endanger their church and state. Of the same nature afterwards was the apostle's cure of an old cripple;

- a It is easy to imagine either the joy of the two sisters, or the surprise of the rest of the Jews, at the sight of so stupendous a miracle; and indeed it wrought such a conviction in the greatest part of them, that they began now to confess him in good earnest to be the Messiah. And not only those who had been witnesses of it, but vast multitudes of others, who hearing of it from them, came flocking to Bethany to be further satisfied of it, believed also in him. The sanhedrin was soon acquainted with this transaction, and were in no small concern how to put an effectual stop to this dangerous increase, both of his fame, and of the number of his disciples. For, as they rightly argued, if we let him alone, and suffer him to work such signal miracles, all men will believe on him; the consequence of which will be, that the jealous Romans will come and destroy both our place and nation. At length Caiafas, the then high-priest stood up, and spake to this effect: You seem to know nothing at all, nor to consider that it is expedient that one man should die to prevent the ruin of a nation¹. Little did he or they think he was then inspired from above, and that he was delivering the will and decrees of heaven, that Jesus should suffer death, not for the Jewish nation only, but for the faithful, which were to be gathered together in him, from the four corners of the earth. For being high-priest that year, it pleased God to give him the spirit of prophecy, to utter this great and comfortable truth, and thereby further manifest the accomplishment of the divine oracles concerning the Messiah's dying for the sins of the world. His advice was readily embraced, and after they had once resolved on his death, they were easily determined to cut off Lazarus also, the sight of whom daily increased the number of believers.

The Jews consulted to put him to death.

- b But Jesus, who knew his own appointed time, as well as the result of their last consultation, withdrew himself into a small city, called Ephraim, in the neighbourhood of the wood or wilderness of that name², and there continued with his disciples till the approaching feast of the passover. He left the place six days before that feast to go to Jerusalem, and took Bethany in his way, where Lazarus and his sisters entertained him and his disciples at a sumptuous supper; it being a sabbath night, at which times they kept a more plenteous table. Whilst they were eating, Mary, to shew her extreme regard to their guest, came and anointed his feet with a precious ointment of spikenard, whose fragrancy filled the whole house. Whilst the disciples were wondering at her profuseness, Judas, whom we observed to have been their knavish treasurer, could not conceal his indignation at it, and asking, why the ointment was not rather sold, and the money given to the poor? the rest of the twelve seemed also in some measure to join with him in it³, till Jesus had severely rebuked him, and excused her generous action, as an anticipation of his burial rite; adding moreover, that the memorial of it should be preserved to her honour, as far and as long as the preaching of his gospel should reach or endure⁴.

- c On the very next day (Z), Jesus knowing his time to be just at hand, marched now boldly towards Jerusalem, whilst his disciples, to whom he had more than once or twice foretold all the circumstances of his future sufferings and death⁵, accompanied him with heavy and trembling hearts. As for the traitor Judas, he conceived such a grudge against him at the last night's action, that he resolved to betray him into the hands of his enemies upon the very first opportunity. When they were come to Bethphage upon mount Olivet, within a small mile of Jerusalem, Jesus directed two of his disciples to a place where two roads met, and bid them bring from thence a she ass, with a young colt by her, that had never been backed; and if the owners asked them any questions, they should only answer that the Lord had occasion for them, and they would readily permit them to be brought to him. They brought the ass and colt accordingly, and having spread a garment upon the latter, set Jesus on it, and accompanied him to Jerusalem, in a kind of triumph, attended by great multitudes;

cripple; which, though the whole sanhedrin owned and acknowledged to be a miracle (36), yet they endeavoured by the like unjustifiable means to suppress, and upon the same account.

some of whom going before, strewed the way with their garments, and green a boughs, crying out Hozanna (A); blessed is the son of David, and blessed is the king of Israel, who cometh in the name of the Lord. Thus was that famous prophecy of Zachary fulfilled; Fear not, O daughter of Sion, behold, thy King cometh to thee, just, humble, and meek, and riding on the sole of an ass *. The multitudes still increasing as they went on, the Pharisees, which beheld the sight, and heard those acclamations with no small indignation, drew nearer to him, and earnestly desired him that he would command at least his disciples, if not the whole croud, to be silent. But Jesus rather chose to silence their own envy, by assuring them, that if those should hold their peace, the very stones would cry out, and proclaim the divine author of so many glorious miracles. But he took a much more effectual method to suppress the pomp b and noise of that mock triumph, as well as the Hozannas of the multitude, which he but too well knew would in a few days be changed into the blasphemous cry of, Away with him, crucify him. For as he drew nearer to Jerusalem, the sight of that rebellious and unhappy metropolis having revived in his mind the more dreadful prospect of that approaching ruin, which was now hastening on upon it, and which he himself had more than once foretold to his disciples (B), it was then a proper time to damp their untimely joys, by reminding them of it; and here it was that the dismal scene having quite disarmed him of his anger and resentment, made him break out into the following compassionate expostulation, mixed with a flood of tears: Oh that thou hadst but known, at least in these thy latter days, the things that would c have conduced to thy peace! but now are they hidden from thee; and now the sad appointed time draws near, when the enemy shall surround thee with trenches, and inclose thee on every side, butcher thy children within thy bosom, and level thee

* Conf. ZACH. ix. 9. ISAIAH liii. 1. MATTH. xxi. 1, seq. MARK xi. 1, & seq. & alib.

(A) Or rather, according to the Hebrew, Hoshab-na, Save, we pray; so that this was a kind of prayer or blessing used by the Jews, and taken from the hundred and eighteenth psalm (38). and signified Save, preserve, and prosper, Lord, this Son of David.

(B) Particularly in that full, elegant, and pathetic description he gave to them of it, when being near the same place, the twelve desired him to look back, and behold the beauty and magnificence of the temple, the strength and prodigious size of its stones, and the like (39); and where he foretold them, that before the present generation was dead and past, not only that stately and stupendous fabric, but the whole city, would be reduced into a heap of rubbish (40).

And on this occasion it was, that from the likeness of the destruction of the Jewish polity, and that of the world, or, (as others perhaps more rightly understand it) the final end of idolatry, irreligion, and every wicked work, ushering in the millennium, in which Christ and his doctrine shall be universally acknowledged and professed throughout the world, during a thousand years) from the near resemblance, I say, of those two dreadful catastrophes, of which the former seems to have been a lively type of the latter, whether as to its prognostics, such an universal degeneracy and apostasy, a general deception by false prophets, lying wonders, abominable wickedness, cruelty, oppression, wars, tumults on the earth, dreadful signs in the heavens, and the like; or, as to its dismal consequences, the horrid destruction of the Jews by war, pestilence, and famine, in the former, or of the sinful race of men in the latter, typified by that of Gog and Magog, and other figurative expressions preceding the millennium; Christ takes occasion to make such a natural, but almost unperceptible transition, that the primitive christians could not easily distinguish them, but were led into a notion, that he spoke of one and the same catastrophe, which was consequently to happen before

For it was in this sense that they took the word generation, according to which it was also meant, and really fulfilled with respect to the Jews; but the word דור, der, was no less capable of a larger sense; the Hebrew, Syriac, &c. having none other or better to express a much longer series of time. Thus they indifferently spoke of the generation of the antediluvians, of that under the judges, kings, priests, &c. and we have elsewhere more than once observed, that they divided the world into three epochs, or, in their style, into three generations, consisting each of two thousand years. The first before, the second under the law, and the third under the Messiah. It was therefore to the exit of this last, that the second part of his prophecy had an eye, when that thorough change was to be wrought in the world, elegantly expressed in the prophetic writings by a new heaven, and a new earth, a new Jerusalem, &c.

As long therefore as the mistake of the primitive christians in cutting that epocha so very short, had no other tendency, than to make them more fervent, zealous, and heavenly-minded, more patient and heroic under sufferings and persecutions, and more fervent and diligent in preaching the gospel; the inspired writers might have thought it a sufficient warrant for their overlooking it. But St. Peter, among others, seems to have taken particular care to rectify it, and to obviate the objection which might be raised from their non-completion at the expected time, by reminding them, that what they mistook for a delay, was not really such, since with God a thousand years were but as one day (41). A phrase well understood then by the Jews, to whom he wrote, and which alluded most probably to the notion of the six days of the creation, prefiguring the six thousand years duration of the world, before the great and glorious change, which it was to receive at Christ's second coming.

a with the ground, so that not a stone shall be left standing upon another, because thou wouldst not know the time of thy visitation (C) ^b. The people however, more full of the present triumph, than mindful of his distant threatenings, went and entered the city with their usual acclamations, and drew such a vast concourse after them, to know who this prophet was for whom they made all this bustle, that the whole city was in an uproar; and well it might, when they heard them say, that it was Jesus of Nazareth, the promised Messiah, and remembered at the same time what a severe sentence the sanhedrin had passed against not only him, but every one who should acknowledge him to be the Christ.

Jesus repaired immediately to the temple, and, as he had formerly done, expelled ^{Monday before his passion.} all the mercantile brood from that sacred place, and convinced them of his authority in so doing, by working several cures there on the sick, lame, and blind, whilst the wondering multitude continued their loud acclamations of Hosanna to the son of David; to the great scandal of the Pharisees, who did all they could to silence them. But Jesus, who knew the main spring of all their pretended zeal, not only stopped their invectives, by reminding them of that prophecy out of the psalmist; Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise; but exposed their malice and obstinacy by such strong arguments, and pungent parables, that they would doubtless have laid hold on him, had not the sight of so great a multitude overawed them ^d. There were at this time a number of Greeks (D), who were come to the feast, and expressed a desire to see him. Jesus readily caused them to be called in; and to take off the scandal of the cross, by which he was going to procure the salvation of both Jews and Gentiles, he entertained them with a discourse on his sufferings, and closed it with assuring his audience, that those only, who after his example, were ready to lay down their lives for the sake of heaven, would be intitled to it. Reflecting next on the glory which God would receive from his death, he broke out into this ejaculation, Father, glorify thy name; and was answered by a voice from heaven, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. This was probably meant of the plentiful effusion of the Holy Ghost, and that conversion of the Gentile world, which was shortly to follow his death; but the people not rightly attending to it, mistook the voice, so ne for that of an angel, speaking to him, some for what they called the bath-col (E), and others for a clap of thunder; till he assured them, that it was a real voice sent

(C) Those who maintain the doctrine of predestination, though even in the more moderate sense of it, called by them the Sublapsarian system, would do well to consider, what a horrid scene of mockery and injustice they make the son of God, and Redeemer of the world, to act here upon this melancholy occasion. For if the Jews blindness and infidelity, their persecuting and murdering of him, their obstinacy in rejecting him and his doctrine, and those dreadful punishments which were shortly to be the consequence of it, were not only absolutely unavoidable by them, but were owing to the want of that supernatural grace and power, which he only came to impart to some few elect, whilst he wholly excluded the rest of mankind from it; with what sincerity could he say to them, even with tears, Oh that thou hadst known at least, &c. or with what justice cry out against them, Oh Jerusalem, that murderest the prophets, &c. how often would I have gathered thee and thy children, with the same care and tenderness, that a hen doth her chickens! and ye would not, therefore, &c. (42); but there is something so monstrously shocking and impious both in that supposition, and in the doctrine from which it flows of course, that we may justly wonder that neither this, nor all the learned treatises which have been written against it (43), have hitherto been able to expode it; but as the argument belongs no farther to our province, than as we are bound to vindicate the divine justice and mercy displayed in the gospel, we shall gladly dismiss it.

(D) These were properly neither Jews nor Gentiles, but what the former called proselytes of the gate, of whom we have spoke more fully in a former volume †.

(E) This word which literally signifies the daughter voice, or daughter of the voice, is what the Jews have substituted to the gift of prophecy, after this last had been extinct in Zachary and Malachi, the last of the prophets. For though they allow that several eminent men among them have been since endowed with it, such as we have seen some of the Essenians; yet they looked upon them in an inferior view to the former, who received theirs by immediate inspiration, whilst these had it chiefly by the help of the bath-col.

They are however divided in their notions concerning this last, having no other guide to go by than their pretended tradition, which they make no difficulty to understand, every one in his own way, and as it best serves their turn. Whilst therefore some pretended that it was a plain, loud, and articulate voice, such as was heard by young Samuel (44); others looked upon it either a kind of soft whisper, and others again as a kind of internal voice speaking to the heart of the person.

Whether there is any foundation for the two former, is hard to affirm upon so tottering a testimony of from heaven, not for his, but their sakes; and to warn them to make a right use of that light, or irrefragable evidence, which he had afforded them, lest they should bring upon themselves a judicial blindness. For, added he, when I am once lifted up, alluding to his death upon the cross, I shall draw all men unto me, intimating thereby doubtless, that his laying down his life in confirmation of his doctrine, joined to all the other evidences that had preceded, and were to follow it, and to the excellency of his precepts and rewards, would be sufficient to draw all sincere and well-disposed persons to his gospel and religion.

THIS heavenly discourse made a deep impression on many of his audience, and amongst them upon some of their chief rulers, who yet did not dare own themselves his converts for fear of being thrust out of the synagogue. When the evening came, ^b Jesus, to avoid the croud, withdrew himself and his disciples for that night to Bethany; and on the next morning they returned to Jerusalem. In his way he observed a fig-tree afar off, full of leaves indeed; but upon his approaching nearer it, as expecting to have found some fruit upon it; according to the season of the year (F), and finding himself disappointed, he cursed the tree, upon which it presently withered down to the very root. On the next morning, which was the Tuesday, Peter casting his eye upon it as they went to Jerusalem, could not forbear wondering at the suddenness of the change; upon which Christ took occasion to assure them, that if they had but a of the rabbies, who all own to have lived long after they had in some measure ceased to be so common. Of this nature was that which is affirmed to have been heard to pronounce rabbi Akiba, happy in the next world, after he had been sent out of this by order of the emperor Hadrian; and another, which declared two famous doctors, Hillel and Samuel, to be worthy to receive the Holy Ghost; and some others (45), which, if really heard, might be yet owing to some juggle of those who were concerned in it. As for the last, or inward one, though it were hard to disprove good men having such secret motions or impulses, yet they may be of two uncertain a nature to be always depended upon.

But if we examine the practice of the compilers of the talmud, or even of those that lived before them, we shall find them consulting this bath-col in a much different way, and not unlike that of the Romans in their sortes Virgilianæ, and other heathenish superstitious methods; of which the two or three following, taken out of the talmud (46), will be a sufficient proof. "Rabbi Jochanan and Rabbi Simeon, desirous of seeing the face of Rabbi Samuel, a prince among the Babylonish doctors, said, Let us follow the directions of the bath-col. As they were passing by a school in their travel thither, they heard one of the boys reading these words out of the book of Samuel; And Samuel died; from which they inferred, that the person they were in search after was dead, and so it actually proved."

Two other doctors going to see a friend of theirs, and hearing a woman speak the words, The lamp is going out, and her next neighbour answers, May the lamp of Israel never go out, took this also for a warning from the bath-col (47). But the most surprising was, that of one rabbi Asa, who had been guilty of so many notorious crimes, that upon his being led through thirteen different synagogues, in each of which they examined the verse which the readers were then upon, they were every one found to be reading a grievous sentence against him, such as in one, the words, There is no peace to the wicked; in another, those of the psalmist, Unto the wicked God says, What has thou to do to preach my laws? &c. and so of the rest (48).

The whimsical way likewise of prying into futurity by the casual opening of a book, was not confined to Jews and Gentiles, but was even practised by the christians in the times of ignorance and superstition, of which the reader may see some instances in dean Prideaux in the place last-quoted out of his connection.

(F) It is strange, that all versions, except the ancient Saxon one, have made St. Mark there say, that the time of the figs was not yet come; when the very time of the year, the warmth of the climate there, as well as the tenor of the story, the design and justice of the curse (for who can think the Judge of all the earth could pronounce an unjust one?) all shew that the time of the figs was come (49).

The design of this sentence on a fruitless tree, like that other, Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground, was to shew the Jews what they must expect to be their lot, if after having received so many incentives to repentance, especially of late from the preaching of the baptist, of Christ's apostles and his own, they continued still like this fig-tree, barren and fruitless. This should therefore have made the interpreters see that there was either some error crept into the text, or a manifest one in the version; and upon due consideration, they would have found, that without any violence to the former, the latter should have been rendered, For where he was, the time of the figs was come, or it was the time of the figs there.

This version will likewise justify the act, since it could be no injustice to the owner to rid his ground of a plant which sucked its nourishment from it without making any return to him; and here we beg leave to observe, that except this withering of the fig-tree, and that of sending the wine into the lake, of which we have spoken in another note, all the other miracles were of the beneficent and merciful kind; so that to complain of two miracles of severe justice, if they were really such, against him, who, setting aside his absolute power, has given us so many thousands of goodness and mercy, argues a mind so extremely perverse and ungrateful, as ought to make them fear lest something worse should befall them.

a stedfast faith in God, they might work much greater wonders than this; which they did accordingly, when their faith was soon after miraculously strengthened by the supernatural effusion of the Holy Ghost upon them. Being arrived at the temple, the Pharisees began to ask him again for some surer tokens of his authority, than those miracles he wrought before them. Jesus, who knew that nothing could convince them, if these did not, appealed immediately to the testimony of the baptist, asking them at the same time, whether or no they acknowledged it from heaven? Here they found themselves sadly intangled; if they answered in the affirmative, they condemned themselves; and if negatively, they were in danger of being condemned by the audience; so that they were forced, after some deliberation, to have recourse to that pitiful shift of owning that they knew not whence it was, for which Jesus justly pronounced them unworthy of any further evidence from him ^f.

Confutes the Pharisees.

It was upon this occasion that he tried to awaken them to a sense of their obstinacy and dangers, by several familiar, but pungent parables, such as that of the unjust and murdering husbandmen; of the wedding supper; and of the ingratitude and inhumanity of those that were invited to it; and some others of the same nature. But these, though feelingly enough understood by that hypocritical tribe, wrought no other effect upon them, than to set them upon seeking for some more effectual means to cut him off; and since they found it dangerous, by reason of the admiring multitude, to make any attempt upon him, to expose him at least to the resentment of the civil power. It was with this view that they sent their disciples, with some of the Herodians, to intangle him with the grand question about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar, of which we took notice in the last section; and which being easily perceived, Jesus as easily defeated their malicious intent, by calling for a piece of Caesar's coin, and exposing their hypocrisy, in making use of his money and protection, and yet refusing to pay tribute to him, as affirming it inconsistent with their duty to God ^g. Next to these came the Sadducees, armed, as they thought, with such a puzzling question against the resurrection, as all his learning could not elude the force of. It was of a woman, who having been married, according to the Mosaic law ^h, to seven brethren, had died at length without having any children by any of them. They asked him therefore, if there was any resurrection, whose wife she must be, since they all had her to wife?

Jesus prefaced his answer to their stupid question with this excellent one; Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures, nor the power of God? implying thereby, that their denial of the resurrection proceeded from their either not acknowledging (G), or, if they did, from their not rightly considering the sense of the scriptures, and the extent of the divine power. For, said he to them, the state of the blessed after the

(G) We think the words not knowing, might be more properly rendered, according to the Hebrew idiom in other parallel places, not acknowledging the scriptures, and the power of God. Thus St. Paul is introduced, as not knowing the high-priest (50), who presided at the judgment seat, before which he was brought to be tried; when it is plain, every child could not but have known him both by his garb, and the place where he sat. Those who understand it, that the apostle, in the height of his resentment, had forgot, or did not consider that he was the high-priest, make him say something unworthy of his great character, and usual behaviour on such occasions; besides, that it puts some strain upon the plain meaning of the word know, which cannot be properly used to imply to consider, call to mind.

But the sense which with some critics we give here to that word, is both more agreeable to the Hebrew idiom, and to the known zeal of the apostle; and he may justly say, I do not acknowledge him to be high-priest; since we have seen throughout the two last sections, that that dignity was become so venerable, that the vilest wretches might obtain it, provided they proved but the highest bidders. All which was contrary to the Jewish law. In this sense then the Sadducean error will be founded on their unbelief of, and not on their not understanding the scriptures, or the power of God; and, indeed, considering their denial of the immortality of the soul, and the rewards and punishments of another life, they can scarcely be supposed to have believed either scriptures, or the divine power.

But if we take the word in the other sense, and admit that their error proceeded from the want of a right and due understanding of both, and not through a questioning or disputing of either; yet as long as they took upon them to limit the sense of the one, and the extent of the other, by the shallow scan of their reason, they did but pretend to believe, or at best fancied they did so, though in fact they denied them. If we were to examine the source of that scepticism and infidelity which reigns now so much among us, and opposes all gospel truths with such seeming assurance, we should find it flowing from this Sadducean leaven, which is ever ready to limit the divine power and will, as soon as their reason cannot keep pace with it.

resurrection is not to be measured by the exigencies of this life. Here marriage is a necessary to keep up the race of mankind; there they will, like the angels in heaven, be free from such carnal and superfluous appetites, where their life will be wholly spiritual. He concluded with proving the truth of the resurrection from those of the sacred books, which they professed to acknowledge; which not only put a final end to that dispute, but forced even an approbation from the contrary sect of the Pharisees^k. He next received a singular applause from one of the scribes for his excellent answer concerning the grand and chief command in the law^l; after which he ventured to propose a question to them concerning the Messiah, namely, Whose son they thought he was to be? To which they answered with one accord, the son of David; if so, laid he to them, how came David to call him Lord by the Spirit, Saying, the Lord b said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand? How then think ye he could be at once his Lord and his son (H)? This last question quite nonplused his whole audience, insomuch that they never ventured to put any more puzzling questions to him from that time. It was probably on this night, that being retired with his small attendance to Bethany, he was there invited by Simon, surnamed The Leper, and where Mary came and anointed his head and feet with a fresh quantity of the same precious ointment which she had lately bestowed on him on the like occasion (I); and gave a new subject of murmuring, not to Judas only, but to the rest of the twelve. Jesus excused her a second time as he had done before, and perhaps to the satisfaction of the rest; but Judas, who thought it an unreasonable profusion, resolved that night to go and betray a him to the sanhedrinⁿ.

IN the mean time, Jesus knowing his time to be just at hand, and recollecting how oft the twelve had quarrelled among themselves about precedency, and perhaps had they started the same dispute on this very night^o; to give therefore an effectual check to their unreasonable ambition, so contrary to the spirit of his gospel, and to leave them a lasting memorial of the contrary virtue, instead of rebuking them as he had done heretofore, he rose up from the table, and having laid aside his upper garment, and girded himself with a napkin in the guise of a waiting servant, came with a basin of water, and began to wash their feet, and wipe them with the towel which girded him. Peter however was so offended at this condescension, that he could not at first be prevailed upon to suffer it; whereupon Jesus told him, that though he could not see the reason of it now, he should be made sensible of it in time. But Peter still stiffly persisting in his refusal, was commanded immediately to submit, under the penalty of forfeiting all his right and title in him^p; which terrible threatening frightened him at length into a ready compliance (K). After Jesus had gone round with his

(H) It doth not indeed appear that they had any notion of his divine nature, and therefore might be easily puzzled to answer this question; though it seems from some expressions in the gospel, that they had had some higher idea of him, than that of his being the bare son of David or deliverer of Israel. Thus Nathanael being convinced of his being the Messiah, addresses him with these words, Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel (1). Thus Peter, and Martha also, to name no more, affirmed him to be the Christ the Son of God, that was to come into the world (2).

However, the Jews have since found out a more effectual way of evading the force of this question, by affirming that David did not there speak of the Messiah, it never being the custom any where for the ancestors to give any of their successors the pompous title of their lord; but the meaning of David, according to them is, the Lord (God) said unto my Lord Abraham, Sit thou on my right hand, &c. (3), for Abraham being superior to David in point of geniture, might be properly called lord by him.

(1) The circumstances of these two actions are so alike in all parts, except the first being said to have happened at the house of Lazarus, and this last at that of Simon the leper (so called perhaps, because he had been lately cured of that distemper, either by Jesus, or by some other means) that it is not easy to know whether they were really two, or one and the same. We should be apter to suppose the last, were not the generality of commentators for the first. The house might belong to Simon, and go by his name, and Lazarus might be a tenant, and the master of the feast, and so both evangelists be reconciled.

(K) If ever a non-compliance to a command was justifiable, or even, we had almost said, commendable, it was certainly on this occasion, where it apparently flowed from the deepest regard which that apostle had of his master, as well as from the humblest sense of his own unworthiness. Since therefore Jesus was so far from admitting it as an excuse, that without giving him any further satisfaction, he bids him to obey under the most severe penalty; this whole circumstance seems to be transmitted to us as a warning, how we make our short-sighted reason the standard of our faith or obedience, in things plainly revealed, or expressly commanded. Since God is not obliged to give us, nor we indeed capable of comprehending his all-wise ends and purposes, whose ways and reasons must be allowed to be infinitely above our comprehensions.

- a humble task, he took up his upper garment, and addressed himself to the twelve in words to this effect: Ye rightly call me lord and master; for such I really am; if then you have seen me, for your example and encouragement, condescend so low as to wash your feet (which among the Jews was reckoned the lowest office a man could do to another) know and remember that those who pretend to be my disciples, must never think themselves above performing the lowest office of charity to one another. It is by such acts of mutual and sincere love, that men will know, and I acknowledge you for mine. A new command I leave with you, that as I have loved you, and did not think my life too dear a price to save you, so ye also love one another, and stop at no difficulty or discouragement, where the good of your fellow creatures, especially fellow christians, calls for your charitable assistance. Upon these conditions I leave you my peace, such a peace as neither the world can bestow on you, nor any thing make you capable of tasting the sweet influence of, but the divine virtue I am recommending to you ^{Recommends charity to them.}

AFTER these and some other heavenly discourses, with which he chose to entertain them during the short time he had to stay, that they might make the stronger impression on them; he concluded the whole with an elegant and pathetic description of the last day, when every man should receive the rewards of his deeds done in this life, according as they were either good or evil. And because he knew how apt men were to be more apprehensive of the divine anger for the commission of wilful crimes, than for the omission of such necessary duties, as he had been enforcing; and to find out a salvo to excuse their neglect of them; he chose to awaken them from that fatal mistake, by describing the general inquiry of that solemn day, as running chiefly on these last; that is, whether they had or had not fed the hungry, clothed the naked, visited the sick, and the like; and the retribution of his rewards or punishments, as chiefly dispensed according to their performance or neglect of those essential duties ^{Describes the day of judgment.}.

- WHILST he was instructing his disciples in these and many other excellent truths ^{Wednesday.}, the sanhe'drin were holding their consultations how to lay hands upon him, at some proper season, when the multitude were out of the way. As they therefore feared doing it during the approaching festival, lest they should cause some insurrection among the people, Judas came to their relief, and offered to betray him unto them ^{Judas betrays him.} for a certain reward, which they gladly agreed to, and paid him out of hand. The sum covenanted had been long ago foretold by one of the prophets, and we shall have occasion to speak more of it in the sequel. The feast of unleavened bread or passover being then just at hand, the Jews set about removing all the leaven from their houses, according to the Mosaic law, and preparing themselves for the celebration of that grand festival.

- Thursday* being come, in which Jesus was to celebrate his last, and most solemn ^{Thursday.} passover, he directed two of his disciples by a special token to a house in Jerusalem, where they should prepare all things for it; and he followed them thither with the rest of the twelve towards the evening. When they were set down on their couches, according to the custom of those countries, he drank a glass of wine, with which the master of the family always began the solemnity of the paschal lamb; after which, whilst they were eating, he told them with some concern, that one of them should betray him, pointing to Judas; that Peter, who had always appeared the most zealous, should thrice deny him; and that the rest should all forsake him on that very night; and reminded them of some prophecies, in which these things were written concerning him. At the conclusion of the supper, Jesus took the bread, and having broke and blessed it, distributed it among them, saying, Take, eat, this is my body, ^{Christ's last supper.} which is given for you: do this in remembrance of me. Then taking and blessing the cup of wine also, he said, Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you, and for many, for the remission of sin (L). He ended this

(L) We have contented ourselves with repeating the bare words of this divine institution, without venturing to give them any gloss that should seem to lean towards any of those various systems, which every church and sect has severally formed from them; and which being not only endless, but out of our province, we gladly forbear entering further into, to avoid giving any offence.

The opposition which a considerable writer has of late met with from several quarters, upon his venturing solemn rite, with assuring them, that this was the last wine he should drink; for the traitor's hand, which was shortly to betray him, was just ready to deliver him up to death; when all things that were written of his being numbered with the transgressors would have their full accomplishment*. The whole ceremony was closed as usual with a proper hymn (M); after which, Jesus having again exhorted his disciples to continue steadfast in their faith and reliance on him, and recommended them to the protection and care of his heavenly Father, by a most fervent and pathetic prayer, he ordered them to follow him over the brook Kedron†.

doleful garden.

WHILST they were going to the mount of olives, to a place called Gethsemane (N), Judas slipped from them, and went to the high-priest's palace to get a sufficient number of hands to come and surprise Jesus in his retirement. Jesus on the other hand, being entered into the garden, where he usually resorted, bid some of his disciples to stay and watch near the entrance of it, whilst he took Peter, James, and John, further into the garden; that as they had been the witnesses of his glorious transfiguration, they might now be so of his present sorrows, and dreadful agonies. Having therefore earnestly enjoined them to be watchful, he parted from them about a stone's cast; where his human nature feeling the most violent struggles between flesh and spirit, at the apprehension of his future sufferings, he threw himself prostrate on his face, and with utmost fervency, mixed with the most submissive resignation to the heavenly will, he prayed, that, if it were, possible the dreadful cup might pass from him. He repeated the same prayer twice more, but with such fervency and resignation, that the vehemency of the struggle between those two passions, joined to the prospect of what he was to undergo from the malice of men and devils, threw him into an agony and bloody sweat, inasmuch that there was an angel sent on purpose to comfort and strengthen him under it (O)‡. By this time the traitor Judas, at the head of his armed gang, was far advanced into the garden, whilst the disciples were fallen into a sound sleep. Jesus therefore, having awakened them with the news of his enemies being at hand, went forward to meet them, whilst Judas, who led the van, came to offer him the treacherous kiss, which was to be the signal to the rest; who thereupon surturing to give the world his own particular one on that sacred subject, shews how dangerous it is to revive a controversy of this high nature, in which every side is so jealous of any word that glances even the least contradiction to their received doctrine.

And yet we cannot but own, that too tenacious a zeal seems in this last instance to have carried his opponents censures farther than is perhaps consistent with christian candor and charity. The small regard that is paid to that sacred institute by very great numbers, or on the one hand, and the visible neglect of it in others, from some mistaken dreadful apprehensions about it, might incline that writer to think his book and system excellently well calculated to obviate those two grand obstacles to a more frequent use of it.

As for those men, who from a firm and sincere persuasion, that God displays some further miracles of grace and mercy in that sacrament, find themselves inspired with greater love to God, and charity to men; with a greater propensity to virtue, and abhorrence to vice; and in a word, feel their minds and hearts more effectually attracted from earth to heaven; that author must be supposed too sagacious to have wrote his book for such men, since they could not come down to his notions of it, without being considerable losers by the change.

(M) Or rather what the Jews call the Hallel, consisting of six eucharistical psalms, beginning at the hundred and thirteenth, and ending with the hundred and eighteenth, and with which they used to close all those solemnities (4).

(N) So called probably from the Hebrew גת-השמן, gath-hashemen, the oil-press. For as the mount had its name from the quantity of olive-trees that grew upon it, it is probable that this garden, which was at the foot of it, had a press in it; and this reconciles the evangelists, two of whom mention only the mount (5), another the garden (6), and the fourth the gethsemane or oil-press (7).

(O) This dreadful scene must be confessed to contain some mysteries far enough above our utmost capacities; but which we think may be much more reasonably and safely believed on the authority of the sacred writers, than the latter disputed on the account of the former. The whole economy of man's redemption is every-where represented to us as an unfathomable mystery of divine wisdom and goodness, and as the object of our belief, and not of our comprehension.

For this reason therefore it is that God has taken such care to confirm it to us by the most irrefragable evidence, by types and prophecies from the beginning, and by innumerable miracles and supernatural gifts accompanying the preaching of these saving truths. It was on that divine authority that the primitive christians received them, and sealed their faith in them with their lives; and it is on the same grounds that they have been conveyed to us through a succession of near seventeen centuries; and it will be time enough for us to give up the one, when infidelity has overthrown the other. Till when the imperfect notion we have of the mutual action of our souls and bodies, will be an effectual check how we presume to call in question, or to reconcile those opposite passions in the human to the divine nature of Christ.

a rounded and made sure of him. In the interim Peter drew his sword, and struck off the ear of one of the high-priest's servants, but was severely rebuked for it by his master, who by a miraculous touch, healed the wounded person, and then suffered himself to be bound, and led away as a malefactor, without any other mark of resentment than his observing to them, that it was now their hour, in which the power of darkness was let loose against him. When the eleven heard this saying, they immediately forsook him, and fled according to his prediction (P), and the soldiers conveyed their prisoner first to Annas, the late high-priest, and father-in-law to Caiaphas, who was now in possession of that dignity, as we hinted a little higher out of the Jewish historian ¹.

b HERE they found the sanhedrin sitting, though at that late time of night, and waiting for Jesus to be brought before them, as he was accordingly; upon which the high-priest began to ask him several questions concerning his doctrine and disciples, in hopes to find either some heresy in the one, or rebellion in the other. Jesus contented himself with referring him to these last, whom he told them he had always taught in the most public manner, and who were therefore fittest to bear witness against him, if he had taught them any thing amiss. For this answer, just and modest as it was, an officer struck him a violent blow on the face; and Jesus, having given him a gentle reproof for his rashness, stood before them, with astonishing patience, and humble silence, whilst the instruments of the sanhedrin were busy in seeking out fresh evidence to put him to death. After much ado they brought a couple of fellows, who deposed that they had heard him brag that he would destroy the temple, and rebuild it in three days; but even their evidence jarring in some particulars, as the expression of Jesus was figurative, they dared not condemn him upon it; but were forced to have recourse to another expedient, which was to make him turn his own accuser. Caiaphas therefore, rising up, adjured him by the living God to answer directly to the supreme court, whether he was the Christ the son of God or not (Q); and upon his readily answering in the affirmative, and adding that they should hereafter be convinced of it, when they beheld him sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven; fell a rending his cloaths, which was not lawful for an high-priest to do², and pronounced him guilty of blasphemy. The rest of the court did readily join with him, and having pronounced him guilty of death, and ordered him to be brought early on the next morning to receive his sentence, they left him to the mercy of the guard, who made it the cruel diversion of that night to use him with the vilest indignities and blasphemies³.

c WHILEST this melancholy scene was acting, Peter and John, the latter of whom was known to some of the family, having recovered themselves from their last fright, had got admittance into the hall, willing to know what was likely to be determined concerning their master. Their courage however was soon cooled again, when they saw what treatment he underwent from an enraged and insulting rabble; so that Peter, being thrice challenged for one of his disciples, as often stily denied it, and rather than not be believed, bound it the last time with an oath. The cock crowing now the third time, put him in mind of Jesus's prediction; but that which gave him a more lively sense of his cowardice and perfidy, was a pitying look which he received at that instant from that gracious and forgiving Saviour; upon which the tears gushing plentifully out of his eyes, he was forced to leave the hall to go and hide his grief and shame⁴.

EARLY on the next morning the chief-priests and sanhedrin being convened at their usual place, sent for Jesus to have him further examined, and to pronounce their final sentence upon him, in order to have it ratified by the Roman governor (R). In the mean time, Judas being surpris'd at what had pass'd within the sanhedrin, was stung with such lively remorse, that he came and threw the reward of his treachery down before them, owning himself the vilest of wretches, for having betrayed an innocent person to them; but they, regardless of his sorrow and despair, bid him look to it; upon which he went, and, as most versions render it, hanged himself (S) ^c. But those hypocritical judges were soon after taken with a quite different qualm of conscience, thinking it now unlawful to refund those thirty pieces of silver into the treasury, because it was the price of blood, though they had made no scruple to take them out of it, to purchase that very blood. After some deliberation therefore, they agreed to buy a potter's field with them, for a burying-place for strangers; and in so doing fulfilled an old prophecy, in which the number of pieces, the design for which they were given, the purchase made with them, and the potter, to whose share they came at last, were expressly foretold ^d. The field was accordingly bought soon after the feast was over, and from thence was called in their tongue, Hacceldama, or the field of blood ^e. It stood on the south-side of mount Sion, within a stone-cast of the pool of Siloam.

versal instances of the contrary in the sequel; in particular that of the protomartyr Stephen, who was regularly tried, condemned, and stoned, by their single authority (10), about a year after. But they seem to have had a double end in it; the one to throw the odium of his death, as much as possible, upon Pilate, and the Romans, as if he had condemned him for raising some rebellion against them; and the other, to make him undergo a more severe and ignominious punishment, and such a one as they could not inflict upon him by their own power, because it was not one of those that were prescribed by their law; concerning which the reader may, if he pleases, turn to our first volume [†]. So that their pretence of its not being lawful for them to put any man to death, was no farther true than in cases where the crime was against the state; of which the governor was the proper judge. But as to blasphemy, or any other against the Jewish religion, the instance above related of St. Stephen, plainly shews that they made no scruple to put the guilty person to death without the governor's consent.

Yet nothing of this was done without the direction of providence, since crucifixion was the death which it had been foretold by David he should undergo (11), and which he himself had likewise often hinted, both to the apostles, and to the rest of the Jews (12). Accordingly therefore, the accusation which they intended against him before Pilate, was of a civil nature: We have found, said they, this turbulent fellow raising up seditions, and forbidding to pay tribute to Cæsar (13).

It is true, indeed, when they found that this accusation could not determine that governor, who saw through their malice and injustice, to condemn him; they tack'd the other of blasphemy to it, and insist'd that their law made it capital; but this was only added to give more weight to their other accusation; upon which they wanted him to be condemned; as the sequel will shew.

However, it was necessary to observe these circumstances thus far here, against those, who from the notion of the who's power of life and death being taken away before this time, have inferred that the sceptre spoken of by Jacob (14), was also departed from Judah. The contrary of which will be seen in its due place.

(S) The difficulty which interpreters have found to reconcile what is said of his hanging himself here, with what St. Peter says in another place (15), That he fell headlong, and burst asunder, and his bowels gush'd out, has made them fall into several conjectures, such as the breaking of the rope before he was quite dead, and his throwing himself down some precipice, which brought on the last dismal circumstances of his death, and the like ^{*}; all which is said without foundation.

What the same apostle says a little lower, and which the versions have, as we observed in a former note, misrendered, that he might go into his own place (16), has led others to look upon his fall, bursting, &c. as a further judgment on that unhappy wretch (17), who did yet shew the most lively tokens of a sincere repentance, viz. the most public acknowledgment of his crime, restitution of the ill-gotten money, reparation to the best of his power to the injured person, and an open condemnation of their unjust proceedings against him. Now all these difficulties might be easily removed, if they had rendered the words of St. Matthew, according to Le Scene, that he was suffocated, namely with grief, shame, and remorse, or, which is the same thing, died of a squinancy occasioned by it (18).

His falling on his face, which, as the same critic observes, is all that is implied by what we render, he fell, and others, he thrust himself headlong, and burst asunder, is, it seems, no more than what is common to people in that distemper; who fall down on their faces for want of breath, and commonly burst after it (19). This sense therefore will easily reconcile the two sacred historians, without either doing violence to the text, having recourse to improbable conjectures, or introducing the divine vengeance pursuing even his breathless carcase.

- a selves, and becoming unfit for the approaching solemnity ; but desired the governor to come out to them, whilst they stood in the open place before his palace-gate. When Pilate heard the accusation, and found that it was cognizable by himself alone, he caused Jesus to be brought before his tribunal, where he asked him, whether he was really a king? Jesus readily answered him in the affirmative (T) ; but added at the same time, that his kingdom was not of this world ; for if it had, his servants would have fought in his defence, and saved him from falling into the hands of his persecutors. This was enough to convince the governor of the injustice of his accusation, which he already knew was the effect of some private malice they had against him. However, that he might know something more concerning his imaginary kingdom,
- b for such and no other he seems to have supposed it, he asked him again, Art thou really a king? To which he replied, I am indeed. For this cause was I born, that I might bear witness to the truth ; and none are my subjects, but such as obey the voice of truth. Pilate being still more out of conceit with this new kind of kingdom, contented himself with asking, what he meant by truth? and without staying for an answer, went out to the people, and told them that he could find no fault in their pretended criminal. When the Jewish rulers heard this, they were still more vehement in their accusations. Pilate therefore urged him to give some kind of answer to them ; but he who knew how vain it was to attempt it, made then no other defence than that of a surprising and invincible silence.
- c THE Jews took this opportunity to be more vehement in their invectives, in order to exasperate the fluctuating governor against him, by assuring him that he had filled not only Jerusalem, and all Judæa, but even all his own country of Galilee, with his seditious doctrine. As soon therefore as Pilate heard that he was of that country, and belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, he ordered him to be immediately sent to Herod.
Sent to Herod.
- d Herod was no less glad to see a person, of whom he had heard such wonders, and from whom he expected to have seen some signal miracles ; but Jesus, ready and liberal as he was of them to the poor and afflicted, disdained to work them, either to gratify the curiosity of such a tyrant, or to silence the malice of his enemies ; so that in spite of all their vehement accusations, and of Herod's scornful treatment of him, he would not so much as vouchsafe him an answer to any of his questions. Herod, affronted at his obstinate silence, and his own disappointment, began to treat him as a despicable person, and turned him over to his guards, with orders to send him back to Pilate ; and these after several rude indignities, arrayed him in a gorgeous robe of mockery, and brought him back to the hall of judgment. From this time however, Pilate and Herod laid aside all their resentment, and were perfectly reconciled to each other.
- e WHILEST this was doing, Pilate's wife had sent to warn him against having any hand in condemning of that just person, on whose account she had been terrified with some dreadful dreams that night. The Romans were very observing of these kinds of superstitions ; so that this message made him still more afraid to yield to the pressing instances of the tumultuous Jews. As soon therefore as Jesus was brought back to him, Brought back to Pilate.
- f he came out to them, and plainly told them, that he could not condemn a person, in whom, after the strictest examination, he had not been able to find the least capital crime ; nor even Herod himself, who though much better acquainted with their laws, had sent him back to him absolved. I will therefore, added he, inflict some lighter punishment on him, and let him go. This proposal, instead of mollifying them, made them more instant to have him crucified. He bethought himself at length of another expedient, which he expected would have both saved him, and assuaged their fury. You know, said he to them, that it is a custom for your governors to release to you some one criminal on these festivals, whom you shall name. Tell me therefore, shall I deliver you this man, or Barabbas, who lies in prison for an insurrection and murder? He judged indeed, and reasonably too, that they would not carry their resentment or boldness so far, as to prefer a rebel and a murderer before an innocent person ; and therefore it was that he gave them only the choice of these two. But to his great surprise, the people, instigated by the priests and rulers, demanded
- Barabbas preferred to him.*

(T) Ours and some versions make his answer somewhat ambiguous, as if dared not to speak out, Thou sayest it, or, thou sayest that I am a king; whereas,

according to the Hebrew idiom, it should properly be rendered, It is as thou sayest, I am indeed a king.

Barabbas to be released, and Jesus to be crucified, in spite of all he could say in a his behalf.

SINCE therefore he could not work on their reason and conscience, he resolved to try what he could do on their pity, and ordered Jesus to be sent to the pillar, and to be severely scourged (U); which was accordingly done, and (as we may suppose, from the natural barbarity of the Roman soldiers, as well as from the additional indignities which they offered to him presently after) was executed with utmost severity. After they had untied him, the whole cohort gathered about him, threw a ragged purple robe about his mangled body, set a crown of thorns upon his head, and put a reed in his hand; and whilst some bowed the knee to him in mockery, and saluted him king of the Jews, others did buffet him, spit upon him, and use him with utmost insolence and inhumanity. Pilate thought this a proper time to bring him forth to them in this sad and deplorable guise, not doubting but the sight of so dismal an object would have melted them into pity and remorse. But he little knew the temper of the Jews, and that the more abject and miserable the person appeared, on whom they had fixed such great hopes and expectation, the more they would detest and abhor him. And so he found it happened on this occasion, though to his greatest surprize; and the very people, who but six days before, followed him with their loud Hozannab's, could not now behold him in that abject state, without crying out with greater vehemence, Away with him, crucify him. Pilate, surprized at this horrid cruelty, refused again to comply, alledging that he found no fault in him; upon which the priests and elders finding it impossible to get him condemned for sedition, began to accuse him of blasphemy: We have a law, said they to him, which condemns him to death for calling himself the Son of God. At these last words, Pilate still more terrified, took him again to his tribunal, and asked him several questions, to which Jesus disdainingly answered, he tried again to provoke him to it, by reminding him that it was in his power to condemn or release him. Jesus gave no other answer to it, than by reminding him in his turn, that all his boasted power came to him from above, and that he should therefore be accountable for his abuse of it, though the greater guilt did fall on those who had delivered him up unto him. These last words made such an impression on the governor, that he went out to the people, fully determined, as he thought, at any rate to release him. But during this interval the priests and rulers, who knew but too well the temper of the Roman prætor, bethought themselves of an expedient which would quickly bring him into a compliance; so that before he could well discover his resolution to them, they began to cry out with one accord, and in a threatening tone, Thou art not Cæsar's friend, if thou lettest a man go, who by assuming the royal title, and forbidding to pay the usual tribute, has declared himself his open enemy. This argument proved more powerful than all the rest, and Pilate now no longer daring to refuse their unjust demands, for fear of bringing his loyalty to Cæsar into question, having first washed his hands (W) before them all, and declared himself innocent of the blood of that innocent person, delivered him up to be crucified, and released the seditious murderer, according to their desire ^f.

As soon as Pilate had pronounced that most unjust sentence against the most innocent of men, the Roman soldiers led him back to the hall, where they stripped

^f Vid. MATTH. xxvii. per tot. MARK xv. pass. LUKE xxiii. per tot. JOHN xviii. & xix. pass.

(U) This punishment was not like that used among the Jews, of which we have given an account in a former volume †, and did neither exceed forty stripes, nor was reckoned dishonourable, since even their monarchs were subjected to it. But among the Romans, it was very severe and shameful. The person being stripped naked, at least down to the girdle, had his hands tied to a ring fastened to a stone pillar, not above a foot and half high, if so much, so that his body was bent forward almost double, which gave such an advantage to the executioners, that the blows came down, as it were, with double force.

This particular part of our Saviour's suffering, is rightly supposed to be foretold by the psalmist (10), in these words; The plowers plowed upon my back, and made long furrows. As likewise that of his being buffeted, and scornfully spit upon in the halls of the high-priest, and of the governor; by the prophet Isaiah (21), in these terms; I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; neither did I hide, or defend, my face from being shamefully spit upon.

(W) This mock ceremony seems to have been a kind of form used by judges in cases of this unjustifiable nature. Else Pilate could not but be conscious, that all the water of the sea could not wash away the guilt of his unrighteous sentence; no! not, though the impious Jews did then pray that the sin and punishment of it might fall on them and their unhappy posterity (22).

- a him of his mock royalty, and put on him his own garments; and having laid his cross on him, they led him with two other criminals out of the city (X), to a place called in Hebrew, Golgotha, and in Latin, Calvary, to be crucified. His tender body, quite spent with watching and sufferings, beginning to sink under its weight; they compelled a Cyrenean Jew †, named Simon, to help to bear his cross after him. In this doleful march he beheld some women melting into tears at the sight of his deplorable condition; but it seems as if the more dreadful fate, which waited the unhappy Jews, had made him quite insensible of his own misery; for turning to them with usual compassion, he bid them rather weep at the more dismal prospect of their future ruin; when their calamities would make them wish their wombs had been barren, and their
- b breasts incapable of yielding any nourishment to a generation, whose infidelity would shortly render them the sad objects of the divine vengeance, and the scorn and hatred of the world ‡.

- I τ was now about the sixth hour of the day, answering to our mid-day (Y), when they came to the place, where they offered him some wine mixed with myrrh (Z), which, when he had tasted, he refused to drink. They then stripped him of his cloaths, and extending his body on the cross, fastened him to it, with nails driven through his hands and feet, whilst he was earnestly praying to his Father to forgive them a deed which they committed through ignorance. After which they reared up the cross, and fixed it on the ground, so that his body hung on four wounds, made

(X) The Jews suffered no criminals to be put to death in any of their cities, much less in the metropolis; and this was done in imitation of what had been practised in their camps in the wilderness (23), and was typified by the red heifer and scape-goat, of which we have spoken in a former volume *; so that Christ, the grand propitiatory victim, was led, laden with the sins of mankind †, to be offered up without the gates of Jerusalem.

Golgotha or Calvary was a rocky hill on the west side of the city (24), and was a kind of charnel store-house, from which it had those names, which signify the place of a skull, probably from its resemblance to it; and was also made use of for a place of execution.

It is supposed by the ancient fathers to have been the mountain where Abraham went to sacrifice his son. Some of them add, on the authority of a Jewish tradition, that the skull of Adam had been there buried by Shem, to whom his father gave it in charge after the flood, as it was he who was to people the holy land (25).

(Y) The difference between St. Mark, who calls it the third hour (26), and the other two evangelists, who call it the sixth (27), is easily reconciled by their different ways of dividing the day, namely, either into twelve hours, beginning at the sun-rise (28), which the two last follow, and into four parts, called also hours; but which they distinguished only by three, six, nine, and twelve; and these were the usual hours to repair to the temple or synagogues, &c. to pray (29); and to this last way of reckoning the former seems to allude, calling it the third hour, probably because the sixth was not quite begun. Perhaps also is he there speaking, not of his real crucifixion, but of the Jews obtaining Pilate's sentence of it against him, which was certainly near the third hour, or our nine of the clock in the morning.

(Z) This mixture was probably given to intoxicate the sufferers, that they might be less sensible of their torment; and Jesus might refuse it upon that very account, because it became him, who was then going to offer himself a free and voluntary sacrifice to God for the sins of men, and was to shew them a pattern how to bear afflictions with due resignation to the divine will; to avoid a thing which might too far discompose his thoughts, and shew too ill a precedent to his followers.

One of the evangelists makes this mixture consist of myrrh and wine (30), and another of vinegar and gall (31). Hence some suppose; that though the former was usually given on such occasions, yet the soldiers out of spite and contempt gave him the latter, which would have a contrary effect. But we much doubt whether the Romans, naturally delighting in being cruel to persons in misery, could be capable of so much compassion towards criminals. Their barbarous sports and spectacles argue rather the reverse. Besides, the vinum myrrhatum, we are told (32), was highly esteemed by them, in so much that one of the laws of the twelve tables forbade their dead to be washed, or sprinkled with it. And who can imagine that they would bestow it on such criminals as they condemned to this kind of death, which was held in the greatest ignominy and reproach among them?

It is more likely, that the evangelist, who wrote in the Hebrew or Syriac, made use of the word מר, mar, which signifies bitterness, or any bitter ingredient, and that his translator mistook it for מור, mor, myrrh; and thus the two evangelists will be reconciled, and the prophecy fulfilled, They gave me gall to eat, and in my thirst, vinegar to drink (33). For the whole tenor of this psalm seems to be a continued prophecy of Christ's sufferings, as well as of that judicial blindness, ruin, and dispersion, which fell on the impenitent Jews (34).

(A) These are reasonably supposed to have been two of the gang of those free-booters, whom the Jews

being numbered with transgressors ^b. Pilate had likewise ordered the title of his accusation to be fixed to the cross; it was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, the three most known tongues at that time, and in these words; Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews. The chiefs were therefore highly affronted at it, and came to beg of Pilate to have it altered, and instead of calling him king of the Jews, to have it inserted that he assumed that title to him. But he as stiffly refused it, and sent them away with this haughty answer, What I have written, I have written. Here, whilst the soldiers, who were set to watch him, fulfilled another prophecy of him, in the division they made of his garments, and casting lots on his robe, because it was without seam, and woven from top throughout ^c; the priests and elders were verifying another, in the scornful taunts and injurious reflections they cast upon him in the height of his anguish, and dying pangs. He saved others, said they, in a deriding tone; but cannot save himself: he pretended to trust in God, let him now deliver him, if he had such delight in him ^b. Their example was followed by all the multitudes that were gathered to see the dismal sight. The very criminals, who were crucified on each side, could not forbear reviling him, till one of them, stung at last with some lively remorse, gave his fellow-sufferer a severe rebuke for his impiety; then addressing himself to the suffering Jesus, who was then, more than ever, touched with a feeling of our infirmities, and sympathizing with his torments and agonies; in the humblest terms confessed his own guilt; and in that pathetic and glorious confession he made of him, whilst under the same shameful sentence and punishment, gave such a signal instance of his faith and piety, as no age of the christian church since that time could ever parallel (B); and for which he received this comfortable assurance, from him that had the keys of life and death, This day shalt thou be with me in paradise ^c.

WHILST Jesus hanged on the cross, he beheld his sorrowful virgin mother standing by, on whom was now verified the saying of old Simeon, that a sword should pierce her very soul; and with her stood his beloved disciple, with Mary Magdalen, and some other women. The sight of her grief, which must be supposed to be beyond expression at this dismal juncture, revived his tenderness for her; so that being now come to the last period of his life, he recommended her to the care of that favourite disciple, intreating them to shew to each other from thenceforward the endearing duties of mother and son; and from that time John took her to his own house ^d. In the mean time a horrid darkness overspread the face of the earth; the sun hid, as it were, himself from so dismal a sight (C); all the spectators were seized with a sudden terror and Jews called Ῥοιδῶν, liffessin, and the Romans pradones; such as, we have observed in a former section, used to infest those countries, and had given Herod so much trouble to suppress.

(B) This remarkable circumstance is the more worthy being observed in all its parts, because many a wicked person have flattered themselves with a dangerous notion, that some such short ejaculation at their last agonies, will meet with the like success, though in every other particular quite opposite to him.

He sees Jesus rejected and condemned by his whole nation, who had been witnesses of his stupendous works; sentenced by the Romans; reviled by the Jewish priests and elders; forsaken by his own disciples; undergoing a most ignominious and excruciating death; and yet under all those disadvantageous circumstances acknowledges him a King, a Saviour, and a Lord. He proclaims the unrighteousness of his sentence, and the justice of his own: he declares his faith and hope in him; his belief of another life; and so submissive is he under his torments, that instead of praying to be delivered from them, either by some miracle, or by a speedy death, his extreme humility will not suffer him to ask for more than a bare remembrance of him, when he came into his kingdom.

(C) This darkness was the more miraculous, because it happened in the time of the opposition of the two luminaries, when consequently there could be no eclipse of the sun. For we have formerly observed, that the passover began in the full moon ^a; besides, the total darkness of the sun's eclipses lasted but at most twelve or fifteen minutes; whereas this is recorded to have lasted three full hours (35). Whether it reached the whole hemisphere, or only the land of Judah, is not easily determined, the ancient fathers being divided about it. Origen and some others confined it to the latter (36), whilst others (37) extend it over the former. These quote the famous astronomer Phlegon, the free-man of the emperor Adrian, who affirms, that in the fourth year of the CCII olympiad, which is supposed to be that of the death of Christ, there was such a total eclipse of the sun at noon-day, that the stars were plainly to be seen. It has indeed been disputed whether this year of Christ's crucifixion answered to that of the olympiad abovementioned; and what is there of this nature that some bold critics will not dispute? but we shall refer our readers for a fuller view of the controversy to the learned doctor Dawson's dissertation on that subject. Tertullian, in his usual elegant way, refers the hearers to their public records for this surprising phenomenon, wherein mid-

a amazement. Some returned to Jerusalem, smiting their breasts, and proclaiming him a righteous man, whilst the rest, more hardened, stood in a kind of mournful silence, expecting the event. This unnatural darkness and disorder, which lasted from the sixth to the ninth hour, that is, from noon to three of the clock after it, was followed by a greater, when Jesus, quite spent with pain and anguish, cried out, Eli, Eli, Lama Sabachtani (D); and having tasted the mingled vinegar, which was offered to night happened at noon day (38). And Suidas introduces Dionysius the Areopagite, then at Heliopolis, in Egypt, exclaiming himself to his friend Apollophanes concerning this unnatural eclipse; that either the Author of nature suffered, or was sympathizing with the sufferer.

(D) Or, which is more probable, repeated the whole twenty-second psalm, of which those are the title, or first words, and in which there are the most lively strokes of all the remarkable particulars of his passion; some of which we have already quoted, others we have elsewhere explained in a manner wholly new, and yet satisfactory, as we have found, to many of our readers *. The word נִבְּחָנִי, habachtani, here used, instead of the Hebrew נִבְּחָנִי, hazabithani, shews that it was quoted out of the Chaldee paraphrase, which was then the most in use, and in which alone that word is to be found (39). So that he seems here to have, as it were, reminded his heavenly Father, how he was now fulfilling all those prophecies contained in that psalm, which is a kind of epitome or summary of all the other oracles relating to his sufferings and death. In consequence of which, he was praying to him that he would make good to him, and to his spiritual posterity, that is, to his church; all those gracious promises which are contained in the latter part of the same psalm, from the twenty-second verse to the end.

The Jews therefore, who knew that there was no other way, then to quote either a psalm, or any other section of holy writ, but from the first words of it, as we have elsewhere shewn †, might have saved their invectives against Christ, as if he had been then seized with a kind of despair (40), and objecting to him the words of the psalmist, I never saw the righteous forsaken, &c. (41). Our commentators might likewise have saved themselves the trouble of accounting for this seemingly despairing exhortation, from the supposition that the Deity had wholly withdrawn every spark of comfort and hope from him, whilst he was thus undergoing the punishment due to sin; some of whom have carried it to such a height, as cannot be read without horror (42). Whereas the supposition above-mentioned, that he was then repeating this noble psalm, which after the capitulation of his unparalleled sufferings, concludes with the most comfortable promises both to him and his followers; shews him to have been so far from either doubt or despair, that he comforted himself under the terrible weight of the former by the assured prospect of the latter. And that he really died in this godlike temper of mind, all the other circumstances of his passion and death, as well as his last dying ejaculations, and the noble testimony which the centurion gave of it, do plainly shew.

And here we beg leave to make one remark more on the elaborate metrical version, mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, wherein that learned prelate, speaking of the psalm we are now upon, thinks to have found in it such difference of style, matter,

&c. that he cannot forbear supposing they are two different psalms, absurdly tacked together by the Jews, and which ought to be divided at the twenty-second verse above-mentioned, where a kind of new theme seems to begin.

But with due submission to his lordship's great judgment, we think this difference of style, &c. highly consistent with the two fold design of it, the one to foretel the great humiliation of Christ, and the other to shew his glorious exaltation immediately following it (43). The subject of those two prophecies being vastly different, it could hardly be otherwise, but the style must be so likewise. We may add, that the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, which runs almost parallel in both their cases, and is allowed by all christians, as it was once by the ancient Jews, to relate to the Messiah (44), might be as properly divided into two, as this psalm; which yet never came into any man's head, on account of that difference, or any other. No not even in that of the Jews, though so closely pinched by it, that they have even ventured to split the person there spoken of into two.

Before we dismiss this noble psalm, we beg leave to answer an objection which the latter raise against our reading in the sixteenth verse, וְנָדְוּ, carne, they pierced my hands, &c. instead of וְנָדְוּ, carne, which they pretend is the true reading, and signifies like a lion, as if the meaning had been, my hands and feet, like those of a lion; (to which they were forced to add to make it sense,) were watched or observed. And this exchange of the latter for the former they do not scruple to charge us with, as done designedly by the sacred historian (45).

As we have no manuscript of so old a date as to be able to decide the matter on either side, it might be a sufficient answer to observe to them the unlikelihood, that St. Matthew, who was a converted Jew, and wrote in a language so well understood by the whole nation, should dare to quote a passage so contrary to its received reading and sense, if theirs had really been the right one.

We might tell them farther, that by their own confession the septuagint version had altered the sense of several texts of scripture, which they thought looked derogatory of either their law-giver, or of the Messiah. Of this last nature was the changing of the words of the text, Mine ears hast thou bore, for a body hast thou prepared for me. Concerning which we have spoken more fully in our first volume ‡; to which we might add, that Justin Martyr charges them (46) with having made many other more considerable alterations, and in particular with having expunged the words ἀπο τοῦ ξύλου out of the tenth verse of the ninety-sixth psalm, when both that version, and the ancient Latin one made from it, called Vetus Latina, read, Dicite in gentibus, Dominus regnavit à ligno; which last words are likewise to be seen in some other versions in the same tongue (47); and is it not more reasonable to think, that when the old Masoretes came to find what use was made inbitter his last gasp, recommended his spirit into the hands of his heavenly Father, ^a and in an agony of prayer yielded up the ghost.

The strange prodigies which happened at his death.

FOR immediately upon his expiring, the frame of nature fell, as it were, into convulsions: the earth quaked, the rocks were cleft asunder, the graves opened, the dead raised; and the veil which covered the most holy place, was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, uncovering thereby those mysteries of the Mosaic dispensation, which had now in his death their full accomplishment; in token of which he broke out in his last agonies with those signal words, It is finished. Here the centurion and infidel soldiers, observing his meek and pious exit, and the miraculous circumstances which attended it, were struck with such admiration and dread, that they confessed him to be the Son of God ^b. Not so did the Jewish priests and elders, who remained inflexible in spite of all these prodigies, and pursued their malice to the utmost, and without the least relenting. It was now past three of the clock, the time in which the evening lamb was daily offered up; and this was the eve of their sabbath, and of one of their grand festivals; that the solemnity of it therefore might not be sullied or disturbed by the hanging of the three bodies on the cross ^c, they went to beg of Pilate, that he would order their legs to be broke, and that they might be taken down, and carried off. This was immediately executed on the two criminals; but when they came to Jesus, and found him already dead, they broke not his legs, but one of the soldiers seemingly out of wantonness struck his lance into his side, which immediately issued forth water and blood. These last circumstances happened, not without a peculiar direction of providence, not only as they fully assured us of his being really dead, ^c but as they verified two signal prophecies concerning him; the one, that not a bone of his should be broken ^d; and the other, that they, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, should behold him whom they had pierced ^e.

Christ embalmed and buried.

WHILST these things were transacting on mount Cavalry, Joseph of Arimathea (E), a wealthy and honourable Jewish ruler, and a secret disciple of Jesus, but yet of such courage and integrity, as to protest against their violent and unjust proceedings against him, went boldly to Pilate, and begged leave to take down and bury his sacred remains. Pilate at first could scarcely believe that he could be so soon dead, but being assured of it by the centurion, he readily granted his request. Joseph had ^d a garden adjoining to the place, in which he had hewn a new tomb in the rock, which he designed for himself, but was now by a particular providence better disposed of, and was made the repository of his master's body. We have formerly observed in what manner criminals that died by the hands of justice were to be buried apart ^f; but in reconding him in this maiden grave, they seem to have fulfilled another signal prophecy in the same chapter of Isaiab, where the history of his sufferings is so lively represented, and where this remarkable circumstance is foretold, that though he was made of this text against them, they might at first slide the קרי in the margin, or keri, and by degrees change that into the ketib; than to suppose an evangelist to be guilty of such a manifest and wilful corruption. Those who are unacquainted with the terms of keri and ketib, may see what we have said of them at the beginning of this chapter ^{*}.

But let the words have slipped in or out of the text as they will, as long as they own that קרי is the true reading, it will be sufficient to answer them with the learned Hettinger, in his dissertation on that word, that it may as well be the participle קרי, and so signify as properly piercing, the & being there euphonical or hemantic; in which case the sense will run still more elegant and agreeable to the Hebrew idiom, which often uses the participle for the verb, piercing my hands and my feet; whereas, take the caari in the Jewish signification, the sense is imperfect, and must be supplied with a far-fetched verb, to make it intelligible.

However, we are far enough from allowing this last to be the true ancient reading; the contrary has been fully proved from the septuagint version, which read it as we do, Carn; and from the confession of several rabbi's, as the reader may see, among many more, in the two learned authors quoted in the margin (48).

(E) The same which is called in the sacred Hebrew books Ramah, and Ramathah, and signifies a high place; and this is the reason why we meet with several of the same name, which have been confounded one with another. This therefore here spoken of by the evangelists, and which St. Jerom places between Joppa and Lydda (49), and some modern travellers on an eminence between the former and Jerusalem, being consequently on the west of that metropolis, was very different from Ramathaim Zophim, Samuel's native place, which was situate on the north of it. As the reader may see by comparing Saul's journey in search of his father's asses (50), with the map of Palestine (1).

- a numbered (in his death) with the transgressors, yet he should have his grave among the great or wealthy¹. Nicodemus, another of his private disciples, assisted at this doleful rite; and these two having hastily embalmed the body with a large quantity of myrrh and aloes, and wrapt it in a new winding sheet, deposited it into this new sepulchre, wherein no corps had as yet been laid; and covered the mouth of it with a large stone, not to be removed but by a good number of hands; after which they went to prepare themselves for the celebration of the ensuing solemnity². In the mean while the jealous Jews went to Pilate, and acquainted him, that Jesus, whom they there style this deceiver, had formerly boasted that he would rise again on the third day; and that it was therefore highly necessary to have his tomb well guarded till then, lest his disciples should privately steal him away, and then give out that he was really risen, which would make the last mistake more dangerous than the first. Pilate easily agreed to what they asked, and to prevent any imposition of that kind, told them, Ye have a guard (F); go ye therefore and make every thing as sure as you can. So they went and set a guard at the door of the sepulchre, and set their seal upon the stone³; and by their extraordinary care to prevent any private attempt, made the truth of his resurrection appear in the stronger light, as we shall see in the next section.

(F) We think there is here a material circumstance, which has hitherto past unobserved, and which still more secures the truth of Christ's resurrection, viz. his tomb being guarded, not by a Roman, but a Jewish watch. The former might have been liable to suspicion, and these Pagan soldiers, little minding whether the Jews or Christ's disciples were most in the right, might have been bribed by the latter to connive at an attempt to impose on a whole nation, which they hated and despised. But a Jewish guard, or, as they are elsewhere called, the officers and band of the high-priests (2), and were perhaps the same who had so lately brought him from the garden into that pontiff's palace, where they had made him suffer so many indignities, these, we say, could not be supposed to join in such a cheat.

Now this seems to be the reason why Pilate, who by his late behaviour seems to have entertained a much higher notion of Christ, might now be so far apprehensive of his keeping his promise, that to prevent all suspicion from him or his soldiers, he tells the Jewish chiefs, You have a guard of your own; make the best use you can of it. We do not however pretend to insinuate, that they were permitted by the Romans to keep any troops of militia of their own; but only, that since the high-priesthood had been joined to the royalty in the time of the Maccabees, they used to have a considerable body of life-guards, it is more than probable, that after those two dignities were parted, the pontiffs were still allowed the same, though perhaps in a less number, or else it will be difficult to guess what to make of those soldiers and officers of the high-priest, which are so often met with in the gospels, and in the acts.

The history of the Jews from Christ's resurrection to the total destruction of their city and temple, and dispersion of that people.

- a WE have hitherto seen Jesus Christ the Son of God in his lowest humiliation, despised, rejected, and abhorred; persecuted, tried and condemned to a death of utmost shame and ignominy; expiring on a cross, and laid in a grave, and in all these respects in the lowest and most abject condition of a man. The third day after his death, being the first day of the week, or our Sunday, and the fifth of *April*¹, offers him to our view in his glorified state, and risen again from the dead, according to his own promises, and the oracles written of old concerning him². By the earliest dawn of this day, those pious women, who had accompanied him through his last three years travels, and had prepared a costly mixture to embalm his body, not dreaming at least of his so sudden resurrection, made their way towards the place, where they had seen him deposited two days before. They do not seem to have known any thing of a guard being set over it, their great concern was only how to get the ponderous stone rolled from the entrance. But that obstacle was already ^a taken off by a miraculous earthquake, which had likewise put the guards to flight, so that at their arrival they found the stone rolled on one side, and an angel clothed in a refulgent array sitting upon it. Their surprise was still greater, when they heard the heavenly messenger reprove their officious, but untimely piety, in words to this effect: Why seek ye the living among the dead, forgetful of what he often repeated to you, that he was to suffer death, and to rise again on the third day? Behold the place where he was laid, and from which he is risen, and go and acquaint his disciples with it, and tell them, that he will meet you in Galilee according to his promise. They did so accordingly, and with the greatest joy and wonder, went and told them what they had seen and heard; but those, still backward to believe, ^b looked upon it as the effects of fancy and delusion ^c.

Two of them however had the curiosity to run to the sepulchre: John, who was the youngest of the two, came first; and stooping down, found that the body was really gone; but when Peter came next, he went into the place along with that beloved disciple, and to their surprise found the grave-cloaths, and the napkin, not hastily and confusedly thrown by, but neatly folded up separately; upon which they began to entertain some hopes, and returned to acquaint the rest with the news ^d. Whilst they were thus together, and the women with them, Mary Magdalen, who had stayed in the garden, prying about to find whether the body had not been removed to some other place; came hastily to them, and assured them that the Lord had appeared to her there ^e. But neither could this further confirmation dispell either their sorrow or unbelief; till Jesus at length came and shewed himself to them, gave them a gracious All hail, and bid them be of good comfort, for he was alive again, and according to his promise, would shortly meet them in Galilee. In the mean time the frightened guards leaving the garden with utmost speed and confusion, went to acquaint the chief-priests and rulers with what had happened; upon which a counsel was immediately called: here one might have reasonably expected they would either have yielded to so much evidence, or at least suspended all further resolutions, till they had made a full inquiry into the fact. But instead of that, they rather chose at any rate to suppress a truth, which was sure to cast the deepest guilt on their late unjust sentence against Christ ^f; and accordingly bribed the watch with a good round sum, to give out, that his disciples had stolen him away whilst they were asleep, promising them at the same time, that if the matter came to the governor's ears, they would find means to pacify him, and bear them harmless. Upon which they went and spread abroad that report, which was readily swallowed by the greatest part of the Jews, and went still current among them for many years ^g (A).

ON that evening two of the disciples going to a village called Emmaus, distant about sixty furlongs, or eight miles north-west of Jerusalem, were discoursing with each other about the strange transactions of the day, when Jesus overtook them, and without making himself known, asked them the cause of their melancholy entertainment. Cleophas, one of the two, in a kind of surprise, that he should seem so great a stranger to the transactions of the last week, began to give him an account both of them, and of those of that day; particularly their surprise at the vision, which the women had seen at the sepulchre, concluding the whole with a kind of complaint, that though they had hitherto looked upon Jesus as the future deliverer of their unhappy nation; yet it being now three days since they had seen him expire on a shameful cross, their hopes were almost at an end, in spite of the women's report of his resurrection,

(A) So says the evangelist (1). But the Jews have since found out another way to oppose this signal truth, by denying that of his crucifixion, under pretence that it was a punishment unusual and unwarranted among them. We have had frequent occasion to mention this and some others of their poor and shameful evasions, and shall not repeat them here.

Much less shall we take upon us to answer all the cavils which our modern sceptics have raised against this important article, which has been so strenuously defended by so many abler hands, and more particularly of late by a very learned pen, and in a manner wholly new, but so convincing, that nothing need be added to it (2), as indeed nothing has or can be replied to it.

- a and its being in some measure confirmed by some of the apostles, who had been that morning at the sepulchre. Here Jesus took occasion to blame their want of faith, not only in him, but in the scriptures, where both his sufferings and death, resurrection and glory, were so plainly foretold, and to give them a thorough exposition of them from the first to the last. By this time they were got to the village, where Jesus made a shew as if he designed to go farther; but they had been so comforted by his discourse, that they intreated him to spend that night with them, the evening being then just upon closing. He went in with them accordingly, and being sat down at table, began with the breaking of the bread, as he had been wont to do; upon which they knew him, and he immediately vanished. This surprising discovery, added to the warmth
- b which their hearts had felt, whilst he expounded the scriptures to them on the road, would not suffer them to tarry longer there; but they went to communicate their joy that very night, to the rest that were then gathered together at Jerusalem, and who acquainted them at the same time with his having appeared unto them ^h.

ALL these circumstances had been so far from convincing them hitherto, that they rather concluded from his so sudden disappearing, that they had only seen some spirit in his likeness. They seemed still more confirmed in it, when being sat down to supper, with the gates fast, for fear of the Jews, he surprized them with his presence, and gave them his usual salutation, Peace be to you. To convince them therefore of their mistake, he commanded them to draw near, and consider his pierced

c hands and feet, handle his body, and satisfy themselves by all proper means, that he was no spirit or phantasm, but their real risen lord and master. Whilst they were still fluctuating between joy and doubt, he reminded them of his former promises, explained those oracles to them, in which these things were presignified of him, renewed his former commission and power to them to preach and confirm his gospel, and left them for that night with his usual blessing, full of joy and wonder, to collect and compare the several transactions of that glorious and signal day (B) ⁱ.

- Thomas*, one of the eleven apostles, called Didymus, happened to be absent when this happened; so that when the rest informed him of it, he plainly told them that he should never believe it, till he had thrust his fingers into the print of the nails,
- d and his hand into his wounded side. Eight days after, being the twelfth of April, Jesus appeared again unto them, when Thomas was there, and invited him to come and take that full demonstration, which he had so stiffly insisted on; but the incredulous servant being now fully assured without it, fell at his gracious feet, and with an humble ecstasy of joy, confessed him to be his Lord and his God; upon which he was dismissed with this gentle reproof; Thou believest, Thomas, because thou hast seen; but blessed are they that have not seen, and yet believe ^k. Some days after, they all left Jerusalem, and went according to his appointment into Galilee; where he appeared again unto them, and after his usual salutation, said unto them, All power is given me in heav'n and earth. Go therefore and preach to all nations; baptizing them in the name
- e of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, &c. ^l Seven of them being soon after gone to the sea-side to fish, namely Peter, John, James, Thomas, Bartholomew, or Nathanael, and two others, not named, and having toiled all night in vain, Jesus manifested himself again to them in the morning, by the kind and known token of a beneficial miracle; and after they had dragged their loaded net to the shore, condescended to eat and drink with them. After breakfast, Jesus addressing himself to Peter, asked whether he loved him more than the rest? and being answered in the affirmative, commended him to feed his flock. He repeated the same question twice more to him, inasmuch that Peter, being grieved at it, broke out into this expression; Lord, thou, who knowest all things, must know that I love thee. After this treble confession of
- f his unfeigned love, designed probably as a kind of expiation for his treble denial of him, Jesus plainly told him, that the time would come when he should make a much more authentic acknowledgment of him, when he suffered himself to be bound and led to a glorious martyrdom for his sake, and in imitation of him, intimating thereby, as the evangelist hints, his crucifixion, by which he was to glorify God, as he did accordingly many years after, with a constancy becoming a chief apostle (C). This was

(C) The sufferings and martyrdom of the primitive preachers of the gospel being not only an irrefragable testimony of their sincerity, as well as assurance of the facts and truths delivered by them, but moreover one of the highest instances of the divine wisdom and power, which was to be displayed in the propagation of it (4); it will not be amiss to speak a little more fully of them in this place, and upon this occasion; since the thread of this chapter will not permit us to follow them into those foreign countries, where they sealed it with their blood.

Whoever considers what a strenuous opposition the degenerate world has always made to christianity, must own, that whatever fate had attended the preachers of it, was sure to be turned into an objection against it. Were they encouraged, admired, and caressed, or did their charitable labour meet with suitable returns, No wonder, would it have been said, they are so zealous and indefatigable to propagate a gospel, which turns so much to their credit and advantage. Were they despised, abhorred, persecuted, and liable to the most shocking discouragements, how inconsistent would it have been thought with the divine goodness and justice, to suffer such faithful, zealous and charitable servants to be thus treated by those, whom their chief study and design was to render the most happy persons both here and hereafter; or to permit men of such excellent and godlike dispositions to be exposed to the barbarous fury of the very vilest of human race!

What medium the most consummate human forecast could have found out between these two cases, we may well be at a loss to imagine. But here it was that infinite wisdom and power triumphed in such a manner as was once more to confound the most wise and prudent of the world. And this was done, by creating, as it were, such a new nature in those primitive professors of the gospel, as should not only render them insensible of, but even capable of receiving the most ecstatic comforts, in the most excruciating torments, to which they were going to be exposed. By this, the objections of worldly gain on their part, or of injustice on God's, were fully obviated; whilst the amazed world beheld them most calm, serene, and joyful, when, to all human appearance, they laboured under the heaviest loads of pain, and misery.

This miraculous change once wrought in them, they are no more the cowards that forsook their master, or shut to their doors for fear of the Jews; but in the synagogues, the streets, and even to the face of death, freely confess and preach him (5). Peter, who through fear of the danger of being his, had thrice denied and forsworn him, can now sleep as calmly and soundly in a dungeon, with his hands and feet loaded with irons, and on the eve, as he thought, and Herod designed, of his martyrdom, as if he had been in his own bed, and out of all danger (6). Paul and Silas, after having been unmercifully scourged, are thrust down into the lowest hold of a common gaol, and are heard by all the prisoners to sing psalms and hymns in the middle of the night (7).

In a word, this surprizing change was not confined to the apostles, disciples, and preachers of the gospel, much less to the infancy of it; but extended itself to their proselytes, of all ranks, ages, sexes, conditions, and countries, during near three hundred years, if not much beyond. All which is a subject so well known and attested, not only by the primitive fathers and apologists; the former of whom, sealing the truth with their blood, and the latter, moreover, appealing to the records of their enemies, and the notoriety of the facts, must consequently be allowed unexceptionable witnesses; but likewise by the very heathen authors themselves, who seemed as much to despise them for their folly, as they were astonished at their universal constancy; so that it would be superfluous to insist longer upon it.

We are not insensible indeed how much the innumerable instances of this kind, which we meet with in the later histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and others, have been thought exaggerated, and what little credit those writers have of late among us. The story of a Lawrence throwing his sarcastical jests on his judges and executioners, whilst broiling on a gridiron, has been thought so monstrously absurd, and unnatural, that it has almost discredited all the rest. We would therefore beg leave to ask these doubtful gentlemen, whether they would have believed that story, had it been transmitted down to us by any, but christian writers; or, which is still more, by men professed enemies to christianity, and at the same time of avowed sense, learning, and integrity? If they would, we hope we may be permitted to subjoin one here of altogether as surprizing a nature, and upon the authority of a person of the unquestionable character last mentioned.

Libanius the famous orator of Antioch, a person greatly esteemed by all for his learning and humanity, but especially by the emperor Julian, as appears by their mutual literary intercourse, is the author we are speaking of (8). The story he relates is of one Mark, a venerable old bishop of Arethusa, a city in Syria, between Emesa and Epiphania; who endured the most exquisite torments under the above-mentioned emperor, not only with utmost constancy, but braved his enemies with such biting sarcasms in the midst of his torments, that being at last overcome by his heroic behaviour, they were forced to let him down, and go off with his life, to prevent the heathen spectators falling down and worshipping him. The design of this story, as well as of the orator's letter, was to stop a persecution newly raised under that apostate monarch against the christians, for the havock they had made of the Pagan temples under his predecessor's reign; and the judge to whom he writes it, had then a zealous christian prisoner, named Oriem, who, it was apprehended, would prove a second Mark, if the same severities should be used against him, and much more, lest the known constancy of the rest should cause an universal defection from paganism. For which reason Libanius, though a bitter enemy to christianity, is for putting an immediate stop to all further persecution.

His letters, to the number of above sixteen hundred, though preserved in manuscript, in several public as well as private libraries, and a good number of them printed and translated into Latin (9), are yet so little known by our English readers, that we hope it will not be thought impertinent, if we subjoin here a was the third time of his appearing to the full body of his disciples after his resurrection. After that prediction, Jesus bid Peter come after him; who turning about, and seeing the beloved disciple, asked his master, whether he would have him also follow him? But Jesus rebuked his untimely curiosity, with telling him, If I will have him tarry till I come, what have you to do with it? hence arose a strange notion among the rest, that that disciple should not die^m; though in all probability, Christ meant no more than his tarrying on earth, till his coming to take vengeance on the Jewish nation, which St. John actually lived to see totally dispersed.

b Thus did our risen Saviour manifest himself, either to his whole church, or to some of them more particularly, during the space of forty days, in all convincing proofs. Instructing them still further in his heavenly doctrine, discoursing more familiarly with them of his spiritual kingdom, dispelling their doubts, allaying their fears, and comforting their hearts with the glorious prospect of an eternal life to crown their painful and arduous race. At length the appointed time of his departure drawing near, he gathered them together, to the number, as St. Paul tells us, of above five hundredⁿ. He led them into a retired part of a mountain, where he again gave them fresh assurances of his never-failing love, care and protection, to the end of the world, renewed his commission and miraculous powers to them, together with the promise of a plentiful effusion of his Holy Spirit to direct them into all truth, and fit them for their glorious work, the conversion of the world^o.

here the substance both of the letter, and of this signal story; though, for the better understanding of it, we shall be forced to have recourse to Theodore's (10) assistance. For the style of the former is so intricate and laconic every-where, especially where he speaks of things and facts of a recent nature, and universally known, that without the guide of some other historian, one would never guess what he means or alludes to, because he contents himself with the bare hint of them, as the reader may see by the letter itself (11). We hope the curiousness of the subject, as well as the character of the author, will excuse the length of this note; though, to shorten it as much as we can, we shall join the account out of those two authors together, leaving it to our readers to compare them with each other at their own leisure.

"Mark, the heroic bishop in question, having in the reign of Constantine built a christian church by and on the ruins of a Pagan temple, and being like to suffer for it under Julian, endeavoured at first to avoid it by flight; where being informed that some of his diocese were going to be taken up for it, he came back and surrendered himself to the heathen officers, as the only person accountable for that fact. But these, without regard to his learning, dignity, or great age, ordered him to be stripped naked, and scourged from head to foot. From thence he was flung into a stinking common-shore; and being taken out again, was exposed in that condition to the mercy of a great number of school boys, who made it their cruel sport to pink his flesh with their writing instruments.

"All this was done to oblige him to refund the damages of the demolished temple, which when he constantly refused to do, they beset him all over with honey, and a kind of sweet sauce, called garon, and hoisted him up into the air in a kind of net, or open basket; where it being then the heat of summer, the bees, wasps, &c. did eat him up alive. Whilst he hung in this dreadful condition, they offered to abate him half of the stipulated sum, thinking his refusal owing to his inability of paying the whole. But to their surprise, he answered, that he should think it as im-

"pious to refund a doit, as the whole sum. But what increased their wonder beyond expression is, he was all this time so far from uttering a groan, or shewing the least sense of pain, that he even seemed to make himself merry with his Pagan tormentors, telling them, that they were from beneath, but he from above; alluding to his suspension. The consequence of the whole was, that being at length overcome by his supernatural constancy, they let him down, and released him full of the deepest veneration and respect".

Now, when a story comes to us confirmed by a person of Libanius's character, and who was not only cotemporary to it, but speaks of it with the same assurance, as if he had been an eye-witness of it; we know not well how that of Laurence, or any other, can be questioned in those historians. The same sophist adds to what Theodore says, that the people were so astonished at the old bishop's constancy, that they worshipped him as a god; and that when Julian heard of it, though he was vexed at the demolition of the temple, he yet chose rather to forgive him, than to make further trial of his patience.

He concludes his letter with desiring his friend the judge not to make of Orion his prisoner a second Mark, or a second Marfyn (who had been lately flayed alive.) If, says he, you think Orion has a golden mine in his skin, you would do well to get it out; if not, by Jupiter, you had better let him go; or if you must punish him, do it in such a manner, that he may have no opportunity to make a public shew of his patience and constancy. Some have thought, that all this moderation of our orator might be owing to an apprehension of Julian's being succeeded by a christian (12); but be that how it will, it cannot invalidate the testimony which he gives to those heroic sufferers. However, many of his letters appear full of the same moderate spirit, in other instances; and the tenor of the letter above-mentioned shews him to have been rather afraid of the effects of the christian constancy, which under such grievous persecutions always drew, as well it might, a great number of converts, and threatened a total dereliction of their heathen temples and worship.

HAVING finished his discourse, he bid them return to Jerusalem, where he would meet them before his ascension, as he accordingly did; and ordered them to remain there till they had received the promised Comforter, by whom they should shortly after be endowed with power from above, answerable to their high commission. Great need they still stood in of such a divine director, since these last words filled them again with hopes, that their master was now going indeed to restore the kingdom of Israel. Jesus was here again obliged to check their untimely curiosity, but referred the further display of this important point to that promised heavenly instructor. And now, having finished his glorious work, he led them forth toward Bethany, to the mount of Olives; where being arrived, he tenderly gathered them about him, and in their full sight, went up to heaven, leaving his gracious blessing upon them, and the comfortable assurance, that he was going to prepare a place for them in his own kingdom; whilst they, in an adoring posture, followed him with their wishful eyes, till a bright cloud received him out of their sight (D). Whilst their eyes were thus fixed still towards him, two angels appeared to them in bright apparel, and said unto them, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up to heaven? The same Jesus, whom you have now beheld ascending thither, shall in the like manner come down again from thence ^p; meaning doubtless, at the last day to judge the world; till when he will there remain, and reign at the right hand of his Father, till all his enemies be made his footstool ^q (E).

(D) This happened, according to our learned Usher's computation, hinted a little higher, on a Thursday, the fourteenth of May, which is the ninth month of the Jewish year, and in the thirty-sixth, or, according to others, the thirty-third year of his age, and the nineteenth of Tiberius's reign. There is an ancient tradition, which adds, that it was about the time of noon when he was taken up, and ascended from one of the summits of mount Olives, where the print of his feet, where he last stood, was still to be seen, and on that account has been had in great veneration ever since. The reader may see what we have said of it in a former volume †.

(E) It will not be amiss to close this history of the Saviour of the world with those other testimonies which we find concerning him, both in Josephus, and in some eminent heathen authors. We begin with the former, because we have elsewhere promised to say something further concerning that known and much controverted passage of his, which runs to this effect (13):

"At the same time there was one Jesus, a wise man, if at least he may be called a man, who was a great worker of miracles, and a teacher of truth, to all that were desirous to learn it, and had a great number of disciples, both of Jews and Gentiles. This was (or, as St. Jerom read it, credebatur, was believed to be) the Christ, whom Pilate, through the envy of the heads of our nation, caused to be crucified; but this did not hinder his disciples from cleaving stedfastly unto him. He was seen by them three days after his death, according to the prophecies concerning him. The christian sect subsists to this day, call themselves by his name, and acknowledge him for their head".

This passage being not only found in all the manuscripts of that historian, but quoted by St. Jerom, Eusebius (14), and other ancients, the main objection against it is, how Josephus could express himself in such a manner concerning Christ, and yet live and die a Jew. To which may be added another difficulty, viz. how he could acknowledge him the promised Messiah, after he had once complimented the Roman emperor with that title (14). But those who believe it to have been foisted in by some pious christians, will find it still much more difficult to account how they could get it inserted in all future copies, and suppress all the old and genuine ones.

Those who know how much has been already writ for and against it, will easily excuse our not entering further into that controversy, than referring our readers to the authors themselves, whom he will find quoted in the margin (15).

All that we shall add by way of lessening the two difficulties raised against the genuineness of the text is, 1st, That Josephus was no less a courtier, than a Jew and a Pharisee; he might, as an historian, who made great shew of sincerity, be forced to publish a truth, the suppression of which would have brought his character in question, and yet not have resolution enough to sacrifice his temporal interest to his conviction. The cruel treatment which the disciples of Christ met with from Jews and Gentiles might be a sufficient obstacle to a man of his mould lifting himself into their number. He might, and had in all probability conversed with several learned christians, who might have inspired him with a great veneration for their divine master, and, from the many prophecies concerning him, have convinced him of his being the Messiah, and at the same time, his brethren of the Pharisaic leaven might trump up their notion of a double Messiah, viz. a suffering one, and the other a great and glorious conqueror.

For no time could be more likely to produce such a wild distinction, than that about which he wrote his history, when all their hopes were wholly quashed, the sceptre long ago departed from Judah, the second temple destroyed, the nation ruined, the utmost length of their computation of Daniel's weeks long since ended, and the christians every-where beating them out of all other reitrenchments, and forcing them at length to trust themselves to this broken plank; and was not a man of Josephus's character as likely to prefer this soothing notion to the manifest danger of becoming a proscribed christian, as any of his fraternity?

But, lastly, who can tell how far the ill treatment which he met with from these last, at the siege of Jerusalem, their invincible obstinacy and ingratitude, their cruelty, hypocrisy, and irreconcilable

- a THE disciples, thus warned, returned immediately to Jerusalem, where they spent their time in prayers, fastings, and such-like other duties as were likeliest to qualify them for the reception of the promised Comforter. They were about a hundred and twenty persons, probably exclusive of the women, who did not use to be reckoned in the number, though they kept still with them, and among the rest the virgin Mary, who is here particularly mentioned, and for the last time^r. The place they used to assemble in, was a large upper room (F), where a few days after their master's ascension, Peter addressed himself to the rest, and reminded them how necessary it was, before they entered into their grand commission, to chuse a new member into the apostolic college, from among those who had been conversant with Jesus from John's baptism to that present time, to fill the vacancy which the traitor Judas had made to their number. The proposal being approved, two candidates were offered to them, namely Joseph, surnamed Justus, and Barfabas (who is supposed by some to be the brother of James the Less, and by others, the same with Barnabas); and Matthias, who was one of the seventy disciples (G). After a short prayer to the discerners of all hearts, to direct them to the person whom he had made choice of, they cast their lots, and Matthias was chosen into the apostolical ministry, and their number completed again^s.

- c WHEN fifty days from Christ's resurrection were finished, which ushered in the grand feast of pentecost, whilst the disciples were all assembled at their usual place, suddenly there was heard a mighty sound from heaven; a vehement wind filled the room they were in, when there appeared a kind of cloven tongues of fire sitting upon each of their heads; upon which they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, illu-

able hatred to him, may have provoked him to lay this heavy charge upon them, of crucifying the Messiah, and to aggravate it with those other testimonials concerning him, without being himself thoroughly satisfied with them, through prejudice and interest. If we join his resentment against them, and their notion of two Messiahs, with his fawning action of complimenting Vespasian with the title of Messiah, we shall find that he acted nothing but what became such a consummate politician; and the passage above-quoted concerning Christ, and that concerning the Roman emperor, though set at that great distance from each other, to conceal his design, when brought nearer together, may amount to no more than this: Since the heads of our nation did unjustly reject and crucify the first Messiah, who came to them in the spirit of meekness and charity, and in all respects answered the description given of him by the ancient prophets, it is but just that the second, who is to be the glorious conquering one, should signalise the premises of his reign, with the extirpation of those unworthy wretches, and thereby fulfil the prophecies concerning himself, and his glorious and universal kingdom. All which was in a great measure already done before the historian wrote his two histories, in the last of which he speaks of his conference with that prince (16), and may have dressed it in the most advantageous manner to gain the applause of the Romans.

If therefore this text ever suffered any alteration, it seems to have been only in the omission of the word was believed, which we find was in St. Jerome's copy, though not in that of Eusebius, Rufinus, and others, where it was left out; but whether through carelessness, or wilfully, must be left to the readers candor. And, after all, we may as well suspect the great character which the Jewish historian gives to John the Baptist, and to St. James, whom he calls the brother of Christ (17), which yet cast no small honour to this last, whose martyrs they were.

Concerning the testimony of heathen writers, we have already mentioned those which confirm the supernatural eclipse which happened at Christ's passion, and the appeal which the apostolic fathers made to the heathen records for that and other facts. Tacitus confirms also Christ's having been put to death by Pilate, governor of Judea, under the emperor Tiberius (18). We might add some others, were we not afraid of swelling this note too much. The readers may see them in the apologies above-mentioned, and in the authors quoted in the margin (19).

For the same reason we shall forbear mentioning that of the Mohammedans, and all further debate on the apocryphal gospels, epistles, and other writings concerning him, and all useless inquiries after his person, shape, mien, and other such particularities of neither importance, nor the least certainty. As for his pretended correspondence with the king of Edessa, we shall refer our readers to what has been said in a former volume †.

(F) The words εἰς τὸ ὑπερσώον (20), do certainly imply some upper room of a house, and not of the temple, as some have imagined. This might be therefore that large one in which Jesus had celebrated the last passover with his disciples (21); and is supposed to have belonged to one of them, namely to John, surnamed Mark, and is said to have been turned, in process of time, into a stately church.

(G) The tradition concerning these two, and others of their colleagues, are so uncertain, that there is no relying on them, otherwise this Joseph should be the same with that often mentioned in the gospel among the relations of our Saviour; and by his surname of Barfabas, he should be the same with Barnabas, who is yet said to be a Cyprian levite (22). Matthias should likewise be the same with Zaccheus (23), though this last became a disciple but a few weeks before Christ's death, and the apostles chose only those for candidates, who had been with him from the beginning of his ministry.

minated with his heavenly light, inflamed with his divine heat, inspired with the knowledge of foreign tongues, and endowed with all other supernatural gifts, to qualify them for their glorious task, the conversion of the world. They set themselves immediately about it, Jerusalem being then filled with people, who came from all parts of the world, both Jews and profelytes, who flocked thither, as usual, to that grand solemnity. These hearing of that wonderful event, came to them in great crouds, and were beyond measure surprized to hear such poor illiterate Galileans, who never knew any but their own mother tongue, and that no better than as simple fishermen, express themselves with such unheard-of readiness and energy, and display in all their different tongues and dialects the most sublime mysteries of the gospel. The sacred historian mentions fifteen different countries, out of which this assembly consisted¹. Whilst therefore some, struck with amazement at what they saw and heard, were questioning what the issue of such a prodigy would be, others absurdly attributed it to some excess of new wine, which they supposed the apostles had been guilty of that morning. Which when Peter understood, he first exploded the supposition, by reminding them, that it was but the third hour of the day, or nine of the morning; and then proved to them from the scriptures, that there was nothing happened in this extraordinary change, but what had been plainly foretold, and elegantly described by one of the prophets². From that he proceeded to those other oracles, which had presignified the death and resurrection of Christ, the true Messiah; all which he shewed to them, with such powerful and convincing eloquence, that three thousand of his audience were immediately converted to his doctrine, and continued strict and zealous professors of it³ (H).

(H) Those that will not acknowledge the truth of this miraculous transaction, must suppose that surprising change in the apostles to have been wrought by some such method as this which follows; we leave them to their choice. They must suppose the hen-hearted college to have been all at once seized with a desperate phrenetic courage, or inspired with it by some one of the boldest of them, suppose the pretended champion Peter, by some such speech as this:

Men and brethren, The natural consequence of our having been so egregiously cheated by our late master, and made to wait so long in vain for his pretended resurrection, should according to human prudence be this; that we should for the future detest the very memory and mention of him; that we should become so much the more tenacious of the expostions and traditions of our betters, since it was our departing from them, to follow him, that has brought us into this dilemma; and lastly, that we should go and beg for absolution of the sanhedrin, which they'll hardly make a difficulty to grant; for what wonder is it, that such poor illiterate fishermen as we are, should be so easily deceived, when so many of their learned bench were caught in the same snare?

But for my own part, poor and simple as I am, I think I could undergo the most dreadful hazards in life, rather than to stoop to such a base submission; and my project, if I can but bring you into it, is to do the very reverse; to cry our late master up still for the true Messiah, to profess a greater love and veneration for him than ever, to affirm that we have seen him risen from the dead, conversed with him full forty days, in all convincing proofs, and at length seen him go up to heaven; and to propagate the cheat, not only among our nation, but also among the Gentiles, as far and wide as we can; and to make it the better go down with the world, we will pretend to a new and miraculous commission from heaven, to the supernatural gifts of prophecy, tongues, miracles, and every thing that is great and stupendous, or apt to raise our master's glory, and our own.

Methinks I hear you already making ten thousand objections and difficulties against my project, which I doubt not but you look upon as the most romantic that ever came into a crazy brain; and I, who have duly weighed them, do give you leave to think so still, if I do not remove every one of them, and convince you that my scheme is no less practicable, than it is heroic and glorious.

You will object in the first place, that such a design will expose us to the highest opposition and resentment from Jews and Gentiles, to imprisonments, scourgings, tortures, and death; I own it, and that is the reason of my being so zealous for it; and I promise myself an unconceivable pleasure in carrying it on under all these difficulties and dangers. But our pretence, you'll say, to miracles, tongues, and other supernatural gifts, will be a most effectual means to betray us, because we shall at every turn be ready to discover our want of them. Suppose it happen so; can we not still face them down that we have them, though they cannot see them? Can't we find means to impose, not only upon the eyes and ears of the world, but upon the very understandings of the greatest philosophers that now reign either at Rome or Athens? Let us but resolutely undertake, and I promise you, you will meet with a thousand unexpected accidents, that will force, as it were, a success into your very laps.

But the greatest objection perhaps to you is, that we shall bring the hatred of even God himself, as well as of the world, upon us; we shall not only deprive ourselves of all the hopes of the true promised Messiah, but of all other comforts of this or of the next life; and what a dreadful thing must it be to be thrown into a dungeon, or led to some cruel execution; abhorred by God and man, tortured by the sting of a conscience as black as the very hell we are hastening to, without one poor glimpse of hope or comfort either from within or from without us?

There is indeed something in this thought which may appear terrible to mean souls; but mine is above shrinking at such bug-bears, when the glorious prospect of imposing one of the vilest cheats is put

- a SOME time after, Peter and John, repairing to the temple at the usual evening hour of prayer, healed a poor cripple, who sat begging at the gate. This drew immediately a great concourse of people about them, to the place called Solomon's porch; where Peter, having reproved their stupidity in gazing at them, as the authors of so signal a miracle, assured them, that they had wrought it by no other power than that of Jesus Christ, whom their elders and rulers had through ignorance condemned to the cross. He concluded with such a powerful discourse on the danger of an obstinate and ungrateful unbelief, and on the unspeakable benefits of a speedy faith and repentance, that five thousand more were added to them. Thus did the new church of Christ daily improve, not in the number only, but in the zeal, and fervour, b holiness and charity of its members; beginning now a kind of heavenly life upon in the scale against it. For let our guilt be never of so deep a dye, and the generality of the world judge never so justly of it, yet as long as we make the greatest boasts to sanctity, piety, charity, and every real virtue, and take care that our life, at least outwardly, doth not bely our pretence; we shall still meet with admirers enough to keep up our spirits from flagging in this noble undertaking; and who could grudge to run any dangers, or even to die for such a cause?

And now methinks I see you all, like me, impatient to tally out in this heroic race; but there is still one danger, against which I must warn you all. It is likely, that when we come to be dispersed at a vast distance from each other, as we must be of course to carry on the work, some one of us may through fear of torments, or of some cruel death, be cowardly enough to discover the whole imposture, in which case we shall all lose the fruit of our labours. Our late pusillanimous behaviour, and mine in particular to our late master in the garden, might indeed incline one to fear, lest there should turn out another Judas from among us. But there is something within me that gives me a quite contrary notion of you all, and that you will resolutely persist in carrying on the common cause, and not through any base fear or terror, torture or death, make shipwreck of that glorious design, to which we are going to sacrifice all that is dear and valuable in this and the next world.

And therefore let me only add a few necessary directions to you, and then let us go on and prosper: 1. It is customary for persons of our character to be elated at every success or applause, and sunk down at every foil. We must act the reverse. Never appear more joyful, lofty, and undaunted, than when you meet with the greatest opposition, scorn, and ill treatment; nor ever more humble and abased, than when men are ready to fall down and worship you. This you know was our master's case, and we must, whatever we do, profess an utter contempt of every thing that this world is fond of, and seem to court nothing but poverty and misery, crosses and persecutions. We may in all likelihood fare the better for it; but if we don't, we shall at least save our credit, if we save nothing else.

2. It is not only natural, but sweet, to such men as we, to retaliate ill usage, though never so justly deserved, with ill language, and ill offices, to complain of injustice and cruelty, and even to call for vengeance from heaven on our pretended oppressors. But I advise you, whatever betide us, to let your behaviour breathe nothing but the most surprising patience, meekness, resignation, and charity to your worst enemies, and in the midst of the most exquisite racks and tortures, and even with your last breath, to pray to heaven for them. You'll perhaps ask how human nature can be capable of such heroic courage? But remember only your character and reputation, as apostles, will rise or sink, according as you follow this rule; and then I doubt not but that will enable you to go through all this, and much more.

Many other such-like directions will occur in the course of our race, which I shall take care to communicate to you as often as opportunity offers. But one main one I must not omit before we set about the work: for without this, you will be apt, in your preaching or writing the history of our late master, to aggravate every word and action of the Jews against him, to exclaim against the pretended injustice and impiety of the sanhedrin for condemning him; on the baseness and cowardice of Pilate in ratifying their bloody sentence; on the cruelty of the Roman soldiers for their inhuman treatment of him; and on the obstinacy and perverseness of the Jews for not believing our report concerning him. And you may think yourselves intitled to do so from the example of the ancient prophets, of the baptist, and even of our master, who made no scruple to reprove our nation in the severest terms.

But I absolutely forbid all such invectives and aggravations, as derogatory to our honour, and to that hitherto unexampled plainness and simplicity, to which, I insist, every one of you shall confine himself in the relation of those facts, without betraying the least resentment, or indeed any other emotion, but what shall seem to flow from the deepest concern, pity and charity to all the actors in that scene. You may perhaps at first not be aware of the usefulness and expediency of this caution; but a little experience will soon convince you, that nothing will preserve or raise your character more. And now men and brethren, &c.

We shall go no further with this supposed scene, because we think it clearly appears by this time that a man must be capable of believing any thing that can think it possible for one or all of these twelve fishermen to concert, much less to execute with such surprising success and efficacy, a plot and imposture of so black and hellish a nature under all those difficulties and disadvantages.

But here it will perhaps be pretended, that the whole story of the gospel, acts, &c. was made a long time after, and the characters, facts, and other advantageous circumstances teigned at leisure. But then the question will be, by what miracle, enchantment, or fascination, they could be introduced into the world, be universally received, believed and attested by a series of men, of all ranks and qualities, by men of learning and probity, who sealed those truths with their blood? How and in what age or generation after Christ or his apostles these things were introduced? a succession of prelates, preachers and martyrs, together with a great number of their pretended writings, the decrees of councils, and other records, each quoting their predecessors up; to the sacred writers, toiled in with the whole concomitant chain of evidence, which has hitherto eluded the attempts of the subtlest enemies of christianity? When, we say, the bare possibility of such an universal imposition, with all these circumstances, can once be shewed, it will be then time enough to turn sceptics; and if ever that should prove the case, where we shall stop, God alone can tell.

earth, disclaiming all property, selling all they had, and cheerfully laying it at the apostles feet, to be distributed to the relief of their brethren; and being even in their worldly goods, as well in their hearts and affections, so perfectly united, that they became the wonder of the world, even of their very enemies. Thus were the divine oracles fulfilled, the promises of Christ performed, and his church miraculously planted, and propagated by that heavenly Spirit; to continue under his direction to the end of the world, maugre all the oppositions of Jews and Gentiles ^a.

BUT the malice of the priests and rulers did not expire with the death of its divine author. This new and signal miracle on the impotent man; the number of converts it drew after it; the zeal, boldness, and eloquence of the apostles, all contributed to awaken their fears with their wonder, and to put them upon fresh means to suppress what they called this new and dangerous sect. The apostles and the cripple were brought before them, and Peter in an elegant speech assured them, that it was by the name and power of their great master, now gloriously enthroned in heaven, that they had wrought this miraculous cure; demonstrated to them from the scriptures, that he was that chief corner stone, which was long since foretold to be rejected by the builders ^b, and was now become the foundation of the new covenant, since there was no name given under heaven, by which men might be saved, but that of Jesus Christ, crucified indeed by them, but raised again by his own victorious power. The sanhedrin, having nothing to oppose to these pregnant proofs, and yet ashamed to be convinced, and afraid to use violent means, by reason of the admiring multitude, contented themselves for the present with forbidding them to preach any more in that name; to which Peter replied, We have received a contrary command from God, and you may easily judge which of the two ought to be obeyed ^c.

to the san-

Peter, upon his return to his colleagues, acquainted them with what had past, and the orders they had received from the Jewish chiefs; upon which they joined unanimously in prayer to God, to strengthen their faith, courage, and miraculous power, that they might boldly go on in their ministry, and preach his crucified Son in spite of all opposition and discouragements; upon which they felt their upper room violently shaken, and their hearts inspired with such zeal, that neither threatenings nor persecutions, racks, tortures, or cruel deaths, could put a stop, either to their preaching, or to its miraculous success: for such it really was, being still attended with some fresh miracle (I), which at once confirmed the believers, and still added fresh ones to their number. In the mean while the sanhedrin, which consisted chiefly of Sadducees, finding their endeavours ineffectual, began to think it high time to try some severer means; and to that end ordered them to be seized, and cast into a common gaol. But before the next morning, an angel had opened the prison gates to them, and bid them return to their preaching, which they did accordingly. By that time the council was set to determine something concerning them, word was brought to them that the prisoners were escaped by some miracle; for that on that morning not one of them was to be met with, though the prison gates were found closely shut. Whilst they were debating about this new prodigy, the news came that they were preaching as usual at the temple. Their fears now increasing with their surprise, they sent for them, yet without violence; and Caiaphas having expostulated with them, how they dared transgress their command, they boldly answered for themselves, that as obedience ceased to be due to magistrates, as soon as it began to contravene that which was due to God, they had strictly followed their duty in preaching the resurrection of Christ, and the remission of sins through him, and giving the same irrefragable proofs of those saving truths, which they themselves had of them ^d.

vice to the

THIS noble answer, which gave them to understand, that they were not to be frightened into a base compliance, did raise their indignation to such a degree, that they were just ready to vent it in some severer manner, when Gamaliel (K), one of their members, ^e

(I) These miracles, we are told (24), became so frequent and known by this time, that they drew multitudes of people from all the neighbouring cities and countries to Jerusalem, who brought their sick friends paralytics, lunatics, demoniacs, &c. to be healed by the apostles. Inasmuch that the very shadow of Peter passing by cured many of them, who by reason of the throngs that followed him, could not by any other means get access to him.

- a members, a person of greater coolness, and a learned Pharisee, stood up, and moderated their resentment for the present, by reminding them, that if this council was merely human, it would soon be crushed, as many others of the like nature, which he named, and they knew had lately been; but if it was of God, it was vain as well as impious in them to oppose it. Wherefore, concluded he, my opinion is, that we let these men alone, and wait the event, lest we should be found at length to contend with an almighty power. His counsel was readily agreed to, and the apostles being called in, after having received a severe correction and rebuke for their contumacy, were dismissed, and joyfully rejoined their colleagues ^b. About this time the tetrarch Philip, the brother of Herod, died at Julias, in the thirty-seventh year of his reign, ^{Year of the flood 4037. Of Christ 34 and 37.} from the death of Herod the Great. He was buried in a magnificent tomb, which he had erected during his life; and as he left no heirs of his own body, his tetrarchy was resumed by Tiberius, and annexed to the province of Syria, then under the government of Flaccus Pomponius; but with this restriction, that the revenues of that country should still be kept within the limits of it. Josephus tells us, that Philip was of so opposite a disposition to his father or brother, that his government was mild and quiet; that he went always attended with a small number of servants, some of whom carried a chair after him, which served him as his tribunal, to be ready to receive every petition or complaint, and to do justice every-where upon the spot ^c.
- c ABOUT the same time the apostles, at the complaint of some Grecian proselytes, ^{Seven deacons chosen.} ordained seven deacons from among the number of believers, to be overseers of the ministry in the relief of the necessitous members. We know little of five of them, besides their names, which the reader will find in the margin (L). But Stephen, who is mentioned at the head of the rest, was a man of extraordinary faith, learning, and zeal, and full of the Holy Ghost, who wrought such wonders among the people, that he gave great umbrage to the Jews. He had confuted several of the heads of them in their respective synagogues ^d, concerning their notion of the perpetuity of the Mosaic law, for which he was accused before the sanhedrin. Here the high-priest having given him leave to speak for himself, he began his defence with an historical deduction of the true worship of God, exclusive of the Mosaic rites; which last he shewed by authentic proofs were to be done away to make room for a more spiritual religion under the promised Messiah. This speech was accompanied with such powerful eloquence, angelic majesty, and with such a severe reproof for their constant resisting the Holy Ghost, and persecuting those who delivered his divine oracles to them, that not being longer able to bear what they called his blasphemy, they condemned him to death, and hurried him, as was usual in such cases, out of the city; where the witnesses, who were to throw the first stones, laid their upper garments at the feet of young Saul, then a zealous Pharisee, and enemy to christianity, but since the great apostle of the Gentiles; and having, according to the Mosaic law, laid their hands on condemned person, overwhelmed him with stones, whilst he called on God to forgive them ^{Stephen stoned.} his death, and on Jesus to receive his departing soul ^e. Authors are not agreed about the exact year of his death, but most of them after Usher, Pearson, and others, place it about this time, that is, about a year after that of his divine master.

THE death of this glorious protomartyr was soon followed by a more grievous persecution against the christian converts, which yet the divine providence turned into a means of propagating the gospel far and wide, by the dispersion of a great number and Barnabas (26); he is affirmed by an ancient writer to have been already converted to christianity (27); others pretend that he was not till after the martyrdom of Stephen. But we have no certainty of any of these facts, nor of several others that are said of him, concerning which the reader may consult Basnag in the place last quoted.

(L) These were, Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas; this last is there called a proselyte of Antioch. The rest being also all Greek names, shews them to have been Hellenists, and that this new order was made in favour of the con-

Some have affirmed this last to have been the author of the beastly Nicolaitan sect, that sprung up in the earliest age of the church (28); others have strenuously vindicated him from it (29). We can gather nothing certain concerning it. Philip is probably the same who converted the Samaritans (30), baptised the eunuch of queen Candace (31), and had four daughters endowed with the gift of prophecy (32). As for the other five, we know no more of them than what has been mentioned above.

of them, who after Stephen's death, left Jerusalem and Judæa, according to our Saviour's advice, When you are persecuted in one city, flee into another ^f. So that few but the apostles stayed at Jerusalem, whilst the rest went and preached, some at Samarina, some at Cyprus, and others elsewhere; but still among the Jews, for the time for the conversion of the Gentiles was not yet come. One of the chief instruments of this new persecution, was the young Saul mentioned a little higher, who observing with what zeal the sanhedrin endeavoured to crush the growing church, got a commission from them to seize, bind, and imprison all its members where ever he met them; pursuant to which, he made a terrible havock among them, without regard to quality, age, or sex, till being himself miraculously converted in the midst of his bloody career, as he was going to Damascus, he became as zealous a promoter of it ^g. During this persecution, Samarina having received the gospel by the preaching of Philip, and Simon Magus, who had formerly bewildered them with his sorceries, being himself become a convert, the apostolic college at Jerusalem deputed thither Peter and John, who being come, imparted the Holy Ghost unto them by their prayer, and imposition of hands. Simon observing the wonderful efficacy of this last ceremony, would have purchased the same power of the apostles at a large sum; for which profane proposal Peter sharply rebuked him ^h, and after-ages have branded his memory by giving that new and unheard-of sin the name of Simony.

Vitellius's kindness to the Jews.

ABOUT the beginning of the next year, L. Vitellius, being sent by Tiberius, proconsul of Syria, came to Jerusalem about the feast of the passover, where he was honourably received by the magistrates of that metropolis, in requital of which he remitted to its inhabitants the whole duty of the fruits that were set to sale. He likewise put all the pontifical habits, which used to be kept in the fortress of Antonia under the custody of a Roman officer, into the possession of the Jewish high-priest, to be thenceforth kept and disposed of at their pleasure; after which, having deposed Caiaphas from the pontifical chair, and raised Jonathan the son of Annas or Ananus to that dignity, he departed for Antioch, his capital ⁱ. Soon after this a tumult happened at Samarina, in which Pilate acted with such arbitrariness and cruelty, that it proved a main step to his ruin. There had appeared there a certain impostor, some think the Simon lately mentioned, who persuaded the Samaritans, that if they would repair to their sacred mount Garizzim, for such they held it above all mountains, as we have often seen in this chapter, he would direct them to the sacred vessels, which Moses had formerly buried there. The credulous people came in shoals armed to him, and incamped before a village called Tirathaba, waiting for others to join them there, till they could make a sufficient body to go up and take possession of the pretended holy treasure. Pilate, who had timely notice of it, sent a strong body of horse and foot, who attacked them with such fury, that they killed a great number of those deluded wretches, took many of them prisoners, and dispersed the rest; after which he ordered those of the best rank and quality to be beheaded without mercy or delay. The Samaritans had immediately recourse to Vitellius, and complained of the massacre done among them, assuring him at the same time, that their assembling in arms was not with a seditious view, but to secure themselves from the intolerable oppressions of the Jewish governor. Vitellius, who was well acquainted with his cruel and rapacious character, upon this complaint, dispatched his friend Marcellus to take the government of Judæa upon him, and sent orders to Pilate to repair immediately to Rome, there to answer the Samaritans accusation before Cæsar's tribunal. Pilate was forced to obey, but being detained by contrary winds, Tiberius was dead before he could reach Rome. This deposition, which was but the fore-runner of much greater evils to that cruel oppressor, happened in the tenth year of his tyrannic government ^k (M).

(M) The acts of Pilate have made so much noise among the learned, that it will doubtless be expected we should give our English readers some idea of them, since they are so confidently quoted by a great number of ancient fathers (33), and have been as strenuously opposed or defended by learned moderns (34). It seems indeed very probable, that every governor of a province of the Roman empire was obliged

- a DURING these transactions in Judæa, Herod had been carrying on his unsuccessful war against Aretas, of which we have already spoken; and Tiberius, vexed at the success of the latter, had sent express orders to Vitellius to invade his country, and either to take him prisoner, or send his head to Rome. Vitellius in his march into Arabia, designed to have passed through Judæa, but was happily diverted from it by the Jewish heads, on account of the Roman standards. Upon this condescension Herod and he came to Jerusalem, where they were highly honoured, and offered the usual sacrifices, and removed Jonathan from the priesthood to give it to his brother *Theophilus*¹. Here they received the news of Tiberius's death, and of the installation of the emperor Caius, of which a fuller account shall be given in its proper place; and Vitellius stayed to receive the oath of fidelity from the people to the new emperor.
- b Jerusalem was the first eastern city, it seems, that heard the news of his succession, and offered up sacrifices for him^m. By this time Artabanus having succeeded Aretas in Arabia, Vitellius went and made an alliance with him near the Euphrates, where Herod gave them a magnificent entertainment under a stately pavilion, which he had reared for that purpose near the banks of that river. The Roman general sent immediately an account of this transaction to the emperor, and was surprised to find by his answer, that Herod obliged to send an account, at least, of the most material transactions that happened in his time; and if so, the crucifixion of a person of the Messiah's character, through the tumultuous malice of the Jews, and contrary to Pilate's own inclination, was of too signal a nature not to be transmitted to Rome by him, though but to disculpate himself of that unjust deed, and to throw all the odium of it on the sanhedrin.

It is true, those acts that have been transmitted to us vary in many particulars, according to the several hands they have passed through; and some of them carry such a face of forgery, that they cannot be reasonably supposed the same with those which those ancient writers speak so positively of, and have given us such seemingly authentic fragments of. So that to conclude them all to be forged by some pious zealors, is to carry scepticism beyond its due bounds. For who can think, that men of such sense, learning, and integrity, as the apologists were, should dare to appeal to those records in favour of the persecuted christians, which if once found to be forged, must have done their cause the greatest prejudice? How could they speak of them, not only as of things commonly known and acknowledged, but with the same confidence, and seeming exactness, as if they had seen them, consulted, and copied them out of their archives? Is it not more reasonable to believe that there were such records, though sadly blended and corrupted in those after-ages, which through the baseness of arch-heretics, and the blind zeal of others, produced such numbers of other apocryphal writings? Eusebius tells us, that even the Pagans did, in the beginning of the fourth century, trump up a new account of the assn Plasli (35), doubtless to oppose to those cited by Justin and Tertullian in the foregoing one. Another mongrel sect, called Quatuordecimans, had likewise a set of them quite different from the rest, and from which Epiphanius tells us (36), they defended some of their tenets. And where is the wonder that records of such important nature should be corrupted and altered, by designing men, so long after? Is it not rather a greater one, that those of the two apologists above-mentioned, who wrote as if they had had the autic copies of the true ones before their eyes, should have been preferred to us? We shall now give our readers the substance of them in as few words as we can.

Pilate to Tiberius, &c.

"I have been forced to consent at length to the

"crucifixion of Jesus Christ, to prevent a tumult from the Jews; though it was very much against my will. For the world never saw, nor probably will, a man of such extraordinary piety and uprightness. But the high-priest and sanhedrin fulfilled in it the oracles of their prophets, and of our sybils. Whilst he hung on the cross, a horrid darkness, which covered the earth, seemed to threaten its final end. His disciples, who pretend to have seen him rise from the dead, and ascend into heaven, and acknowledge him for their God, (37), do still subsist; and by their excellent lives shew themselves the worthy disciples of so extraordinary a master. I did what I could to save him from the malice of the Jews; but the fear of a total insurrection made me sacrifice him to the interest and peace of your empire, &c."

There is nothing in all this that can appear inconsistent with the character of such a governor as Pilate was, if we except his saying there, that Christ's death had been foretold by the prophets and sybils; and Josephus of Arimathea, when he went to beg his body, might in all likelihood inform him of the one, and the other he might either know, or be told by some of his own people. As for the rest, the fear he was in of being called to an account for his unjust sentence, might make him the more diligent in sending such a favourable relation of the transaction, as might best prejudice that ticklish emperor in his favour. Some apocryphal writings tell us, that he was forced to do it in his justification; and that Tiberius, who had long lingered under a decay, which eluded the skill of his physicians, had been advised to send for Jesus from Judæa, to cure him by his miraculous power. They add, that when he received this account from Pilate, he not only highly resented it from him, but much more from the Jewish sanhedrin, whose court he ordered the former to demolish, that, being the only place where they were allowed to sit in council, they might never more pronounce another sentence from it. But this story we would be far from putting on the level with the acts of Pilate in point of evidence. As for that prætor, there is no record what became of him after his being sent to Rome. Only an ancient tradition, supported by some seeming authentic monuments, says, that he was banished to Vienne in Dauphiné, where his misery forced him to kill himself with his own sword.

(37) These last particulars are only in Tertullian, and had been before-hand with him, and had acquainted him with all the particulars of it ; a for which he bore him a mortal grudge ever after ⁿ.

ALL this while the christian church increased to a surprising degree, not only in Judæa, but in all other parts of the world ; to which the apostles themselves, after having left James the Less bishop of that of Jerusalem (N), dispersed themselves, either about or soon after this time. It is out of our province, not only to follow them out of Judæa, but even to enter into many transactions of theirs within it, which have no concern with the Jewish history we are upon. Such as their councils held at Jerusalem, their converts, miracles, ordination of bishops, and many more of that kind ; which regarding only the first propagation and planting of the christian church, we shall refer our readers for them to those christian annalists, historians, and other authors, who have wrote on the subject, and which are too numerous and too well known to need being mentioned in the margin.

THAT we may therefore resume and finish our history without any further digression, we shall conclude what relates to the christian church with the miraculous conversion of Cornelius the Roman centurion, the first-fruits of that of the Gentile world ; because it is there that we formerly fixed the final departure of the poor remains of the Jewish sceptre or power †. We there observed, after the learned Mr. Mede, that the words of Jacob might, and by the event, ought to be read, The sceptre shall not depart, &c. till Shiloh come, and to him the nations be gathered ; which could not therefore be totally removed, till this promised conversion of the Gentiles was in some measure accomplished. It had indeed began to dwindle long before, but there were still some remains left ; they were still governed by their own laws, their sanhedrin had

(N) When this choice or installation was made, whether immediately after the descent of the Holy Ghost, or after the death of the protomartyr, or in any intermediate space between, is not easy to guess ; and that he was made bishop of Jerusalem, and that this metropolis was made the first christian see, we have not from any sacred writers, but from the fathers (38), and ancient tradition ; and both add, that he wore a golden plate on his forehead, probably in imitation of the Jewish high-priest †. It is supposed, that both St. Peter, and the two sons of Zebedee, gave him the preference of being the first bishop, on account of his being so nearly related to Christ. For he was the brother of Cleophas or Alpheus, the brother of the blessed virgin, from whom he was therefore his first cousin, and hence called his brother, according to the Hebrew custom (39).

This his preference is further confirmed by his being mentioned by the apostle before Peter and John, who are there called the two other pillars of the church (40), and especially by his sitting as president at the first council at Jerusalem, when the question about the circumcision of the heathen converts was condemned (41). For there Peter having opened the point to the assembly, and Paul and Barnabas related the main particular of their conversion, James stood up and summed up the whole debate ; and having delivered his own opinion, and backed it with scripture authority, he gave the definitive sentence, which was assented to by the rest (42).

The fathers above-mentioned speak very much of his great sanctity, mortified life, miracles, &c. for which he was surnamed by Jews as well as christians, The Just. They add, that he had also that of Obliah or Ophiah given him, which signifies the fortress of God ; and that he was even allowed to enter into that part of the temple which was only permitted to the priests, though he was not of that order, and that the people crouded about him to

Baronius quotes a story out of the talmud (44), that a Jew, named Eleazar, having been bit by a venomous serpent, James was sent for to cure him in the name of Jesus, the son of the carpenter, which was strenuously opposed by a Jewish rabbi there present ; and that whilst they were debating about the lawfulness of the cure, the venom grew to such a head, that the patient died ; upon which the stiff-necked rabbi congratulated him for dying without breaking the rules of the Jewish doctors.

Some apocryphal writings were attributed to St. James, but were condemned by the church, which receives none but the epistle that bears his name, and which he is supposed to have written a little before his death, which happened about the year of Christ 62 ; when his great sanctity having rendered him obnoxious to Ananus the son of Annas the high-priest mentioned in the gospel, he drew him into the following snare. He sent for him to declare unto the mistaken people what they ought to think of Jesus, concerning whom they had, he pretended, conceived some wrong notion. For the better conveniency of his being heard, he was placed in some gallery, or high balcony of the temple, where the people from below inquired of him concerning the crucified Jesus, to which the good old bishop answered, That Jesus, whom you crucified, sits now at the right hand of God.

As the populace below were of the Jewish leaven, the priests and Pharisees that headed them, expected them to have broke out into invectives and blasphemies, instead of which they all broke out into Hozannahs to him ; upon which the chiefs cried out, The Just, alluding to his surname, is also in the delusion, and ordered him to be thrown headlong down. His fall not having made an end of him, they fell a covering him with stones, whilst he prayed to God for them, for which one of them came and knocked his brains out with a club (45).

- a still a great power, even of life and death, as we observed in the case of St. Stephen. The reader may see some further tokens of it in the margin (O). But from this time it was so curtailed and reduced, that no footstep was to be seen of it, even before the last siege of Jerusalem, which was to give the finishing stroke to that and several noble prophecies. As this conversion of the Roman centurion was to usher in a new and singular epoch, it is no wonder it was accompanied with such remarkable and miraculous circumstances. Of this sort were the extraordinary piety and charity in that new proselyte, and the vision that appeared to him, and directed him where to send for Peter, who was to preach Christ to him; the surprising vision, which that apostle had about the same time; the explanation and the command which he received from the Spirit, the great readiness with which Cornelius and his company received the word preached; and their being endowed with the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, even before their baptism. All which are so well known, that we shall not dwell longer upon them; but only observe, that there was a further necessity of some such extraordinary and miraculous circumstances to determine Peter, and satisfy the rest of the apostles and Jewish converts; since it plainly appears, that notwithstanding Christ's repeated commission to them to convert all nations, yet they so little dreamed of the heathen being to be brought into this fold, that the former would never have gone to proselyte this or any other heathen, nor the rest have been pacified for his so doing, if these remarkable occurrences had not reminded them, that a happy entrance was to be thereby opened to the rest of the Gentile world.

We return now to the Jews, who soon after the death of Tiberius, received a new governor from Rome, named Marullus, instead of Pontius Pilate, or rather of Marcellus, to whom the care of Judaea had been committed after his deposition. At the same time Caius Caligula gave his old friend Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, and grand-

(O) We have a pregnant instance of this in the assault which was made on St. Paul in the temple (36), where he was seized, and was going to be carried before the high-priest, but was rescued by Claudius Lysias, the commanding officer of that place. This is the first instance we meet with of the Romans interfering in a case of this nature; and accordingly, when the prisoner was brought before the governor, Tertullus, the Jewish orator, complained of the violence done to them, in these words (37): We found this pestilent fellow, meaning Paul, raising sedition through the world, a ring-leader of the Nazarine sect, who went also to profane our temple: whom we therefore laid hold on, and would have judged according to our law. But the chief captain Lysias came, and by main violence rescued him from our hands, &c.

What judgment they designed to have passed upon him, is easy to know, both by what the people cried out when he made his defence (38), and by the accusation they brought against him, sedition and sacrilege; for such they deemed the profanation of the temple, which was made capital by their law. Accordingly, we have taken notice in a former section of certain inscriptions fastened to certain pillars of the building, forbidding all strangers, and polluted Israelites, to enter beyond the court of the Gentiles, under pain of death †. It may be likewise gathered from the judgment which Festus, Agrippa, and others made of him, that he had done nothing worthy of death (39); by the reason which Festus gave for not delivering him into their hands; It is not the custom, said he, for the Romans to deliver a man to die, before, &c. (40) and by the Jews laying in wait to kill him by stratagem, since they could not get it done in a judicial way.

As this seems further confirmed to us by his appeal to Cæsar. He knew the crime alledged against him to be capital, and chiefly of a religious nature; and yet refuses to be tried by the sanhedrin, and affirms that he ought not to be judged by any other tribunal than that of Cæsar. Doth not this imply that the power of life and death, even in religious cases, was by this time taken away? Doth not the defence he made there before Festus (41) seem to amount to this? Though the new governor, out of a desire to ingratiate himself to the Jews, offers to make them judges of my cause; and if they should condemn me, has still the power to put a negative upon their sentence; yet for as much as all capital cases are now to be tried only before Cæsar's tribunal, I appeal to that, and protest against his compliance to them as contrary to the present law.

Upon the whole we have an instance of the sanhedrin's trying, condemning, and executing Stephen by their own authority about a year after Christ. Twenty-six years after they endeavoured to do the same by St. Paul, and were prevented by the Roman captain. Being hindered from doing it by their own authority, they endeavoured to prevail first upon the old, next upon the new governor, to consent to his being put to death, and are refused by both, unless after a fair trial and conviction at the Roman tribunal. At length they found means to persuade the new one to recede in some measure from his prerogative, and let them try the pretended criminal themselves; and this last protests against it, and appeals to Cæsar as the only tribunal where he can be lawfully tried. What can this argue, but that between the death of St. Stephen, and the trial of St. Paul, the Jews had lost all their power of trying criminal causes; and since this instance of the latter is the first we meet with, of their being divested of that power, about twenty years after the conversion of Cornelius; seems it not to follow, that the Jewish sceptre was not totally departed, till after the Gentiles had been gathered to that of the Shiloh there prophesied?

son of Herod the Great, of whom we have formerly spoken *, the tetrarchy of his late uncle Philip, and added to it that of Abylene in Syria, which had formerly belonged to Lysanias. Agrippa, whom St. Luke calls by the common name of Herod †, had been brought up at Rome with Drusus the son of Tiberius, and by his extreme generosity, or rather profuseness, had gained himself many friends at court; but they were of the courtly mould. For after Drusus's death, the emperor having removed all the friends of that young prince from him, lest they should revive the memory of his son, Agrippa found himself reduced to the greatest extremities, indebted over head ears, penniless, and almost friendless. In this condition he came into Judaea, and shut himself up in a castle in Idumea, resolved through shame, vexation, and misery, to starve himself to death. His wife Cyprus, the daughter of Phasaël, did what she could to assist him, writ to his sister in his behalf; and these two furnished him with some present subsistence, but all too little for a prince of his extravagant temper. To this Herod, Herodias's husband, added some further favours to him, made him a magistrate of Tiberias, assisted him with some small sums. But this kindness was soon at an end, and Herod having one day upbraided him with it at some banquet, Agrippa, who could not brook the affront, retired to Flaccus, governor of Syria, where he had not stayed long before he disoblige him, and was forced to retire again into Italy. After many other rubs and misfortunes, which the reader may see in Josephus ‡, he was at length, through the ill offices of one of his freedmen, thrown into prison, and loaded with chains, by Tiberius. He continued in this miserable condition till that prince's death, when Caius, with whom he had formerly contracted an intimate friendship, sent for him from his prison to his own palace, arrayed him in purple, exchanged his iron chain for one of gold of the same weight, put a diadem on his head, and gave him the two tetrarchies above-mentioned, with the title of king. Agrippa did not however come immediately into his new dominions, but continued about a year longer at Rome with the new emperor. He obtained at length leave of him to come and visit his Jewish territories, and to set things in the best order, and took Egypt in his way. He embarked at Puteoli at the end of July, and came a few days after in sight of Alexandria. The magnificence of his entry into that city, though he chose to make it in the night to avoid its being too much observed, drew the envy of the Alexandrians, who could not behold this new upstart Jewish king in such splendor, without offering several indignities to him, though at a distance (P); and Flaccus their governor, who was no lover of the Jews, not only winked at it, but beheld it with a secret pleasure. He was likewise there informed of the indirect means which Flaccus had taken to render the Jewish nation odious to the emperor. All which made him willing to leave the place as soon as possible. The great oppressions, persecutions, and horrid butcheries, which the Alexandrian Jews suffered from this base governor, for refusing to worship the new mad emperor, and his behaviour to the ambassadors, sent to him to represent their loyalty in all other cases that were consistent with their law, are out of our province; the reader may see a full account of it in Philo above-mentioned §; and we shall see by-and-by, that those of Judaea were like to have suffered as much from him, though they had such a powerful advocate as king Agrippa to intercede for them, had not Caius's death put a happy period to his impious project of being acknowledged as a deity.

Flaccus's cruelties punished.

Herod Antipas's ambition.

WHILST these horrid cruelties were acting at Alexandria, Agrippa, who had left that city to get into his new kingdom, took care to acquaint the emperor with them, who dispatched Bassus immediately to seize that bloody governor, and bring him to Rome, where he was stripped of all his riches, banished into an island of the Archipelago, and at length put to death there.

IN the mean time Herod Antipas, who had formerly treated Agrippa with such contempt, could not now behold his glory, and his being in such favour with Caligula,

(P) One of them was the setting up a poor foolish fellow that used to go naked about the streets, dressing him in a kind of mock royalty, and making him ride through the great places of the city with a tattered life-guard like himself, and huzzaing of him with the word Maris, which means the same as, God bless the king; whilst others came to present their petitions, demanded justice, &c. and exposed his royalty to the most audacious ridicule (42).

a without the deepest envy. His wife, a haughty woman, could not brook that he should be contented with the bare title of tetrarch, whilst her brother was now raised to that of a king; and did not cease teasing him, till she made him take a journey to Rome to obtain the same title from the emperor. She even accompanied him thither, in hopes that her presence would greatly influence that monarch; but Agrippa, who was timely acquainted with their ambitious designs, had taken care to send thither one of his freedmen, named Fortunatus, to accuse Herod with having had a hand in Sejanus's late conspiracy, and as a proof of it, to mention the arsenals which he had filled with arms, sufficient to furnish seventy thousand men. As soon therefore as Herod was entered into the presence, and had paid his respects to the emperor, Fortunatus presented him with Agrippa's letter. Caius having read it, asked Herod whether he had really such a great reserve of arms? He was forced to confess it; upon which he was stripped of his tetrarchy, and sent into banishment to Lyons in France. Caius understanding however that Herodias was Agrippa's sister, he offered to pardon her, and to procure her the payment of all the sums she had lent her brother; but she refused his generosity, and since she had been the cause of her husband's disgrace, she chose to accompany him, and to share the same fate with him (Q); upon which Caius gave both his tetrarchy, and all his treasure, to Agrippa, after Herod had enjoyed the former forty-three years.

Accused to Caius.

c In the mean time, Caius having taken it into his head to cause his statue to be set up in the very sanctuary of the temple, sent orders to Petronius, then governor of Syria, to see it executed, and to have a number of troops ready to prevent any obstruction from the Jews. Petronius, who knew the zeal of these, as well as the impetuosity of his master, could not set about such a command without some dread; and to gain time, sent for the best statuarys and materials from distant parts, whilst he gathered his army into the neighbourhood of Ptolemais. This last action having alarmed the nation, he was forced to tell them the orders he had received; upon which he was addressed by all the heads of the Jews, who in the humblest manner assured him, that they would sooner hazard the loss of all that was dear to them, even their lives, than suffer their temple to be thus profaned. The governor strove to bring them into a compliance, by reminding them of the danger of their opposing, or of his not obeying the emperor's command, and that their resistance would be interpreted as a downright rebellion. They answered him, that the prayers and sacrifices they offered daily for the emperor were a sufficient token of their loyalty. However, added they, we are so far from designing to rise up in arms upon this occasion, that we will suffer ourselves to be butchered in the most cruel manner; and this will be all the resistance you will meet with from us, if you go on with your design.

A new storm raised against the Jews. Year of the flood 3038. Of Christ 33.

d Soon after this, Aristobulus the brother of Agrippa, accompanied with some of the royal family, came to Petronius, and begged that they might have leave to try to mollify the emperor by an embassy, and that he would second it with a letter to that monarch in their behalf. Petronius at length consented to write to the emperor, but forbade them to send any embassy, or let their reluctance be so much as suspected at the Roman court. He wrote accordingly to the emperor, that he had met with difficulties in the execution of his orders, through want of proper hands; and that the statue, which he designed should be a masterpiece of its kind, was not yet reared, because he feared lest the taking so many men from their other labours, should bring a scarcity in the land, lower the tribute, and such other reasons, which instead of appeasing, greatly exasperated the emperor. He was just reading the letter, and in the height of his resentment, when king Agrippa, who was then at Rome, came into his presence. He was greatly surprised to see such a mixture of passions in his looks and gestures, and began to fear he had either offended, or been in some way misrepresented to him; when Caius, who easily observed his disorder, broke the secret to him in words to this effect: Your Jewish subjects are strange creatures to refuse to acknow-

Agrippa intercedes for them.

(Q) Josephus tells us elsewhere, that he was banished into Spain (43), and that he died there; so that he must either have fled thither afterwards, or, which is more likely, he was sent thither from Lyons, when Caius and Agrippa came to this last place, and made some stay in it. This was the Herod before whom Christ was brought before his death.

ledge me for a god, and to provoke my resentment against them ; I had commanded a the statue of Jupiter to be set up in their temple, and they have, it seems, opposed it, and raised a kind of universal insurrection.

suit.

A T these words Agrippa, like one thunder-struck, after having in vain tried to keep himself up, fell into a swoon, and was carried off into his own palace, where he continued in that condition till the third day, when having taken a little sustenance, he set himself about writing to the emperor the letter which the reader may see at full length in Josephus ^c, and the substance of it in the margin (R). Caius, instead of being moved at the king's concern, was rather the more exasperated against the Jews, and against him, for his concern for such an ungrateful race, as he called them, whom all his favours could not work into a compliance to his will. However, he b began to relent when he read the letter, and Agrippa, who drew a good omen even from his not answering it, took the liberty to invite him to a sumptuous entertainment, which Caius, who really loved him, easily accepted. Here the Jewish king, having well warmed his guest with wine, began to extol the great and signal favours he had heaped upon him ; and by his large encomiums, and expressions of gratitude, found means to get a fresh promise of whatever he should ask. To this Agrippa answered, Since it is your pleasure to add this new favour to all the rest, I will beg for such a one as will at once be an irrefragable proof of your goodness to me, and draw a plenty of heavenly blessings upon your head ; and that is, that you will set aside your resolution of setting up the statue in the temple of Jerusalem. This petition, which c shewed not only the greatest disinterestedness, but also the most unfeigned love for his country and religion, even at the hazard of his life, had such an effect on that emperor, that he wrote immediately to his governor, that if his statue was not already set up, he should forbear doing it ; adding, that he had altered his design out of friendship to Agrippa. However, the lightness of his temper soon made him repent of his complaisance to him ; so that he designed to have made a second attempt, unknown to him. At the same time his resentment against Petronius being kindled afresh, he sent him an order to dispatch himself ; but Caius was assassinated time enough to prevent either mischief taking effect ^a (S).

Agrippa, who was still at Rome, did not a little contribute to the succession of d Claudius (T) ; in consideration of which, this last confirmed to him all Caligula's grants,

^a Antiq. l. xviii. c. 11. Vid. & legat. ad Caium.

(R) He began with justifying the love he had expressed for his own country in their last interview, and to which he was bound, not only by the law of nature, but even by those of his own religion, he being descended from a race of such noble ancestors, as had during a long series of successions enjoyed the regal and pontifical dignity ; for so he really was by his grandmother Mariamne, the beloved wife of Herod the Great, who was of the race of the Asmonean princes, as we have often hinted in some former sections.

He went on with acquainting him, that he chose to intercede for his own nation in writing, rather than by word of mouth, as he thought it the most respectful way of the two ; and that the many signal favours he had received from him, gave him grounds to hope, that he should now obtain a favour, which would cost him nothing, but would be esteemed by the Jews as the greatest he could bestow on them : That Jerusalem could not but be thought worthy of his regard, since it was the first city of the east, which had proclaimed him emperor, and offered up sacrifices for him : That as to the temple of that metropolis, it had been highly revered by Augustus, Tiberius, and many others of his ancestors, for whose memory he professed a singular honour, and whose pious conduct, he hoped, he would imitate upon this occasion : That as to himself, the greatest favours he had heaped upon him would only increase his unhappiness, if he did not think fit to grant him this last : That it was impossible for him to outlive the profanation of that sacred place, and the disgrace and ruin of his nation.

He concluded with reminding him, that he should be justly esteemed a traitor to both, if he should be wanting in using his utmost interest at this juncture, and that the world would not fail to think him discarded of his imperial favour, if he did not succeed in a petition of this nature. This long and pathetic letter was immediately sealed, and sent to the emperor ; and Agrippa waited with the utmost impatience for an answer, but in vain ; Caius, though mollified by it, not vouchsafing to take the least notice of it to him.

(S) During this interval, besides the raging persecution in Alexandria, there happened some others in other places, and upon other accounts, particularly in Mesopotamia and Babylon. But we chuse to refer our readers for them to Josephus (44), rather than swell this history with things that happened out of Palestine.

It will be sufficient to observe here, that as the Jews in other parts withstood the preaching of the gospel, where-ever the apostles and primitive converts brought it, and with the same vehemence as those of Palestine, they seldom, if ever, fail'd sharing in their punishment.

(T) It must be owned, that the part which Agrippa acted in this election between the new emperor and the senate, is not much to his honour, and was more becoming a consummate courtier than a king (45), as we shall see in the Roman history. But the wonder will cease, when we remember that he had been brought up at that court, had spent most of his life

a grants, gave him Judæa, Samaria, and the southern parts of Idumæa, entered into a solemn alliance with him, and made several edicts in favour of the Jews. At his request, he gave likewise the kingdom of Chalcis to his brother Herod, who was also his son-in-law; Agrippa had the honours of the consulship, and Herod those of the prætorship, conferred upon them; both were intitled to enter into the senate, and to pay their compliments to the emperor in Greek, which was usually done in Latin ^w. All these grants were engraven on copper, and set up in the capitol; thus was Agrippa raised to the height of glory, his territories extended to the furthest limits of his grandfather Herod the Great, and his power and credit with the senate even much greater than his, when at the highest pitch.

b He returned soon after into his kingdom, where he shewed a more extraordinary attachment to the Jewish religion, than any of his predecessors, and began with the solemn performance of the vow of Nazareat †; after which he caused the golden chain, which Caius had given him, to be hanged up in one of the most conspicuous parts of the temple, to be a monument to posterity of the instability of human affairs. He deposed Theophilus from the high-priesthood, and gave it to Simon Cantharus the son of Boethus. He divested him of it soon after, to bestow it on Jonathan the son of Annas, who had already enjoyed it after Caiaphas; but he modestly refused it, telling the king, that he thought himself sufficiently honoured to have once enjoyed that dignity; upon which it was given to his brother Matthias ^r.

c Agrippa was not only a zealous observer of the Jewish religion, but he was likewise an excellent prince, delighting in acts of generosity and clemency (U). He had been at an immense charge in building, beautifying and fortifying a new quarter on the north side of the city, which he called Bezetha, or the new city, and in procuring the emperor's leave to surround it with a strong wall, which, if he had obtained, would have rendered that metropolis impregnable. But Vivius Marsus, who had this year succeeded Petronius in the government of Syria, represented the danger of such a design, which had already been carried on to some forwardness, in such lively colours, that Claudius immediately sent him an order to desist. So considerable was he, and esteemed by all his neighbours, that in one of his progresses to Tiberias, he had no less than five kings, who came to compliment him there. These were Antiochus, king of Comagene, Samsigeran, king of Emesa, Coltis, king of Lesser Armenia, Polemon, king of Pontus, and Herod, king of Chalcis. This meeting however gave Marsus such jealousy, that he came thither himself; and tho' Agrippa complimented him so far, as to go seven stades to meet him, yet that governor commanded them all to depart, and return to their respective kingdoms. This action did so affront the Jewish king, that he sent to desire the emperor to recall him from his government, and easily obtained it; but Claudius died just before the orders had reached Syria ^v.

d Upon his return to Jerusalem, he deposed Matthias the son of Annas from the high-priesthood, and gave that dignity to Elionæus the son of Citbæus; and as he was life there, and that the various vicissitudes his fortune had formerly led him through, would not suffer him to be over-nice at such a juncture, when his kingdom and all depended upon his securing the friendship of the next successor. In other things he really acted in a quite different character, as the sequel will shew.

(U) We have a signal instance of it in the case of one Simon, a surly fanatic lawyer, who had ventured to exclaim against him in a public assembly, as unfit to enter into the court of the Israelites, because he was an Idumean by the father's side. The king, who was then at Cæsarea, only sent for him to the theatre, made him sit down by him, and instead of reproving his boldness, mildly asked him, whether there was any thing in him, or his actions, which he thought contrary to the Jewish law. This behaviour so mollified the man, that he answered him in the negative, approved of all he did, (for Agrippa was very fond of those public shews) and in a submissive manner begged pardon for his former speech, which was readily granted to him (46).

His treatment of Silas, whose great obligations he had already rewarded with the command of all his forces, has indeed been censured as favouring of ingratitude; but the abuse which that general had made of his power, his contemptuous behaviour towards him, and his public protesting that he would never cease upbraiding him with his former condition, and his own past services to him, might well deserve his resentment; which yet he carried no further than imprisoning him: for it was Herod that put him to death immediately after that of Agrippa (47).

Josephus, in the place last quoted, instances, as a monument of his magnificence, the stately theatre which he built at Berytus in Phœnicia; in which, among other spectacles he gave the people there, he caused fourteen thousand condemned criminals to represent a fight, which they did in such good earnest, that there was not one left alive of all that number.

very fond of pleasing the Jewish nation, he began to persecute the christians, who till then seem to have been very quiet at Jerusalem ever since St. Paul's conversion. The first who fell a victim to his popular zeal, was James the Less, surnamed Boanerges, whom he caused to be beheaded (W). The pleasure which this action gave to the Jews, encouraged him to imprison Peter also, with a design to cut him off also immediately after the feast, which was that of the passover, and fell on that year on the first of April, in the forty-fourth year after Christ. Peter was therefore strongly guarded, having four quaternions of soldiers at his prison door, and being fastened hands and feet with chains to his dungeon; whilst prayers were put up for him by all the christians in and about Jerusalem, and obtained him a miraculous deliverance. For on the very night before his designed martyrdom, an angel came and awaked him out of a sound sleep, knocked off his fetters, opened the prison door, and led him safe through some of the streets of the city, and left him to go and seek for some safe asylum; which he accordingly did, after he had gone and acquainted some of the brethren with his miraculous deliverance.

death.

Judæa made a province by

Soon after this disappointment, Agrippa returned to Casarea, where he designed to have exhibited some public games in honour of Claudius Caesar, and was attended thither with a numerous train of the most considerable persons, both of his own, and of the neighbouring nations. He appeared early on the second morning of the festival at the public theatre, in a costly suit artfully wrought, so that the sun-beams darting upon the silver ground of it, were reflected with such an uncommon lustre, that the people beheld him with a kind of divine respect. He addressed himself in an elegant speech to the deputies of Tyre and Sidon, who had been some time in disgrace with him, and were now come to beg his pardon, and the continuance of his favour to their respective nations. Here the ambassadors, prompted perhaps by some of his court sycophants, as is usual in such cases, gave a great shout, crying out, that it was the voice of a god, and not of a man, and added some gestures of a kind of adoration. The king, too sensible of the people's praise, approved instead of checking their impious flattery; upon which the angel of the Lord smote him with a dreadful disease, under which having lingered five days, he expired in all the misery that can be expressed or imagined (X). He left a son of the same name, who was then but seventeen years old, and had been brought up at Rome, and three daughters, Berenice married to Herod, and then sixteen years of age, and Mariamne and Drusilla both young, and unmarried, though contracted the former to Julius Archelaus, the son of Chalcias, and the latter to Epiphanes the son of Antiochus, king of Comagene. He died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and the seventh of his reign. Claudius was going to bestow the kingdom on his son, according to a former promise; but was dissuaded from it by his courtiers, on pretence that he was too young to be trusted with the care of such a nation; upon which Judæa became again a province of the empire, and Cuspius Fadus was sent governor of it, with this particular order, that he should act nothing in concert with Marfus, that he should severely punish the inhabitants of Casarea and Sebaste, or Samaria, for the indignities they had offered

(W) This was not the James whom we mentioned a little higher to have been a near relation of Christ, and on that account chosen bishop of Jerusalem, and was not martyred till many years after; but one of the sons of Zebedee, and brother of John.

Eusebius adds (48), upon the testimony of Clemens, bishop of Alexandria, that the soldier or captain that was to lead him to execution, was converted to christianity, by the noble defence which that apostle made at his trial, and that they were both martyred together. Some other particularities concerning his austere life, great piety, &c. are added, which tho' they may be true enough, we dare not vouch for upon the bare testimony of ancient tradition (49).

(X) The sacred historian says, that he was eaten of worms (50), and Josephus, that he was seized with such violent pains in his heart and bowels, that he could not but reflect on the baseness of his flatterers, who had but lately complimented him with a kind of divine immortality, who was now going to expire in all the torments and agonies of a miserable mortal.

The latter adds, that whilst he was as yet in his prison, an owl happened to perch over his head; upon which a German, who was there, foretold him his future rise and happiness; but bid him take notice, that the next time that he saw that bird, it would prove ominous to him, and that he would live but five days after it; which happened accordingly. For whilst he was applauding himself with the shouts and compliments, which the assembly were paying to him, on occasion of his oration, the same bird appeared over his head, perching upon a rope, from which he concluded that his life and glory was at an end (1).

- a to the memory of the late king (Y) ; and that he should send the troops that were kept in Judæa away into Pontus. But he was soon after persuaded to let them abide still in the former, which proved a source of new troubles and miseries ^b. It was about this time that the famine foretold by Agabus, a christian prophet ^c, began to rage ; against which the new churches planted at Antioch, and other places, sent the believers at Jerusalem a liberal relief, by the hands of Paul and Barnabas ; whilst Helen, queen of Adiabene, is said to have relieved the Jews, and afterwards the christians, in the pious and plentiful manner we have spoken of in a former volume [†].

- Fadus*, upon his arrival into Judæa, was forced to suppress the banditti, which were by that time grown very numerous and powerful ; and to quell an insurrection ^{Fadus sent into Judæa.} which the Jews had raised against the inhabitants of Philadelphie, which was the same city with Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites ^d. In the mean time Claudius, having recalled Marcus out of respect to the late king, had sent Cassius Longinus into that government, who came immediately to Jerusalem, and insisted upon the pontifical vestments being put into his possession, in order to be kept, as formerly, in the fortress of Antonia. The Jews surprised at this new demand, begged leave that they might send a deputation to the emperor against it, and did not obtain it from that governor, till some of the heads of the nation had put their sons as hostages into his hands. But upon the ambassadors applying to Claudius, in which they were backed by the young Agrippa, they obtained a grant, that those sacred robes should be kept in the possession of the high-priest, in the manner Vitellius had granted it, six years before. ^{Year of the flood 3043. Of Christ 45 or 48.} At the same time Herod king of Chalcis obtained of that emperor the superintendency of both the temple and sacred treasury ; together with the authority of naming whom he would to the pontifical dignity ; in pursuance to which, he deposed Cantbaras, and raised Joseph the son of Cami to it. After Herod's death, young Agrippa obtained the same grant for himself, and enjoyed it till the time of the Jewish war ^e.

- DURING Fadus's government there arose a notable impostor, named Theudas (Z), ^{Theudas an impostor be-headed.} who drew great numbers of the deluded Jews after him, bidding them follow him beyond Jordan, and promising them that he would divide the waters of that river, as Joshua had done, by his single word. Cuspius sent some troops of horse and foot against him and his followers, killed some of them, took others prisoners, and amongst them Theudas himself, whom he caused to be beheaded, and his head to be brought to Jerusalem. This, according to Josephus, is the most remarkable thing that happened during Fadus's government ^f : he was soon after succeeded by Tiberius Alexander, an apostate Jew, of sacerdotal race, and nephew to the famous Philo, often quoted in this chapter ^g. One of his first exploits was the crucifying James and Simon, the sons of Judas, surnamed Galileus, head of the Gaulonitish sect, spoken of in a former section ; and about the same time Herod, king of Chalcis, having deposed Joseph the son of Cami, gave the high-priesthood to Ananias the son of Nebedeus, and died soon after, in the eighth year of Claudius. That emperor gave his kingdom to young ^e Agrippa, in prejudice of Aristobulus, the eldest son of the deceased.

Ventidius Cumanus succeeded Alexander in the government of Judæa, and it was in his time that those troubles began, which ended in the ruin of the Jewish nation. The great concourse of people, which their festival brought to Jerusalem, obliged the Romans at such times to keep a guard before the gates of the temple, to prevent tumults. It was now the passover, when one of the Roman soldiers upon duty, had the impudence to expose his nudity to open sight ; this indignity raised the resentment of the Jews to such a height, that they went and complained of it to Cumanus, and in an insolent manner told him, that the affront was offered by his order, not only to the nation, but to God. He tried at first to appease them by fair means, but finding them to grow more tumultuous, he ordered all his troops to come to the place ; the sight of which alarmed them so, that they fled in the greatest fright and confusion, insomuch that upwards of ten thousand were stifled to death in their flight, by running over one another in the narrow passages that led to and from the temple. The copies of Eusebius and St. Jerom say thirty thousand. Soon after this disaster another happened in Samaria, where some Galilean Jews, going to one of the feasts, were insulted, and one of them killed. This brought on a terrible skirmish, in which a great number of the Jews were killed, and the rest went to complain to Cumanus against the Samaritans ; but he, being bribed by these, refused to do them justice ; upon which the matter was brought before Quadratus, governor of Syria, who sent both parties to Rome, and Cumanus with them, to answer for themselves there (A). The Samaritans were cast, and condemned to die, Cumanus sent into banishment, and Celer, one of his tribunes, who had been involved in the same guilt, condemned to be dragged through the streets of Jerusalem, and then put to death ^b.

(Y) These ungrateful wretches, not contented with making the greatest rejoycings at Agrippa's death, and blackening his memory with the vilest outrages, had pulled down the statues of his three daughters from the theatres, and other public places, and carried them into their public stews ; where they prostituted them in such a manner, as is unfit to be mentioned (1).

(Z) We must take care not to confound this Theudas of Josephus with another mentioned by St. Luke, and said to have appeared just after the death of Herod the Great, and has been taken notice of in a former section [†] ; and is supposed to be the same with the son of Exechias mentioned by Josephus under the name of Judas.

In the year following Claudius Felix, the brother of Pallas, the emperor's chief favourite, being then in Judæa, succeeded Cumanus in the government of it, under whom the Jewish affairs went still from bad to worse (B). The land swarmed without with robbers and banditti, and within with false prophets, and pretended miracle mongers, who were still blowing the coals of discontent and sedition ; so that there passed scarcely a day in which there was not some dreadful execution made upon some of those miscreants ^c. To these we may join the Sicarii or assassins (C), which crouded themselves into all the cities and towns of the kingdom, and committed the most horrid murders and butcheries, under covert and pretence of zeal for their religion and liberties. Among the false prophets, and pretended saviours, by whom that infatuated nation was seduced, there was a signal one that came from Egypt, and had drawn above thirty thousand men after him, by the large promises he made to them of a speedy deliverance. He was however soon dispersed by the Roman troops ; but one was no sooner gone, but there started up another, so that the most violent remedies did rather inflame than assuage their seditious disease. But Felix did not exert his cruelties on the rebellious rout alone, but on all others indiscriminately, whom his avarice or resentment marked out for destruction. This obliged the good old priest Jonathan, who had been most instrumental in procuring him the government, to expostulate often with him, and to complain of his ill conduct. Felix at length, unable to bear his just cen-

(A) They were all sent in chains thither, though they were the heads of each of the contending nations. Those among the Jews, were Annas, and Jonathan, who had been both high-priests, Ananias the present pontiff, and his son the captain of the temple, or rather chief of the Levites, who were the keepers of it, with some others. Those of the Samaritans were likewise considerable persons, and these joined interest with Cumanus ; but the credit of young Agrippa at the Roman court easily turned the scales in favour of the Jews.

Those in Judæa had not met with so favourable a judge, and Quadratus, who had the power to try and condemn even the governors themselves, if he found them guilty, though he remitted the grand trial to Cæsar's court, had caused a great number of the most stirring among them to be, some crucified, and others beheaded, besides those that had been killed in the several engagements, especially in the canton of Acrabatene (3).

(B) Josephus says, that the Jewish nation, especially Jonathan the late high-priest, had desired him for their governor. He had been the year before chosen one of the judges by Quadratus, in the dispute between them and the Samaritans, and had perhaps ingratiated himself to them by his mild behaviour towards them ; but after he became their governor, he behaved like a tyrant. Tacitus says rightly of him (4), that he governed them with the arbitrariness of a monarch, and with the genius of a slave. He was the brother of Pallas, and therefore made no difficulty of committing the greatest oppressions and cruelties, till the flame broke out into an open rebellion, and ended in the most dreadful ruin and misery that ever nation felt.

(C) These were another kind of robbers, who came and mixed themselves among the crowds and assemblies, with short daggers under their cloaks, and stabbed all that came near them in open day, and then were the first to cry out murder ! They not only, by this vile method, rid themselves of their enemies, but would hire themselves to murder any others for a small sum. So that it became extremely dangerous to go into any places of public resort.

They are supposed to have been the spawn of the Gaulonitish faction, which began near fifty years before, as we have seen in a former section ^{*} ; and in spite of all the severities which the Romans made them feel, still kept up their seditious spirit, and daily increased in number. They were afterwards better known by the name of zealots, and under that specious title committed such unheard-of crimes as hastened the total ruin of their city and nation. We have seen in a former volume [†], whence they pretended to derive their origin ; though by their actions one would rather think it came from hell, as we shall see in the sequel.

- a fures, hired one Doras, a person in whom Jonathan put great confidence, to assassinate him, which was accordingly done (D). This murder going unpunished, because the person who should have revenged it was the chief actor in it, proved the source of an infinite number of others, which were committed every-where, the temple not excepted; and the Jewish chiefs and even the pontiffs made no scruple to hire the assassins above-mentioned, to rid them of any persons that were obnoxious to them^k.

We have already taken notice, that Drusilla, Agrippa's daughter, had been contracted to Epiphanes; but he refusing the circumcision, her brother gave her to Azizus king of Emessa, who consented to that ceremony out of love to her, she being one of the finest women of that age. But as her virtue was far enough below her beauty,

- b Felix, who was become enamoured with her, did easily persuade her to forsake her husband, and to be married to him, though a Pagan, and one of the worst of that kind^l (E). He was himself made perhaps more sensible of it than ever he had been, when the apostle St. Paul was brought before him, and made that noble discourse on justice, temperance, or chastity, and a judgment to come; which threw him into such a fit of remorse and trembling, as made him cry out to him, It is enough, go thy ways for this time; and when I am more at leisure, I will send for thee^m. It proved however but of short duration. Felix did afterwards send for him indeed more than once, but it was rather in hopes of a bribe from him, than a desire of being made better acquainted with those important truths, which he had heard of him; so that after near two years, finding himself disappointed, and ready to be recalled from his government, he chose to leave his prisoner in bonds, to ingratiate himself to the exasperated Jewsⁿ.

He was accordingly succeeded by Portius Festus, who upon his coming found the nation in that distressed condition we have been speaking of; and, which was still worse, the very priesthood had begun a civil war among themselves ever since the last year of Felix's government, the occasion of which seems to have been the frequent depositions of the pontiffs, and their pretensions after it to a greater share of the tythes than the inferior priests could afford them (F). Agrippa had the year before deposed Ananias, and put Ismael in his room; there were still several more such discarded pontiffs alive, who all pretended to the same income of the

- d tythes, which they enjoyed with that dignity, which must of course impoverish the inferior sort, who therefore refused it to them. The rancour arose at length to such a height, that each party used to go along accompanied with a troop of the sicarii, and upon every rencounter fell foul on each other, killing all that opposed them, and filled both city and country, and even the very temple sometimes with

(D) It is impossible to guess from Josephus, in what year this murder was committed; only by his expressions it seems to have been done about the beginning of Felix's government (5).

(E) Her two sisters did not prove much more virtuous than she. Berenice the eldest, and formerly married to her uncle Herod king of Chalcis, being become a widow, was shrewdly suspected of holding an incestuous intercourse with her brother Agrippa. To suppress that suspicion, she married Polemon king of Pontus, and of part of Cilicia; but she soon after broke off with him, and by her loose behaviour confirmed the reports that had been spread concerning her unlawful intrigues. Her husband on the other hand, who had embraced judaism on her account, was no sooner forsaken by her, than he cast off her religion, and returned to his paganism.

Mariamne the youngest had been married betimes to Archelaus the son of Chelcias or Elchias, probably of the Herodian family; but she likewise forsook him to marry one Demetrius, an Alexandrian Jew, and one of the richest and most considerable of that city, and was then their Alabarea or chief (6).

(F) We have observed in a former volume*, that the Levites were to gather in the tythes from the people, and to allot a tenth part of them to the priests. These allowed the high-priest a proportion of it suitable to his dignity, and divided the rest among themselves. When therefore the number of deposed pontiffs began to increase to such a degree, as to leave the inferior ones too small a quantity for their sustenance, it bred a mutiny among them. The latter refusing them their competency, they sent their armed men to force it from them, to plunder their houses and barns, and to kill all that opposed them. This obliged them to hire the sicarii to repel force by force, and those that could not stand thus in their own defence, were stripped of all they had, and left to starve.

Josephus says, that Felix had sent a good number of them in chains to Rome to answer for their crimes, which yet he adds were of a light nature; and might therefore be some of this oppressed sort who had armed themselves against the cruelty of those tyrants. He adds, that they were kept prisoners some years, till he came himself thither on purpose to procure their freedom, which he did by the interest of Poppa, who was a lover of their nation, and was soon after married to the emperor Nero. He highly applauds the piety of those priests, who, says he, were content to live upon nuts, and dry figs, rather than pollute themselves with the usual food of the Gentiles (7).

blood. Festus was therefore forced to begin his government with the greatest severity, ^a in order to suppress this treble butchery; namely, that of the priesthood against each other; that of the seditious laity against the Romans and those that contentedly submitted to them; and that of the banditti abroad, who infested the whole country, and robbed, plundered, and massacred every-where without mercy°. The suppression of all these different parties, and the severe examples he made of their leaders, impostors, and of the most stirring and mutinous of the rebels, was what took up the greatest part of his time and labour during his short government.

Paul brought before Festus,

THREE days after his arrival in Judæa, he went to Jerusalem, where Ananias the late high-priest, and the rest of the Jewish chiefs, came to demand justice against Paul, who was still kept prisoner at Cæsarea. As soon therefore as he was returned ^b thither, he caused him to be brought before him, and after a full hearing of both sides, especially of the prisoners defence, pronounced him innocent of any capital crime. But his enemies still insisting that he was worthy of death, and Festus being willing to oblige them with a second trial at Jerusalem, Paul took hold on the privileges which the law then gave him, to appeal to Cæsar, and prevent thereby the effects of their further malice. Agrippa and his sister Berenice being come to Cæsarea to compliment the new governor, and having expressed a desire of seeing this celebrated prisoner, Festus, who knew that prince to be thoroughly versed in the Jewish laws and customs, readily agreed to have him brought once more to the bar. Here Paul being permitted to speak for himself, made such a noble defence, that Festus acquitted ^c him of every fault, except that of having turned his brain with too much learning; whilst Agrippa, conscious of the truth and force of his reasoning, owned himself almost convinced by him, and after some private conference with the governor, it was declared that he might have been released, if he had not appealed to Cæsar ².

And Agrippa.

Agrippa displeases the Jews,

IN the mean time Agrippa, who came often to Jerusalem, and had a lodging near the temple, of which he had the superintendency given him after his uncle Herod, took it into his head to build him a palace there, of such a height, that he could oversee all that was done in the innermost court of it. The Jews were the more displeased at it, because Festus and the Romans would likewise come and take a view of it from thence; for which reason they built a partition wall high enough to cover ^d that sacred place, which the king and governor taking as an affront, ordered it to be pulled down. The Jews, after much opposition, obtained leave at length to send deputies to Rome; and these by the intercession of Poppea (G), got a grant from the emperor for the keeping up of the wall. Ismael the then high-priest, being at the head of this embassy, was for his laudable zeal deposed by Agrippa, who bestowed that dignity on Joseph, surnamed Cabbis, the son of the late pontiff Cantbaras. Josephus adds, that Poppea detained Ismael and Chelcias as hostages at Rome ³.

Festus dying towards the latter end of this year, Nero nominated Albinus to succeed him; in the mean time Agrippa, having given the high-priesthood from Cabbis to Ananus, a proud Sadducee, this last took that interval before the arrival of the new ^e prætor to call a council, and to have James the apostle and bishop of Jerusalem, and some other christians, condemned and stoned to death (H). Upon the governor's arrival at Alexandria, complaint was made to him of this presumptuous and unlawful step. Albinus resented it, and sent the new pontiff a very threatening letter; and Agrippa, who feared the consequence of his anger, took care to depose him, and to put another in his room, viz. Jesus the son of Damneus, before the governor was got to Jerusalem. Judæa gained nothing by the change of either governor or pontiff. As for the former, he was such a cruel rapacious monster, that Felix and Festus, bad as

(G) Josephus highly commends that empress's piety, though, setting aside her love to the Jewish nation, she had not one virtue that could intitle her to this compliment. On the contrary, she was known to be a leud princess, the promoter of a great number of murders, which she made her husband commit on the greatest persons of the empire, and prevailed at length on that mad monarch, to repudiate, banish, and at length put to death, his virtuous wife Octavia, to marry her, as we shall see more at large in the Roman history.

(H) So says Josephus; but we have related the manner of his death according to the testimony of some ancient fathers in a late note, to which we refer the reader.

This Ananus was the fifth son of that Ananus or Annas mentioned by the evangelists, that had enjoyed the high-priesthood after their father, an honour and happiness that never happened to any but him, says that Jewish historian (S).

a they were, were honest men to him ; and yet he was still in one respect better than his successor, in that he endeavoured at least, either to hide or to colour his ill actions by some pretext or other.

His first care was to suppress the sicarii, robbers, and banditti, which were now grown more numerous, and bolder than ever. He punished with the utmost severity as many as came into his hands, and they only became the more impudent by it ; infomuch that they ventured one night, during one of their feasts, to enter into the city, and to carry off Eleazar the son of Ananias, the late high-priest, who was secretary of the temple, and to send his father word that they would not release him, till he had procured the enlargement of ten of their associates, whom Albinus kept in prison. Ananias, who was a very opulent person, easily bribed with a round sum the rapacious governor to consent to it ; but his compliance was attended with very bad consequences ; being forced still to redeem some near relation at the same price, as often as any of the banditti were got into the governor's hands ^r. On the other hand Agrippa, having given the high-priesthood from Jesus the son of Damneus to Jesus the son of Gamaliel, those two pontiffs got each of them a strong escort of armed men, and committed the vilest outrages ; not only against each other, but against the inferior sort, who were often plundered of all they had, and reduced to the lowest misery. About this time the Levites and singers, who, as we have formerly observed ^{*}, had no particular dress to distinguish them from the laity, obtained leave of Agrippa to wear white robes like the priests, and some other privileges, which were contrary to the Jewish law, and did not a little displease the better sort of the Jews, as well as the whole priesthood. Agrippa was likewise become odious to his subjects, on account of his high taxes on them, to support his extravagance, sumptuous building, public spectacles, games, and such-like profusions [†].

ABOUT this time all the work of the temple being quite finished, and eighteen thousand hands at once discharged, as we observed in a former section [†], a proposal was made to that prince to employ them in the taking down an old stately gallery of the temple, four hundred cubits high, which was in danger of falling, and rebuilding it anew ; but Agrippa, considering the expensiveness and length of the work, absolutely refused it, and told the Jewish chiefs that they might employ those hands in paving the city with white stones ; but that not being agreed to, the greatest part joined themselves with the banditti for fear of starving. Albinus after a two years government was recalled by Nero, and succeeded by Gessius Florus, the last and worst governor that ever Judea had. Josephus seems at a loss for words bad enough to describe him by, or a monster to compare him to [†] ; his rapines, cruelties, conniving for large sums with the banditti, and in a word, his whole behaviour, was so open and bare-faced, that he was looked upon by the Jews more like a bloody executioner sent to butcher, than as a magistrate to govern them. His design was to provoke them to such an open rebellion, as might either give him the brutish pleasure of seeing them destroy each other, or prevent his oppressions, murders, and other hellish works being inquired into. He succeeded but too well in it ; and a war was kindled accordingly through his means, which ended not but with the total ruin of the Jewish nation. This great event, so plainly foretold by Christ, so punctually fulfilled, and so lively described and related by a Jewish historian, and an eye-witness, might well deserve a larger place in this chapter ; but as it is so very well known, and abounds with such dreadful murders, cruelties, and other circumstances, fit only to fill a reader with horror, we shall content ourselves with giving some of the most remarkable strokes of it, to avoid drawing this chapter to too great a length.

ABOUT four years before this dreadful war broke out, and about seven before the siege of Jerusalem, whilst the Jews did still enjoy some kind of peace, a country fellow, named Jesus, came to the feast of tabernacles, and was on a sudden seized with a kind of phrensy, as the Jews thought it, which made him cry out without ceasing ; Wo to the city, Wo to the temple : A voice from the four corners, a voice against Jerusalem, a voice against the nation, &c. and in this lamentable tone he ran through all the streets of the city night and day, and on the sabbaths and other festivals, was heard to speak those words louder, and in a more dismal tone, without ever losing his voice, or even being hoarse with crying ; and, what was still more surprising, neither threats, nor the most severe punishments that could be inflicted on him (I),^a could make him desist or utter a groan or complaint, or any other words than those dreadful woes, till he saw his predictions begin to be fulfilled by the siege of the city, when he cried out in a more dismal tone, Woe also to myself; and was in that instant killed by a stone thrown in by the besiegers^u. There were several more such prodigious warnings sent to that unhappy nation in the sequel, which though all too little to bring them to a better mind, are sufficient to convince us, that God did not doom them to this dreadful destruction, till their impiety and hardness of heart had forced that severe punishment from him.

Complaints
made to Cestius Gallus.
Year of the

Judæa being thus distracted within and without, and groaning now more than ever under a tyrant, who openly promoted those mischiefs he should have remedied; vast numbers of Jews forsook it to seek an asylum among foreign nations, whilst those that stayed behind applied themselves to Cestius Gallus, the then governor of Syria, who was then at Jerusalem at the passover, and besought him to pity their wretched state, and free them from the tyranny of a man who had totally ruined their country. Florus, who was present when these complaints were preferred against him, made a mere jest of them; and Cestius, instead of making a strict inquiry into his conduct, dismissed them with a bare promise, that Florus should behave better for the future, and set himself about computing the number of Jews that were then at Jerusalem, by that of the lambs that were offered at that festival (K), in order to send an account of it to Nero; and by that computation the whole was found to amount to two millions five hundred and fifty-six thousand. Josephus thinks they rather amounted to three millions^w.

Soon after this, the contest between the Jews and Syrians about the city of Cæsarea, which had been kept in suspense ever since the time of Felix (L), being at length decided in favour of the Syrians, the decree was no sooner brought to Judæa, but, as if it had been agreed, that this should be the signal for a revolt, the Jews every-where resolved to take up arms; and thus began the fatal war in the second year of Florus's government, in the twelfth of Nero's reign, the seventeenth of that of Agrippa, and in the sixty-ninth year of Christ^x. Agrippa, who was at this time at Jerusalem at the beginning of this revolt, strove in vain to assuage them by a long and elaborate speech, as well as by other proper means; they only listened to him, till he came to insist on their submitting to Florus, till a new governor could be obtained from Rome; this single proposal exasperated them to such a degree, that they began to pelt him with stones, and forced him to leave the city, which was immediately in a flame. Florus beheld all this with an inhuman pleasure, and without putting the least help to quell the sedition, though earnestly intreated to it by the Jewish heads. Agrippa sent them indeed three thousand men; but what could they do now against such an enraged multitude as were then up in arms? The evil soon spread all over the kingdom, and though the Jews were every-where the sufferers, yet did not their desperate rage abate in the least. Nothing was now to be seen but robberies, murders, and all manner of cruelties; cities and villages filled with dead bodies of all ages, sexes and quality,

(I) Josephus adds, that some of the Jewish heads, being highly displeased at this poor fellow, caused him to be severely whipped; and that this not proving sufficient either to silence him, or to make him answer to other questions; they had him brought before Albinus, who ordered him afresh to the whipping post; where they gave him so many and severe lashes, that his ribs were quite uncovered, without forcing a word or groan from him. And lastly, that being dismissed as a madman, he continued his dreadful outcries, without taking the least notice by word or gesture, either of those that hurted him, or gave him food.

(K) This computation could not be very certain, because, though none but Jews offered these lambs at the feast, yet those who had contracted any legal pollution were excluded from it. Besides, one lamb might serve for twenty persons, though never for less than ten. However, they took this last number for each lamb; and found that of the lambs to amount in the whole to two hundred and fifty-five thousand. But as, among the poor, one of them might serve for more than ten, and as far as for twenty, Josephus rightly guesses that there must have been a much greater number, though, considering the bigness of the place, one would wonder how it was possible for it to contain even that.

(L) This contest, in which the Jews maintained that that city belonged to them, because it had been built by Herod, and the Syrians pretended that it had been always esteemed a Greek city, since even that monarch had reared temples and statues in it; grew to such a height, that both parties came at last to blows, and took up arms against each other. Felix at length put an end to it for a time, by sending some of the chiefs of each nation to Rome to plead their cause before the emperor, where it hung in suspense till this time, when Nero decided it in such a manner as caused this insurrection.

- even down to the sucking babes. The Jews on their part neither spared Syrians nor Jews terribly Romans, but retaliated their cruelties where-ever they got the better of them, for which persecuted. vast numbers of their peaceful brethren were butchered in their places of abode. The Cæsareans fell suddenly on those of their city, and massacred twenty thousand of them, two thousand were murdered at Ptolemais, and fifty thousand at Alexandria. In a word, there was neither town nor city, where the Pagans proved either stronger or quicker than they, where they did not commit the same horrid butcheries. At Jerusalem Florus caused one day his troops to go and plunder the high market, and to kill all they met; and they murdered accordingly three thousand five hundred persons, men, women and children. Among those that were brought prisoners to him, b there were some men of quality, and who had been even honoured with the Roman knighthood; yet this did not save them from his cruelty; on the contrary, he caused them to be whipped before his tribunal, and then crucified †.

Yet not discouraged by it, she went barefoot to him on the very next day, threw herself at the foot of his tribunal, and in the most submissive terms intreated him to put a stop to the shedding of so much blood. The brute did not so much as c vouchsafe her the least token of common respect, so that she ran a second risk of being torn in pieces before she could get home †. This may serve to give a sketch of that governor's character, who, because he was depending on that of Syria, failed not to write to Cestius, and throw all the fault on the Jews; insomuch that this last knew not well which to believe Florus, or Agrippa, Berenice, and other considerable Jewish heads, who gave him a quite different account †.

- IN the mean time a great number of assassins having joined themselves to the sedi- The zealots tious, beat the Romans out of the fortresses of Massada, Antonia, and the towers of beat the Ro- Phasael, Mariamne, and others; killing all that opposed them. They began next to set fire to the palaces of Agrippa and Berenice, of the high-priest Ananias, and of d his brother Ezechias; and these two last, who had hid themselves from their fury, being discovered, were murdered without mercy. Menabem, one of the sons of the late Judas, chief of the Gaulonites, had now put himself at the head of the sicarii, who now called themselves zealots; and being come to Jerusalem, was chosen chief of the seditious there, but was soon after massacred by them, with a great number of his men. His nephew Eleazar succeeded him as chief of the zealots, and besieged the Romans so close in their castle, that they capitulated at length to retire only with their lives; which being promised to them, he caused them all to be massacred on the spot, though it was on the sabbath †. This treachery was cruelly retaliated on the e generous Jews of Scythopolis, or Bethshean, who had offered the Greeks of that city to stand by them against their brethren, who were besieging them. But their sincerity being unhappily suspected by their townsmen, these obliged them to retire into some neighbouring wood, where on the third night they came upon them, when they were asleep, and killed thirteen thousand of them, and seized upon all their wealth (M) †.

- BY this time the revolted Jews had carried their conquests beyond Jordan, and had taken the fortresses of Macheron and Cyprus; this last they rased to the ground, after having put all the Romans to the sword; so that Cestius Gallus, who had hitherto kept himself an idle spectator of all these mutual devastations, began to think it high time to bestir himself. He marched into Judæa with a powerful army, burned f all the towns and villages in his way, massacred all the Jews he could come at, and Scythopolitan Jews massa- came and incamped before Gibeon (N), about the feast of tabernacles. at Jerusalem no sooner heard of his approach, than they forsook the solemnity, and a though on the sabbath, armed themselves, and came out against him with such fury, that they had in all likelihood defeated him, had not his foot been timely succoured by his cavalry. He lost above five hundred men, and the Jews but twenty-two. The latter having seized on all the passes round about, Cestius was forced to stay three days near Bethoron, where Agrippa joined him, and assisted him with his troops, his person, council, and good offices. He tried once more to bring the Jews to some temper, by sending two of his chief captains to offer them a pardon, and some terms of peace; but the revolvers, instead of hearkening to their proposals, killed one of them, and wounded the other, who narrowly escaped with his life. This base action, which was highly condemned by the more moderate Jews, caused a dissension between them, b which Cestius failed not to improve, by sallying suddenly against them, and pursuing them almost up to Jerusalem. He stayed three days at Scotus, a small mile from it, to try whether their fright would make them relent, and then advanced towards them in order of battle on the thirtieth of October, and put them into such consternation, that they abandoned all the outer quarters of the city, and retired into the inner cincture near the temple. Cestius set fire to the former, and began himself to besiege the latter, and took up his head quarters in the royal palace d.

HAD the governor vigorously pushed on the siege, it is likely he might have put an effectual end to the sedition; but that sinful nation was now reserved for greater evils, and the siege was on the sudden shamefully raised, at the instigation of some of Cestius's generals, whom Florus had corrupted; which gave a new life to the sedi- c tious. They pursued him to his camp at Gibeon, harassing him in the rear, whilst those that kept the passes attacked him in flank. His army in despair not being able to move forward or backward, made the mountains echo with their hideous cries, and after a loss of four thousand foot, and four hundred horse, and of a great part of their baggage, being assisted by the intervening night on the eighth of November, happily got down through the narrow streights of Bethoron, and escaped e. The Jews, after this success against the Syrian governor, set themselves about the properest means to carry on the war against the Romans, and chusing some of their bravest chiefs to command in the several cantons and fortresses of Judæa, Josephus the writer of these wars, a brave Jewish priest, of considerable rank, was appointed governor of the two d Galilees. Joseph the son of Gorion, and the high-priest Ananus, had the government of Jerusalem; and Eleazar, the chief of the revolvers, that of Idumæa; soon after which they departed to take care each of their particular commands. All this while there reigned such a dissension among the Jews, that great numbers of the better sort, foreseeing the sad effects of the Romans resentment, forsook the city, as men do a sinking vessel, and the christians, mindful of their Saviour's warning (O), retired into Pella, a small city on the other side Jordan, in the tetrarchy of Herod, whither the war did not reach f.

WHILST the new chosen governors were putting their respective cantons in the best posture of defence, the son of Gorion in repairing the fortifications of Jerusalem, e Josephus in fortifying a vast number of places in the upper and lower Galilee, and raising of forces to the number of a hundred thousand, preparing arms and ammunition, and Eleazar was doing the same in Idumæa; the news came to Nero of all these preparations, as well as of the ill success of Cestius against the Jews. Vespasian, who had already signalized himself in Germany and England, being then with the emperor in Achaia, was nominated to march with all speed against Judæa with a powerful army g. He came accordingly into Syria, gathered all his forces, and those of his auxiliaries, as its name properly imports (10). Josephus says elsewhere, it was but forty stades from that metropolis (11).

Cestius's army consisted of the whole twelfth legion, two thousand men picked out of the other legions, six cohorts of foot, four of horse, besides three thousand horse, and six thousand foot sent him by Agrippa and Antiochus, and four thousand from Seamus; in the whole about twenty thousand foot, and five thousand horse.

(O) Eusebius assures us (12), upon the testimony of some ancient fathers, that God was pleased to direct them to this flight even before the beginning of the war; and Epiphanius adds (13), by the ministry of an angel sent on purpose to the church of Jerusalem.

- a among whom Agrippa did not fail to meet him at the head of a considerable reinforcement of his own, whilst Titus was sent by his father to fetch the fifth and tenth legions from Alexandria into Judea ^b. It is likely, Cestius did not long outlive his disgrace, for we hear no more of him; and the Jews, elated at his defeat, if not also at his death, took it into their heads to go and besiege Ascalon. Antony, who commanded there, came out against them, and killed ten thousand of them; they made a second attempt, and were surprised in the way, and cut off to almost the same number. Niger, who headed the Jews, fled into a tower, to which Antony set fire; and not doubting but he was burnt in it, left the place; but upon the Jews coming three days after to bury their dead, they found him in a cave under-ground, where he had saved himself from the flames ^c.

^b Year of the flood 3065. Before Christ 67.

- b Vespasian on the very beginning of the next year, having sent Placidus to succour the inhabitants of Sepphoris (P) against the Jews, advanced towards Ptolemais with Agrippa, and was there joined by Titus at the head of another body of troops, with whom he had marched thither even in the very depth of winter, and came much sooner than was expected. Their whole forces of horse and foot consisted now of upwards of sixty thousand men, besides servants, all excellently disciplined, with which they entered Galilee, and having burnt Gadara, were marching to besiege Jotapa. Josephus, now governor of that province, having timely notice of it, went into that place, and defended it with great bravery and vigour forty-seven days, in spite of all the Roman efforts and bravery. It was at length taken by assault about the beginning of July (Q), and put to fire and sword; not one Jew escaped to carry the dreadful news, but they were all either murdered, or made prisoners. There were reckoned forty thousand of the former, and but twelve hundred of the latter, among whom was Josephus, who had hid himself in a deep cavern, but was at length discovered, and by Vespasian's generous offers and intreaties, though much against the consent of those Jews that were with him (R), went and surrendered himself prisoner to him. When he was brought before Vespasian, the whole army crouding about to see him, he was put under a guard, with a design to be sent to Nero; which when the Jewish general understood, he desired to have the liberty to speak to him; which being granted, he addressed himself to him in words to this effect: My message to you being from the God of heaven, is of much greater concern to you, than the disposal of me as your prisoner, or sending me to the emperor; and as a Jewish commander, I should have preferred death to this surrender, had it not been to deliver his divine commission to you. The interval between Nero's end, and your succeeding him, is so small, that I already look upon you as emperor, and your son Titus as your happy successor. Keep me only as your prisoner, and if you find I have abused God's name in promising you from him the empire of the world, then punish me with the severest

(P) We have already observed, that this city was the metropolis of Galilee, and was very considerable for its strength, situation, bigness, and opulence. It was now become obnoxious to the revolted Jews, by reason of its adherence to the Romans, so that it would have undergone a dreadful fate, had not Vespasian sent timely succours to it (14).

(Q) The reader may see the strength of this place in Josephus (15), with the many other remarkable particulars of this obstinate siege (16), wherein the Romans were terribly pestered by the valour and conduct of the besieged, and the general himself wounded in the heel (17). This stout resistance occasioned the great slaughter he made of them, and the vast disproportion between the number of the slain, and of the prisoners, the latter being in all probability only women and children.

(R) This cavern was cut into the rock by the side of a well, and well stored with provision; and there Josephus found forty of his own men. He went out the first night to see whether there was any possibility of escaping; but finding none, he resolved to abide there as long as he could. He was discovered on the third day by a woman, and Vespasian, who had a great desire to see him, sent him two of his tribunes to promise him his life and friendship. Upon his refusal to surrender himself, he sent a third, named Nicanor, and an old acquaintance of his; but he returning likewise without him, the Romans were for burning him and his men out of it, but were hindered by their brave general.

At length finding it dangerous to resist any longer, he proposed to the rest to accept of Vespasian's generous offer; for which they upbraided him with treachery and baseness, and threatened to kill him, if he presumed to stir out. He tried once more to remonstrate to them the unlawfulness of self-murder, which he saw them now fully bent upon; he was forced at last to propose to them to draw lots, who should kill the next, and so on, till the last man; which being agreed to by the rest, providence so ordered it, that there were but two left, viz. Josephus, and one more; so that being loth either to kill him, or be killed by him, he at length persuaded him to a surrender, which was accordingly done (18).

death. Vespasian took him at his word, used him with great respect and generosity, ^a but caused him to be kept close prisoner, having a design to make some further use of him in his war against the Jews ^k. This prediction of the Jewish historian to the Roman general, is likewise confirmed by Suetonius ^l and Dion Cassius ^m. Something like this, but with a more dreadful prospect to the Jews, Lactantius ⁿ tells us ^o, had been foretold at Rome about the same time by the two great apostles, Peter and Paul; the substance of which the reader will find in the margin (S). As soon as the news of Jotapa's being taken, had reached Jerusalem, the Jews, who heard also that Josephus had been killed in it, made the greatest mourning and lamentations for him for a whole month; but when they came to hear that he had surrendered himself prisoner to the Romans, they, who had till then retained a singular esteem and regard for him, began now to look upon him as a base betrayer of his country, and to persecute him with the most irreconcilable hatred and disdain, of which they gave him many singular proofs, as we shall see in the sequel. ^b

WHILST Vespasian was besieging Jotapa, Trajan (T) had been sent to form that of Jatpha, in the neighbourhood, and took it on the twentieth of June, but complimented young Titus with the honour of it, who came accordingly upon the last assault. Upon their entering the place, the Japbians held out a bloody and obstinate street fight during six whole hours; but being at length overpowered, all the men were put to the sword, and the women and children carried away prisoners ^c. A week after, the Samaritans, who had assembled upon mount Garizzim, with a design of defending themselves, having been closely surrounded by Cerealis at the head of a Roman detachment, were ready to perish for want of water. Many of them suffered themselves to die with thirst, and those who refused to surrender, were all butchered to one man ^d. Joppa, which had been lately laid waste by Cestius, being again repeopled by a great number of seditious Jews, who infested the countries about, Vespasian sent some troops to take it, which they soon achieved. Above four thousand Jews endeavouring to escape the massacre, by betaking themselves to their ships, a sudden tempest drove them back, so that they were all either drowned, or put to the sword. Tarichea and Tiberias were taken next (U): the former of these being situate on an eminence, and by the lake of Genezareth, was besieged by land and by water, and made a desperate defence, till a dissension happened within; which being overheard by Titus, who commanded at the siege, the town was taken by storm, and all the seditious condemned to die ^e.

AFTER the reduction of those two places, all the other cities of Galilee submitted themselves to the Romans, except those of Gisbala and Gamala, and the mountain of Itabyr (W). Against Gamala, which was situate over-against Tarichea, on the same lake,

(S) That God should in a little time send a prince against the Jews that should overcome them, and level their metropolis with the ground: that during the siege of it, they should pine with hunger and thirst, even to the eating of one another: that after it was taken, they should see their women grievously tormented before their eyes, their virgins disflowered, their young men torn asunder, and their babes dashed in pieces, themselves reduced to the lowest misery, their country wasted with fire and sword, and the whole nation banished out of their own land, because they had exalted themselves above the most gracious and approved Son of God.

These two apostles, according to the records of both eastern and western churches, suffered martyrdom on the twenty-ninth of June, the last day of which month falls within the reign of Nero (19); and an ancient father affirms, that the day of St. Paul's death was more certainly known than that of Alexander the Great (20); and Dionysius bishop of Corinth tells us, that St. Peter suffered death on the same day (21). St. Paul was beheaded; but St. Peter was, according to our Saviour's prediction (22), crucified, but with his head downward at his own desire, and out of respect to his divine master (23).

(T) Probably the same, who was afterwards emperor; but at present he was only a colonel of one of the legions.

(U) These two cities belonged to Agrippa, but had revolted; the latter was divided; some of the citizens, being for peace, were opposed by the seditious party. Vespasian sent some officers to persuade them to submit, but they were repulsed, and forced to flee for their lives; for which he would have burnt the city, but the peaceable citizens having represented their case to Agrippa, he interceded for them, and obtained their pardon (24).

(W) The same with Itabyr, spoken of in a former volume (25), with a spacious plain near twenty stades in square on the top, with a city of the same name upon it. The area was encompassed with a large wall, built by Josephus in about forty days (26). As a lake, as Agrippa had in vain carried on a siege of near seven months; the Romans were forced to come and assist him. He tried however by a set speech to persuade them to surrender, before they were reduced to greater streights. The only answer they made him was with stones from their engines, one of which wounded him in the arm. The Romans, provoked to behold the little regard which those wretches paid to their monarch, made such a desperate assault against them, that they had got possession of the town; but being inferior in number, they were soon driven out of it with considerable loss. It was renewed afresh with greater fury, and as obstinately opposed by the besieged, who put the Roman courage and strength to the severest proof they had as yet felt. At length three stout Romans having beaten down one of the towers, the army entered in at the breach, and put all they met to the sword, to the number of four thousand. But a much greater number perished by their own hands, flinging themselves down from the rocks, walls, and by other violent means. During this siege Placidus was sent to take Itabyr mentioned in the last note. He went and sily drew the Jews down into the plain by a pretended flight, faced about, and defeated them, and got possession of the mountain[†].

b AFTER this stout siege was over, Vespasian sent his son Titus to form that of Giscebala; Giscebala taken. and this last, who was now beginning to relent at the great slaughter made at Gamala, earnestly exhorted them to prevent, by a timely surrender, involving themselves in the same fate. The citizens were inclinable enough to take his advice; but a seditious Jew of that town, named John, the son of Levi, head of the faction, and a vile fellow, opposed it, and having the mob at his beck, overawed the whole city. That day being the sabbath, this wretch begged but of Titus to forbear hostilities till the morrow, and then he would accept of his offer; but instead of that fled to Jerusalem, where he committed an infinite deal of mischief. On the morrow the citizens came and surrendered themselves, and told the Roman general of John's flight, begging of him that he would spare the guiltless, and only punish the factious, which he readily consented to, and only sent some of his horse after the fugitives. But John had reached Jerusalem; before they could overtake him; they killed however near six thousand of his followers on the road, and brought back three thousand women and children prisoners. The taking and garisoning of this last place completed the conquest of Galilee, and Titus rejoined his father at Cesarea, where they gave their troops some respite before they went to besiege Jerusalem[‡].

d THE Jewish nation by this time was divided into two very opposite parties: The one, foreseeing, that this war, if continued, must end in the total ruin of their country, were for putting an effectual end to it, by a speedy submission to the Romans: The other, which was the spawn of the Gaulonitish incendiary, and breathed nothing but war, confusion, and cruelty, opposed all peaceable measures with an invincible obstinacy. This party, which was by far the more numerous and powerful, consisted of men of the vilest and most abandoned profligate character that ever history could parallel. They were proud, ambitious, cruel, rapacious, and committed the most horrid and unnatural crimes, under pretence of religion. In a word, if Josephus's character of them may be credited, they acted more like incarnate devils, than like men, who had any sense left of goodness and humanity. They covered however their hellish brutality with the specious title of zeal for the glory of God, affirming every-where, that it was offering the greatest dishonour to him to submit to any earthly potentate, much more to Romans and heathens; and that this was the only motive that induced them to take up arms, and to bind themselves under the strictest obligations, not to lay them down, till they had either totally extirpated all foreign authority, or perished in the attempt (X)[§]. This obliged the contrary party to rise f up likewise in arms in their own defence against those hell-hounds, from whom how-

As for the town of Sephoris, which was extremely rich and strong, it never once rebelled during all this war, but kept constant to their subjection to the Romans, so that Gamala and Giscebala were the two last towns in Galilee to be reduced.

(X) This dreadful dissension was not confined to Jerusalem, but had infected all the cities, towns, and villages of Palestine. Even houses and families were so divided against each other, that, as our Saviour had expressly foretold in the dreadful picture he made of this final war (26), a man's greatest enemies were often those of his own family and household (27).

Their horrid
butcheries.
Year of the
Of Christ 32.

THE zealots began to exercise their cruelty in robbing, plundering, and massacring all that opposed them in the countries round about; after which they easily entered Jerusalem with Zechariah and Eleazar at their head. Here they were, at first, strenuously opposed by the late high-priest Ananus (Y), whose zeal upon this occasion Josephus highly commends. That pontiff made a pathetic speech to the people, exhorting them to take up arms against those factious villains, who had by this time seized upon the temple, and made it their garison, from which they sallied out to commit the vilest outrages and butcheries. He easily persuaded them to follow his advice, upon which they went and armed themselves, and returned in a strong body, and made a vigorous attack against them. The engagement was fierce and obstinate on both sides, and lasted a considerable time. At length, Ananus forced them out of the outer cincture of the temple, whence they retired into the inner, where he held them closely besieged. We have already taken notice of a vile demagogue, John de Guisbala, who had fled lately from this last place to Jerusalem, and was at the head of the seditious; this wretch under pretence of taking the interest of the peaceable party, was actually betraying them to the zealots. Ananus, not suspecting his treachery (Z), sent him to offer the besieged some fair terms of accommodation; instead of which, when he came to them, he persuaded them to hold out, and call the Idumeans to their assistance. They did so, and procured twenty thousand of them to come to their relief; but when these approached the metropolis, Ananus refused them entrance, and exhorted them in a civil and friendly manner to retire into their own country; at which they were so exasperated, that they accused him of being in the Roman interest, and just going to betray the city to them. They set down before the walls for that day, threatening Ananus and Jesus the son of Gamaliel, another deposed high-priest, in the severest terms, if they did not open their gates to them.

Seize the temple.

Invite the Idumeans.

Horrid butcheries committed.

ON that very night there happened such a dreadful storm, accompanied with thunder and lightening, and a violent earthquake, that the zealots from within the inner court, sawed the bolts and hinges of the temple gates, without being heard, forced the guards of the besiegers, and sallied into the city, and let in the Idumeans. These two parties, thus joined and strengthened, began to commit the most horrid and unheard-of murders and butcheries on the opposite side. Barely to put them to any speedy death, was what they thought too mild a punishment; they must have the pleasure to murder them by inches; so that they made it now their diversion to put them to the most exquisite tortures that could be invented, neither could they be prevailed upon to dispatch them, till the violence of their torments had rendered them quite incapable of feeling them. Twelve thousand persons of noble extraction, and in the flower of their age, were butchered in that horrid manner, and among them the brave Ananus (A), and Jesus the son of Gamaliel, who had so nobly opposed them. In a word, the zealots fury and cruelty was grown to such a height, that the whole nation

(Y) He had been deposed about six years before, as we have already seen, and succeeded by several others. Matthias the son of Theophilus was now in that dignity, to which he had been raised a year or two before by king Agrippa (18); but the seditious in the temple took it into their heads to chuse another in his stead, which they did by casting lots first for the twenty-four classes, in which the twelfth was taken, and in that, upon one Phannias, a man wholly unfit for it, and whom they were forced to teach the manner of performing his office.

This unprecedented boldness, joined to their massacres, and other pollutions of the temple, and even of the very sanctuary, gave such offence, not to the priests only, but to all the religious Jews, that they sought from that time for some means of ridding themselves of their tyranny, whilst the zealots crew made a jest of them, and of every thing that was sacred, serious, or humane.

(Z) Such was their insatiation, that this wretch, who had skrewed himself into all their councils, and betrayed them to the zealots, had behaved with such an affected integrity, that few of them suspected him; and when some of the council began to question his counterfeited zeal, they were overruled by the rest, who contented themselves with making him swear, that he would be true to them; which gave him all the opportunity of ruining them that he could desire.

(A) We have observed elsewhere, that he was the son of Ananus mentioned in the gospel: It was he that caused St. James to be cast down from the battlements of the temple, and to be put to death. In other cases, he was a brave man, and the only person almost that had courage and conduct enough left to stem the tide, and to restore peace to the nation; and it was for this reason that the zealots cut him off.

(18) Bell. Jud. l. iv. c. nit.

- a trembled at their very name; none dared be seen or heard to weep or cry for the murder of their nearest relations, nor even to give them burial *.

THE Idumeans crying out shame at length at the massacring such numbers of worthy persons indiscriminately, the zealots began to set up a kind of court of judicature, to judge those they should think guilty with some shew of justice: Zechariah the son of Baruch (B) was one of the first who was brought before this mock court, which consisted of seventy-two persons. They brought a black catalogue of accusations, against him, which he not only refuted with great ease and plainness, but reminded them of their own black and hellish crimes with such noble courage, and in such lively colours, that the consciousness of their guilt made them pronounce him innocent; at

- b which the zealots were so exasperated, that they murdered him on the spot, bidding him at the same time to take that absolution at their hands, which would prove surer to him than that of his judges; after which they drove these out of their seats as persons unfit for their purpose. They threw the body of Zechariah out of the temple down into the deep valley that was by the side of it; and the Idumeans, ashamed to act any longer in concert with such bloody assassins, retired into their own country, after having set at liberty two thousand of their prisoners; and left the zealots to reign in their cruelties without any further restraint. From this time these bloody hell-hounds, who were glad at heart to see their backs turned upon them, gave themselves a loose to all manner of barbarities; and as nothing rendered a man more dreadful to them than the bare suspicion of his being honest or virtuous, so they made the greatest havoc among all that had the least pretence to that character *.

Zechariah murdered in the temple.

THEIR rage did not stop there; but after having butchered all the persons of any distinction or character, they began to wreak it on the common people. It was a capital crime to have once seemed to oppose them: to be unactive, was to be a spy on them; and not to applaud their vilest actions, was to be disaffected; and to be either rich, or suspected to be so, or even having the misfortune of being disliked by them, was crime enough to deserve death *. Thus obliged many of the Jews to forsake Jerusalem, and take shelter under the Romans, though the gates and avenues of the city were so closely guarded, that it was extremely hazardous to retire to them, and

- d as many as were caught doing so, were put to immediate death. All this while Vespasian, who was at Cæsarea, remained a kind of idle spectator afar off of the dismal condition of the Jewish nation. His officers, amazed at this so unusual inaction, took the liberty to remind him what pity it was he should thus neglect the most favourable opportunity of making himself master of Jerusalem, and all Palestine. Vespasian, who had a longer head than they, soon made them sensible that his continuing thus idle in Cæsarea, was the most probable means of effecting the conquest they were speaking of, with the least difficulty and hazard of his own troops; since the Jewish strength dwindled daily more and more by their intestine broils and massacres, whilst his own men, after enjoying so long a refreshment, would be the better able to crush them into submission or death * (C).

(B) This brave and worthy person is by many christian commentators supposed the same with the Zechariah the son of Barachiah, said by our Saviour to have been murdered between the temple and the altar (19). It is indeed objected, that he speaks there of him, as of a person long since put to death; but it is replied, that he spake prophetically, and according to the prophetic style, made use of the present for the future. And it must be owned, that unless these two historians speak of the same person, it will be difficult to find out the Zechariah mentioned in the gospel; the last of those just persons, the shedding of whose blood was to fill up the measure of the Jews iniquities.

We shall not enter into the merit of the controversy, but refer our readers to those who have writ upon it, and which the reader will find in the margin (30).

(C) The event shewed that he reasoned like a consummate general; for those cruelties did not only thin the enemy, but forced a vast many of the zealots away to the Romans by reason of some dissensions which began to reign among them, and in spite of the danger of being caught in the way.

Among their cruel executions on these, there was one Niger, a Peraite or native of Perea, a person of distinction, who had signalised himself in their former wars against the Romans; who, together with the brave Gorion, was seized, and dragged shamefully out of the city; where the former, finding his death inevitable, only begged that his body might be afterwards buried. But the merciless wretches refusing to grant him even that, he addressed himself to heaven, and prayed that the Romans might at length come, and wreak their direct vengeance on those murderers. His words were looked upon as prophetically; but Josephus mentions some other oracles, which had long ago foretold the total ruin of that nation, so well

divided into

EVERY thing succeeded to his wish. The zealots, after having massacred or driven away the opposite party, began to turn their bloody swords against each other. John of Gischala, a wretch of unparalleled ambition, could not brook that any should share the command with him; and in order to make himself absolute, drew the most profligate of the zealots into his party. The other chiefs, who opposed him with no small heat, made another faction, so that they were ever either skirmishing each other, or plundering the poor remains of the people. Whilst things went thus on from bad to worse in the city, there arose a new gang of sicarii in the country, who having seized the strong fortrefs of Massada, made it their place of retreat. These plundered, burned and massacred every-where, and carried their plunder into that place. They had at their head one Simon the son of Gorias, a bold ambitious young man, a native of Gelasa, who to increase his party, caused a proclamation to be dispersed, in which he promised free liberty to all the slaves, and proportionable encouragements to all the freemen, that should come over to him. This stratagem had the desired effect; and he saw his party in a very little time swelled into a considerable army, and himself as respected and obeyed, as if he had been a monarch. Many Jews of distinction, as well as others of a meaner rank, were glad thus to put themselves under his protection from the cruelty of the other parties ^b.

WHILST these things were transacting in Judea, Nero having been declared an enemy to Rome by the senate, left both it and the world to avoid the more shameful punishment decreed against him ^c, as shall be further shewn in the Roman history. Vespasian, who was yet ignorant of it, and did not give great heed to Josephus's prediction of his becoming emperor, was making great preparations against the revolted Jews, and for the siege of Jerusalem, whilst Simon, at the head of a good army, was making war against the zealots. These last, having notice what great magazines of arms and ammunition Simon had got, in order to come and invest them, began to think it high time to try to disperse his forces by a vigorous sally. They did so, and were defeated and put to flight; but Simon not thinking himself strong enough yet to besiege Jerusalem, went to invade Idumea with an army of twenty thousand men. The Idumeans marched against him with twenty-five thousand, which was all they could get in that short time. A fierce battle ensued, which lasted from morning till night, by which time it could scarcely be guessed which side had had the better. But Simon found means soon after to have that country betrayed to him by a treacherous Idumean (D), who having got the command of their forces, delivered them up to him, as had been agreed between them. Simon put all to fire and sword, and by the conquest of that province, became more dreadful than ever to the zealots; who from that time did not dare to come out against him, but contented themselves with laying ambushes against him in all the passes, in one of which they took his wife prisoner. They were on the sudden strangely elated at their success, not doubting but they should now easily force him to lay down his arms, in order to get her released to him. But it happened quite otherwise; for Simon no sooner heard the news, than he posted with his army to the very gates of Jerusalem, where he committed such cruelties, and threatened the enemy into such a fright, that they were glad to send him his wife again, after which he left them to go and ruin the sad remains of Idumea. These miserable wretches, seeing the devastations and butcheries which he committed there, left the country to his mercy, and went to take shelter at Jerusalem, and were pursued by his troops to the very walls of that metropolis ^d.

well as destruction of the city and temple. Whoever reads the eleventh and following chapters of Zechariah, will be apt enough to think, that the Jewish historian had an eye to them (31), among the many others we could name to the same purpose.

(D) This miscreant, whose name was James, was one of the Idumean chiefs, and was sent by the rest to reconnoitre the enemy, and know the number of their forces. He set out from the Idumean camp at Olura, and privately agreed with Simon to deliver up the army and country to him, on condition he should be treated with honour; which being promised, he returned to his camp, and there represented the enemy's army as vastly more numerous and strong than it really was; by which means he easily obtained the command, and compassed his treacherous design (32).

- a hands were sure to be butchered without mercy; inasmuch that there was now no safe place either in city or country. John had hitherto tyrannised within at the head of his blood-hounds with uncommon success, when the Idumeans, who were left in the city, and were of his party, not being longer able to bear his tyranny, revolted against him, killed a great number of his men, plundered his palace (E), and forced him to retire into the temple. In the mean time, the people, having taken a notion that he would sally out in the night, and set fire to the city, called a council, in which they pitched upon a remedy far worse than the disease, which was to open the city gates, and let in Simon with his troops to oppose those of John and his zealots. Matthias, the then high-priest, against whom these last had set up an obscure priest into that dignity, promoted the design, without troubling himself about the consequences of it, and was sent to acquaint Simon with it. Simon was accordingly admitted into the city, where his chief care now was to render his strength as great, and authority as absolute as he could. To this end he looked indifferently on those that had invited him in, and those against whom he was called, and soon began to exert his cruelty against them equally, though the former had received him with great honours, and universal acclamations, as their future deliverer. But ingratitude and breach of faith were crimes of too light a nature to scare a wretch that had discarded all natural and civil virtues, to abandon himself to the most monstrous vices. He made however a bold assault against John, and his party; but being as stoutly repulsed, he contented himself for the present with keeping them closely besieged in the temple *.

- c THE Romans on the other hand had not stood idle all this last year; but being invited by the inhabitants of Gadara, one of the strongest places on that side Jordan, had sent Placidus to take possession of it. He was forced to fight his way through several stout bodies of the factious, who opposed him. He killed about fifteen thousand of them, as they were endeavouring to pass that river, besides a great number of others, whom he defeated at several encounters, and many more made prisoners. In a word, Placidus bestirred himself so well, that he soon reduced all that part of Judaea which lies on the east side of the Jordan, except the castle of Macheron. All this was done in the winter. In the beginning of the spring Vespasian marched out of Casarea, and penetrated near half of Idumea, plundering and burning every place he came through, except such as he thought expedient to leave with a Roman garison to keep the country in awe f. Gadara surrendered.

- SOME months before this time, Vespasian received the news of Nero's death, and of Galba's being chosen his successor; upon which he immediately dispatched his son Titus to Rome, to compliment the new emperor, and to receive his orders concerning the reduction of Judaea. Agrippa desired to bear him company, but the winter not being quite over, and their ships being of a large bulk, they sailed so slowly, that they were got no farther than Achaia, when they received the news of Galba's being murdered, after a seven months reign, and Otho's being proclaimed in his room. Agrippa resolved to continue his voyage, but Titus, as by some divine impulse, was now come back to rejoin his father at Casarea, whither he was returned after his Idumean expedition g. They left Casarea on the fifth of June, and led their army towards Jerusalem, and took every place in their way thither, except Herodion, Macheron, and Massada, whilst Cerealis, one of their chief generals, was laying waste the upper Idumea with a considerable number of troops. - WHILST Judaea was thus miserably torn with a foreign, and with their intestine wars, the Roman empire was in as bad a plight with their own. We shall not anticipate on the Roman history so far as to enter into the particulars of the murder of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. Suetonius h compares Rome to a vessel tossed about by contrary winds, and ready at every moment to sink, when Vespasian was happily chosen emperor, and restored a calm to the empire. Josephus now reaped the benefit Vespasian chosen emperor.

of his former predictions, and that emperor recalling them to mind, thought it high a time now not only to give him his liberty, but recompense him for his faithfulness to him with many signal favours¹ (F). As soon as Vespasian had received the news that his election had been confirmed at Rome, he left the best of his troops with his son, with orders to go and besiege Jerusalem, and to destroy it utterly; after which he prepared himself to return to the capital of his empire.

Three factions in Jerusalem. ALL this while the Jewish dissensions increased, and Eleazar the son of another Simon, a person of the sacerdotal order, and of great sense and courage, found means to form a new party, and to draw a considerable number of John Gischala's men to him, under pretence that this last was become so inhuman and tyrannic, that it was dangerous to let him lord it any longer over them. With this new party he seized on the court of the priests, and confined John into that of the Israelites. Eleazar kept the avenues so well guarded, that none were admitted to come into that part of the temple, but those who came thither to offer sacrifices, and it was by these offerings chiefly that he maintained himself and his men. John by this means found himself hemmed by two powerful enemies, Eleazar above (G), and Simon, who was master of the city, below. He defended himself against the former by his engines (H), out of which he kept still throwing of stones into his court; and when he sallied out against the latter, he set all on fire, where-ever he could reach, by which he destroyed great quantities of corn, and other provisions, with which they might otherwise have held out a siege several years. Thus were these three factions ever watching all advantages against each other. Simon had the greatest number of troops, and a store of arms and provisions, his army consisting of ten thousand zealots, and five thousand Idumeans; but he was the most disadvantageously situated of the three. John had the advantage over him in this last respect, but had but six thousand men, and was forced to get provisions for them by his constant sallies. He was superior to Eleazar in number of men; this last having but about two thousand four hundred. But he was more strongly situated, and was continually supplied with provisions, by the continual offerings which the people brought to the temple, and which they often abused by luxury and drunkenness².

Their condition and advantages.

THIS was the sad distracted state of Jerusalem, when Titus marched his army against it. He had, besides the three legions which had served under his father, the fifth legion, which had been so sadly handled by the Jews in Cestius's time, and now burned with a desire of revenge. Besides these, Agrippa, Soemus and Antiochus, the two former of whom accompanied him in person, and some allied cities, had furnished him with twenty regiments of foot, and eight of horse, besides vast multitudes of Arabs, and a choice number of persons of distinction from Italy and other places, who came to signalize themselves under his standards. Titus ordered the fifth legion to take the road of Emmaus, the tenth that of Jericho, the other two legions marched

(F) Vespasian was then at Berytus, where vast numbers of embassadors came crowding to compliment him on his election, and to offer him the usual crowns and letters of submission. Here he held a grand council, wherein having highly extolled the courage of the Jewish chief, he related to them how he had foretold his coming to the empire even during Nero's life.

Titus, who was there present, and had conceived a great esteem for him, declared that it would be an action worthy his goodness and justice to grant him his liberty, to knock off his fetters, and to restore him to the rank and condition which he enjoyed before his captivity. It being the custom of the Romans to break the bonds of those who had been unjustly detained in them, Vespasian approved his proposal, and caused it to be put in execution out of hand; and Josephus not only gained his liberty by it, but got the reputation of a prophet, and was in high credit in the Roman army ever after (34).

(G) We have formerly observed in our description of this stately building, that the innermost court was raised considerably above the rest, having a terrace and nineteen steps to ascend to the area of it *.

(H) John had luckily found a great quantity of large cedar trees, which king Agrippa had caused to be brought from Lebanus at a vast charge, to raise the temple twenty cubits higher than it was, or perhaps that part which we observed in the note last quoted to have been sunk that number of cubits through the weakness of the foundation; but his project was set aside by reason of the war.

John having possession of this court, soon put this timber to other uses, and caused towers and other engines to be made with it, in order to besiege his competitor within; and indeed he ceased not harassing him, but whilst he was forced to defend himself against Simon, who besieged him from without. The flight of steps and terrace mentioned in the last note not permitting him to bring his towers near enough to the wall of the inner cincture, he was projecting to have removed them towards the western side, where the ground was all plain; but providence so ordered it, that Titus began the siege of the city before he could compass it, which made him set his project aside.

- a after him in the order, which the reader will find in the margin (1)¹. It was now the beginning of April, and near the feast of the passover, to which there was a greater resort of Jews this year, than had ever been known, even from beyond the Euphrates (K).

Titus being advanced so near the city, went himself to reconnoitre its strength and avenues, attended only with six hundred horse; he seemed even to flatter himself, that upon his first appearance, the peaceable part of the Jews would open the gates to him; but to his surprise, the factious made so sudden and vigorous a rally against him, that he found himself quite surrounded with enemies, in a narrow defile, his cavalry severed from him, so that he had no other way left to escape their fury, but to make a desperate push, and break his way through them; which he at length, almost by a miracle, happily accomplished, even without receiving any wound, or losing more than two of his men ^m. After this narrow escape, he caused his army to draw nearer to Scopas, within seven stades of the city, in order to besiege it in form, whilst the factious within were applauding themselves for their late advantage, which they vainly interpreted as a good omen of their future success. His legion, which had come by the way of Jericho, being arrived, he ordered it to incamp on the mount of olives, which was parted from the town on the east by the brook Cedron, and where they were on the sudden so furiously assaulted by the besieged, that they were in danger of being cut all in pieces, had not Titus come timely to their rescue (L).

- c It was then that the three factions, seeing themselves besieged by so powerful an army, and so brave a general, began to think of laying aside all private feuds, and join together in a vigorous defence against the common enemy. This union however proved but short-lived; for on the fourteenth of April, which was ushering in the passover, when Eleazer had opened the avenues of his court to the great concourse that came thither to sacrifice, John de Gischala found means to slide in some of his men with

(1) Josephus, who was an eye-witness of it, because he was still ordered to follow the emperor, gives it to us as follows *:

The auxiliaries marched first, and were followed by the pioneers, whose business was to level the ground as they went. After them came the general quarter-masters, who marked out their incampments, and were followed by the baggage of the chiefs of the army under a sufficient escort.

Titus came next, attended with his guard, and a select body of troops, followed by a body of horse, who marched just before the warlike engines; and after these came the tribunes and chiefs of the cohorts, attended with a chosen number of troops. Then appeared the Roman eagle, surrounded with the ensigns of the several legions, and preceded by a number of trumpets sounding, and followed by the main body, which marched in rank and file six in a front. Lastly, came the sutlers, handicrafts, &c. attended with a strong guard of soldiers, which closed the whole march. In this order they came to Gophna, which had a Roman garrison, and on the next day to Gibbeth-saul, about thirty stades, or three miles, and a half from Jerusalem.

(K) The chiefs of the Jews in Palestine had written, it seems, to invite all their brethren, every-where, not doubting but their presence and great concourse would contribute to quell the factions within, as well as oppose the Romans without; so that they came flocking to this solemnity from all parts of the world.

But it seems as if they were directed thither by the hand of providence to suffer the punishment of their sins, the bulk of the nation being there, as it were, shut up, in a prison, to add to that of the destroying sword, the dreadful plagues of famine and pestilence, which shortly after devoured them. Josephus reckons eleven hundred thousand that died during the siege.

They neither wanted arms, warlike engines, men or courage, or any thing but experience to make a brave defence; but this they made up by their invincible obstinacy and despair. Their city was strongly situate by nature, surrounded with three stout walls, and many a stately and strong tower. The first, or old wall, which by reason of its vast thickness was looked upon as impregnable, had sixty of these towers, very lofty, firm, and strong. The second had fourteen, and the third eighty. The former of these, besides its extraordinary height and thickness, was raised on a high and steep mountain, and had a valley beneath it of a prodigious depth. The other two were high and strong in proportion. The circuit of the city was thirty-three stades, or four thousand one hundred and twenty-five geometric paces, or near four of our miles.

Besides these vast fortifications, there were several other castles of extraordinary strength, such as those of Hippica, Phasael, Mariamne, and Antonin; to say nothing of the royal, and some other stately and well-fortified palaces. The temple still exceeded all the rest in strength, both for situation, its walls, towers, and other buildings, and was at least equal to the best citadels then in being (35). Yet how insufficient did all these, and the vast quantities of arms, ammunition, &c. prove, to save a nation, whom the divine justice had doomed to the most dreadful destruction! Well might Titus, after he had taken the city, and came to view the incredible strength of it, cry out, that God must have certainly fought for him, since no human power or strength was equal to that which they had now overcome.

(L) Dio adds to what we read in Josephus, that Titus had many such a bloody encounter with the besieged under the walls, in which both sides fought so valiantly, that it was not easy to say which had the better; but that the Jews were at length repulsed, and gave thereby an opportunity to the enemy to open the siege (36).

swords hid under their cloaks among them, who immediately drew their weapons, ^a fell on Eleazar's party, and the rest of the people, filled the court of the priests with blood, and horrid outcries, and took possession of the place. By this bloody and impious stratagem the three factions were reduced to two, Eleazar's men being all either cut off, or after their flight were returned with their chief, and had submitted themselves to John, who had now no enemy but Simon within the walls. From that time this last renewed his hostilities against him with greater vigour: he held now the whole temple, some of the out-parts of it, and the valley of Cedron. Simon had the whole city to range in, in some parts of which John had made such devastation, that they served them for a field of battle; from which they sallied unanimously against the common enemy, whenever occasion served, after which they returned to their usual hostilities, turning their arms against each other, as if they had sworn to make their ruin more easy to the Romans. These in the mean time were drawing still nearer to the walls, having with great labour and pains levelled all the ground between Scopas and them, by pulling down all the houses and hedges, cutting down the trees, and even cleaving the rocks that stood in their way, from Scopas to the tomb of Herod, and Belbara, alias the pool of serpents; in which work so many hands were employed, that they finished it in four days ^b.

The siege began in form.

WHILST this work was doing, Titus sent the besieged some offers of peace; Josephus was pitched upon to be the messenger of them, but they were rejected with indignation. On the morrow they made a shew of accepting them, insomuch that some of the Romans believing them in earnest, ventured, contrary to their general's order, to enter the city, and narrowly escaped with their lives. He sent a second time Nicanor and Josephus with fresh offers, and the former received a wound in his shoulder; upon which Titus resolved to begin the assault in good earnest (M), and ordered his men to raze the suburbs, to cut down all the trees, and use the materials to raise platforms against the wall. Every thing was now carried on with invincible ardour, the Romans began to play their engines against the city in good earnest, and it was by one of these that Jesus the son of Ananus, who had so long foretold the destruction of the Jewish nation, was killed ^c.

Offers of peace rejected.

THE Jews had likewise their machines upon the walls, which they plied with uncommon fury: they had taken them lately from Cestius, when he retired so shamefully ^d from them, but they were so ignorant in their use, that they made little execution with them, till they were better instructed by some Roman deserters. Till then their chief success was rather owing to their frequent sallies; but the Roman legions, which had all their towers and machines before them, made terrible havock. The least stones they threw were near a hundred weight, and these they could throw the length of two stades, or two hundred and fifty paces, and with such force, that having overthrown those that stood in the first rank, they could still do mischief on those that stood at some distance behind them. Titus had reared three towers fifty cubits high on the terrafs above-mentioned; one of which happening to fall in the middle of the night, ^e did greatly alarm the Roman camp, which ran immediately to arms at the noise of it; but Titus, upon knowing the cause, dismissed them, and caused it to be set up again. These towers being platted with iron, the Jews tried in vain to set fire to them, and were at length forced to retire out of the reach of their shot; by which the battering rams were now at full liberty to play against the wall. A breach was soon made in it, at which the Romans entered, and the Jews abandoning this last inclosure, retired behind the next. This happened about the twenty-eighth of April, a fortnight after the beginning of the siege ^f.

The first wall

John defended the temple and the castle of Antonia, and Simon the rest of the city. Titus marched close to the second wall, and plied his battering rams against it so furiously, that one of the towers, which looked towards the north, gave a prodigious shake. The men that were in it made a signal to the Romans, as if they would surrender, and at the same time sent Simon word to be ready to give them a warm recep-

(M) The place which Titus, after having taken a full view round the city, chose to begin his attack, was towards the tomb of the high-priest John, both because it stood on the lowest ground, and because the outer wall was low and not defended on that side by the middlemost; so that when the breach was made on the former, it was easy to penetrate to the latter, and so come up to and make themselves masters of the upper city, and next of the temple, by means of the fortress Antonia.

a tion. Titus having smelt their stratagem, plied his work more furiously, whilst the Jews that were in the tower set it on fire, and flung themselves into the flames. The tower being fallen, gave them an entrance into the second inclosure, five days ^{The second wall taken.} after the gaining the first; and Titus, who was bent on saving the city, would not suffer any part of the wall or streets to be demolished, which left the breach and lanes so narrow, that when his men were furiously repulsed by Simon, they had not room enough to make a quick retreat, so that there was a number of them killed in it. This oversight was quickly rectified, and the attack renewed with such vigour, that the place was carried four days after their first repulse.

b The famine raging in a terrible manner in the city, was soon followed by a pesti- ^{Famine and pestilence.} lence, and as these two dreadful judgments increased, so did the rage of the factious, who by their intestine feuds, had destroyed such quantities of provision, that they were forced to prey upon the people with the most unheard-of cruelty. They forced their houses, and if they found any victuals in them, they butchered them for not appropriating them of it; and if they found nothing but bare walls, which was almost everywhere the case, they put them to the most severe tortures, under pretence that they had some provision concealed. I should, says Josephus, undertake an impossible task, were I to enter into a detail of all the cruelties of those impious wretches; it will be sufficient to say, that I do not think, that since the creation, any city ever suffered such dreadful calamities, or abounded with men so fertile in all kind of wickedness.

c Titus, who knew their miserable condition, and was still willing to spare them, gave them now four days to cool; during which he caused his army to be mustered, and provisions to be distributed to them in sight of the Jews, who flocked upon the walls to see it; and it is thought, that even the most flagitious among the zealots were so frightened at the sight of it, that they would have agreed to a surrender, could they have depended upon that pardon, which their black and horrid deeds made them quite despair of. Josephus was sent to speak to them afresh, and to exhort them not to run themselves into an inevitable ruin, by obstinately persisting in the defence of a place, which could hold out but a very little while, and which the Romans looked upon already as their own. The reader may see his elaborate and pathetic speech ^{Josephus' speech to them besieged.} in the chapter last quoted, and which, he tells us, drew a flood of tears from him. His stubborn people, after many a bitter invective, fell a darting their arrows at him; at which not at all discouraged, he went on with greater vehemence; but all the effect it wrought on them, was only that it prevailed on great numbers to steal away privately to the Romans, whilst the rest became only the more desperate and resolute to hold out to the last, in spite of Titus's merciful offers.

d To hasten therefore to their destined ruin, he caused the city to be surrounded ^{The city immured.} with a strong wall, to prevent their receiving any succours or provision from abroad, their escaping his resentment by flight (N). There was now nothing to be seen through the streets of Jerusalem, but heaps of dead bodies rotting above-ground, walking skeletons, and dying wretches. As many as were caught by the Romans in their sallies, Titus caused to be crucified in sight of the town, to inject a terror on the rest; but the zealots gave it out, that they were those that fled to him for protection, which when Titus understood, he sent a prisoner with his hands cut off to undeceive and assure them, that he spared all that voluntarily came over to him; which encouraged great numbers to accept his offers, though the avenues were closely guarded by the factious, who put all to death who were caught going on that errand. A greater mischief than that was, that even those, who escaped safe to the Romans camp, were miserably butchered by the soldiers, from a notion which these had taken, that they had swallowed great quantities of gold; inasmuch that two thousand of them were ripped up in one night to come at their supposed treasure. When Titus was apprised ^{Horrid butcheries within and without.} of this barbarity, he would have condemned all those butchering wretches to death; but they proved so numerous, that he was forced to spare them, and contented himself with sending a proclamation through his camp, that as many as should be suspected thenceforward of that horrid villainy, should be put to immediate death; yet did not this deter many of them from it, only they did it more privately than before; so greedy were they of that bewitching metal. All this while the defection increased still more through the inhumanity of the faction within, who made the miseries and dying groans of their starving brethren the subject of their cruel mirth, and carried their barbarity even to the sheathing of their swords in sport on those poor wretches, under pretence of trying their sharpness.

False prophets set up.

WHEN they found therefore that neither their guards nor severities could prevent the people's flight, they had recourse to another stratagem equally impious and cruel; which was to hire a pack of vile pretenders to prophecy to go about and encourage the despairing remains of the people to expect a speedy and miraculous deliverance; and this imposture proved a greater expedient with that infatuated nation, than their other precautions. We shall not so far disgust our readers, as to mention what miserable shifts these poor wretches made use of to prolong the sad remains of a life, which ought to have been more loathsome under such circumstances, than the filthy and unnatural aliments they picked up to support it*. It was upon this sad and pinching juncture

(O), that an unhappy mother was reduced to the extremity of butchering and eating her own child. This lady, whose name was Miriam or Mary, had taken refuge with a vast number of others in this accursed city from the beginning of the war. As the famine increased, the factious zealots, who, as we observed before, lived now altogether upon the plunder of the helpless, had often forced into her house, and carried off such provisions as she had been able to procure. She had often tried either by prayers to prevail on them, or by the bitterest curses to provoke them to put an end to her miserable life; those inhuman monsters still thought it too great a mercy to be granted to her. Filled at length with fury and despair, she snatches her sucking child from her bosom, cuts his throat, and broils him; and having satiated her present hunger, she hid the rest. The smell of it soon drew those voracious carrions again to her house; they threatened to put her to the most excruciating tortures, if she did not discover her provision to them; upon which she goes and fetches them the sad reliëts of her mangled infant, and sets it before them, bids them eat heartily, and not be squeamish, since she, the once tender mother of it, had made no scruple to butcher, dress, and make a meal of it. At the sight of this horrid dish those bloody hell-hounds, who never had till then felt the least spark of remorse or humanity, were seized with such sudden dread, that they went off trembling out of the house, and left the astonished mother in full possession of her dismal fare†.

the ruin of the

WHEN this news were spread through the city, the horror and consternation was as universal as it was inexpressible. It was then that they began to think themselves forsaken by the divine providence, and to expect the most terrible effects of his anger against the poor remains of their nation; insomuch that they began to envy those that had perished before them, and to wish their turn might come before the sad expected catastrophe. Their fears were but too just; since Titus, at the very first hearing of this inhuman deed, swore the total extirpation of the city and people. Since, said he, they have so often refused my proffers of pardon, and have preferred war to peace, rebellion to obedience and famine, such a dreadful one especially to plenty, I am determined to bury that cursed metropolis under its ruins, that the sun may never shoot his beams on a city where the mothers feed on the flesh of their children, and the fathers, no less guilty than they, chose to drive them to such extremities, rather than lay down their arms. In the like manner did that good-natured general expostulate with the Deity for the other cruelties which he saw and heard were committed in that wretched metropolis, especially at the sight of such vast numbers of dead bodies, which for want of burying room, they were forced to throw down from their walls

(O) Nothing could be more dreadful than the famished condition they were now reduced to. The poor having nothing to trust to but the Romans mercy, or a speedy death, ran all hazards to get out of the city; and if in their flight, and wandering out for herbs, or any other sustenance, they fell into the hands of any of Titus's parties, sent about to guard the avenues, they were unmercifully scourged and crucified, if they made the least resistance.

The rich within the walls were now forced, tho' in the privatest manner, to give half, or all they were worth, for a measure of wheat, and the middling sort for one of barley. This they were forced to convey into some private place in their houses, and to feed upon it as it was, without daring to pound or grind it, much less, to boil or bake it, lest the noise or smell should draw the rapacious zealots to come and tear it from them. Not that these were reduced to any real want of provisions, but they had a double end in this barbarous plunder, viz. the starving what they cruelly styled all useless persons, and the keeping their own stores in reserve.

- a into the adjacent vallies ; taking heaven to witness, that he was innocent of all those horrid calamities which that infatuated nation had brought upon themselves, and might have prevented by a timely submission ? (P).

THIS dreadful action happened about the end of July, by which time the Romans ^{Fort Antonia} having pursued their attacks with fresh vigour, made themselves masters of the for-^{taken.} tress Antonia ; which obliged the Jews to set fire to those stately galleries, which joined it to the temple, lest they should afford an easy passage to the besiegers into this last ^{2.}. About the same time Titus with much difficulty got materials (Q) for raising new mounds and terraces, in order to hasten the siege, and save, if possible, the sad remains of that once glorious city and nation ; but his pity proved still worse and worse bestowed, on those obstinate wretches, who only became the more furious and desperate by it. Titus at length caused fire to be set to the gates, after having had a ^{Gates set on} very bloody encounter, in which his men were repulsed with loss. The Jews were so ^{fire.} terrified at it, that they suffered themselves to be devoured by the flames without putting a helping hand, either to extinguish them, or save themselves ^{3.}. About the same time, Matthias the high-priest, who had encouraged the people to introduce Simon into the city, met with a requital worthy of that monster of cruelty, being first tortured, and then condemned to death, together with three of his sons, the ^{Matthias put} fourth having happily conveyed himself out of reach. The pretence was, their hold-^{to death.} ing correspondence with the Romans, and the reverend old pontiff only begged as the last favour, that he might be put to death before his sons, but was denied both that and common burial. Ananias with about seventeen persons more of rank and merit, were put to death after them ^b ; besides many more for having been caught weeping for their deceased friends. All this while Josephus did not cease exhorting them to surrender, to represent to them the dreadful consequences of an obstinate resistance, and to assure them, that it was out of his mere compassion to them that he thus hazarded his own life to save theirs : he received one day such a wound in his head by a stone ^{Josephus} from the battlements, as laid him for dead on the ground. The Jews sallied out ^{wounded.} immediately to have seized on his body, but the Romans proved too quick and strong for them, and carried him off ^c (R).

- d B Y this time the two factions within, but especially that of John, having plundered ^{The temple} rich and poor of all they had, fell foul also on the treasury of the temple, whence John ^{plundered.} took a great quantity of golden utensils he found there, together with those magnificent gifts that had been presented to that sacred place by the Jewish kings, by Augustus, Livia, and many other foreign princes, and melted them all to his own use. The repositories of the sacred oil, which was to maintain the lamps, and of the wine which was reserved to accompany the usual sacrifices, were likewise seized upon, and turned into common use, and the last of this to such excess, as to make himself and his party drunk

(P) We have thus epitomized at one view what Josephus has scattered in several chapters of this and the foregoing book, of the dreadful effects of this famine, that it might not for the future interrupt the thread of the siege, and destruction of the city, temple, and nation, which we shall now hasten to bring to a conclusion.

All that needs be added to make up the sad account of this calamity, is, that even those, who at the hazard of their lives, got safe to the Romans, and were well received of them, did for the generality meet with their deaths in the plenty of provisions which they found there. Many of them expired with the meat in their mouths ; others fell into droppies, and other distempers, or quite lost the use of their limbs.

(Q) The greatest part of those that had served hitherto for the siege, were either consumed, or rendered unfit for service. The suburbs, and adjacent parts of Jerusalem, which abounded with the most beautiful gardens, orchards, and greatest variety of fruit, and other trees, had been already stripped of all their ornaments to serve to the siege, and were now reduced into a wilderness. Titus therefore could not carry on his works with the same speed and vigour, because he was forced to send his men for fresh timber, and other materials, at a great distance, even so far as ninety stades, or between eleven and twelve miles off.

(R) Josephus, by his own account, seems to have led but a sad life between the Romans and his own countrymen. These looked upon him as a vile apostate, a traitor to his God and country ; had imprisoned his (the Greek says, father, but the sequel shews it to have been his) mother, and made her suffer many hardships ; and would have spared no cruelties against him, if they could have caught him in their hands.

On the other side, the Roman officers looked upon him as a faithless wretch, who under pretence of going to exhort the besieged to surrender, did what he could to encourage them to hold out to the last extremity ; insomuch that several of them did not scruple to accuse him before Titus of this double dealing ; but, happily for him, that general had conceived too good an opinion of him to harbour any such suspicion, and still vindicated him against his accusers (38).

with it. All this while, not only the zealots, but many of the people, were still under such an insaturation, that though the fortress Antonia was lost, as we have hinted already, and nothing left but the temple, which the Romans were making ready to batter down, yet they could not persuade themselves that God would suffer that holy place to be taken by heathens, and were still expecting some sudden and miraculous deliverance. Even that vile monster John, who commanded there, either seemed confident of it, or else endeavoured to make them think him so. For when Josephus was sent for the last time to upbraid his obstinately exposing that sacred building, and the miserable remains of God's people, to sudden and sure destruction, he only answered him with the bitterest invectives, adding, that he was defending the Lord's vineyard, which he was sure could not be taken by any human force. Josephus did in vain remind him of the many ways by which he had polluted both city and temple, and in particular of the seas of blood which he caused to be shed in both those sacred places, and which he assured him from the old prophecies, were a certain sign and fore-runner of their speedy surrender and destruction (S). John remained as inflexible, as if all the prophets had assured him of a deliverance, which shews the sad effects of a judicial insaturation. However, a great number of the people were so moved by Josephus's discourse, that they fled presently after to the Romans, and amongst them some persons of rank and figure, particularly Joseph the son of Cabbi, and Jesus the son of Damneus, who had been both high-priests. Titus gave them a gracious reception, and sent them to Gophna, a place situate between Samaria and Lydda, till the conclusion of the war; but he was forced to send for them back, to contradict a report which the factious had cunningly spread, of their having been put to death ^d.

At length Titus, foreseeing the inevitable ruin of that stately edifice, which he was still extremely desirous to save, vouchsafed even himself to speak to them, and to persuade them to surrender. But the factious, looking upon this condescension as the effects of his fear, rather than generosity, only grew the more furious upon it, and forced him at last to come to those extremities, which he had hitherto endeavoured to avoid. That his army, which was to attack the temple, might have the freer passage towards it through the castle Antonia, he caused a considerable part of the wall to be pulled down, and levelled, which proved so very strong, that it took him up seven whole days, by which time they were far advanced in the month of July.

ice interrupted.

It was on the seventeenth day of that month, as all Josephus's copies have it (T), that the daily sacrifice ceased for the first time, since its restoration by the brave Maccabite chief, mentioned in a former section †, there being no proper person left in the temple to offer them up. Titus caused the factious to be severely upbraided for it, exhorted John to set up who he would to perform that office, rather than suffer the service of God to be set aside; and then challenged him and his party to come out of the temple, and fight on a more proper ground, and thereby save that sacred edifice from the fury of the Roman troops *. When nothing could prevail on them, they began to set again on fire the gallery that yielded a communication between the temple and the castle Antonia. The Jews, as we have hinted before, had already

(S) He alluded probably to the eleventh and following chapters of Zechary, of which we have given in our hint a little higher; or it may be perhaps that he had an eye to the doom which Christ had pronounced against that murdering and apostate city, of which he saw the far greater part already accomplished enough to assure him of the rest. For, as we have elsewhere observed, it is scarcely to be supposed, but that such a man as Josephus had more than once conversed with some christians, who might have apprised him of it, or, as an historian, he might have read it in some one of the gospels.

(T) A modern critic supposes an error to be in that date, and that it was originally written the seventh or tenth of that month (39). But besides that it is seventeen in all copies of Josephus, the Jews have kept their fast in memory of this cessation on that very day ever since (40).

This daily sacrifice called by the Jews תמיד Thamid, by the Greeks ἐνδελαισμος, and by the Latins juge, consisted of two lambs, the one of which was offered in the morning towards sun-rising, after the burning of the sacred incense, and the other in the evening, or, as the Hebrew hath it, between the two evenings, that is, between three in the afternoon, and sun-setting. It was a burnt-offering, and was therefore set on a slow fire, that it might be the longer a burning. We have spoken of it in a former volume †, to which we refer.

All that we need to add is, that if the Jews have appointed their fasts right, the ceasing of it here was on the same day on which Moses broke the two tables, the city of Jerusalem was destroyed, the book of the law burnt by Aphiasmos (Epistlemon) and the statue of Jupiter set up in the temple, as the reader may see in the three authors last quoted.

a burnt about twenty cubits of it in length; but this second blaze, which was likewise encouraged by the besieged, consumed about fourteen more; after which they beat down what remained standing. On the twenty-seventh of July, the Jews having filled part of the western portico with combustible matter; made a kind of a flight, upon which some of the forwardest of the Romans having scaled up to the top, those set fire to it, ^{Romans out-} which flamed with such sudden fury, that many of them were consumed in it, and the ^{minded.} rest, venturing to jump down from the battlements, were crushed to death. Artorius was the only one that escaped by a stratagem (U) ^f.

On the very next day, Titus having set fire to the north gallery, which inclosed the outer court of the temple, from fort Antonia to the valley of Cedron, got an easy ^{Fire set to the temple gates.} admittance into it, and forced the besieged into that of the priests. He tried in vain six days to batter down one of the galleries of that precinct with an helepolis (W); he was forced to mount his battering rams on the terrace, which was raised by this time; and yet the strength of this wall was such, that it eluded the force of these also, though others of his troops were busy a sapping it. When they found that neither rams nor sapping could gain ground, they bethought themselves of scaling, but were vigorously repulsed, and with the loss of some colours, and a number of men. When Titus therefore found that his desire of saving that building was like to cost so many lives, he set fire to the gates, which being plated with silver, burnt all that night, whilst the metal dropped down in the melting. The flame soon communicated itself to the porticos and galleries, which the besieged beheld without offering to stop it, but contented themselves with sending whole volleys of impotent curles against the Romans. This was done on the eighth of August, and on the next day, Titus having given orders to extinguish the fire, called a council, to determine whether ^{Titus calls a council.} the remainder of the temple (X) should be saved or demolished. That general was still for the former, and most of the rest declared for the latter, and alledged, that it was no longer a temple, but a scene of war and slaughter, and that the Jews would never be at rest as long as any part of it was left standing; but when they found Titus still bent on preserving so noble an edifice, against which he told them he could have no quarrel, they all came over to his mind. The next day, August the 10th, was therefore determined for a general assault, and the night before the Jews made two desperate sallies on the Romans, in the last of which, these being timely succoured by Titus, beat them back into their inclosure ^e.

But whether this last Jewish effort exasperated the besiegers, or which is more likely, as Josephus thinks, pushed by the hand of providence, one of the Roman ^{The temple set on fire.} soldiers of his own accord took up a blazing fire-brand, and getting on his comrade's shoulders, threw it into one of the apartments that surrounded the sanctuary, through a window, and immediately set the whole north side on a flame up to the third story, in the second year of Veaspasian, the twenty-first of king Agrippa, and on the same fatal day and month in which it had been formerly burnt by Nabuchadnezzar ^b. Titus, who was gone to rest himself awhile in his pavilion, was awaked at the noise, and ran immediately to give orders to have the fire extinguished. He called, prayed, threatened, and even caned his men in vain; the confusion was so great, and the soldiers so obstinately bent upon destroying all that was left, that he was neither heard nor minded. Those that flocked thither from the camp, instead of obeying his orders, were busy, either in killing the Jews, or in increasing the flames. When Titus observed that all his endeavours were vain, he entered into the sanctuary, and the most holy place, in which he found still such rich and sumptuous utensils, and other riches, as even exceeded all that had been told him of it. Out of the former he saved the golden candlestick, the table of shew-bread, the altar of perfumes, all of ^{Titus enters into the sanctuary.}

(X) That is, the sanctuary, and most holy place, with all the chambers, galleries, &c. thereto belonging, as the reader may see them described in a former section. pure gold, and the book or volume of the law, wrapped up in a rich gold tissue; ^a but in the latter, he found no utensils, because, in all probability, they had not made a fresh ark, since that of Solomon had been lost. Upon his coming out of that sacred place, some other soldiers set fire to it, and obliged those that had stayed behind to come out; they all fell foul on the plunder of it, tearing even the gold plating off the gates, and timber work, and carried off all the costly utensils, robes, &c. they found in it, insomuch that there was not one of them that did not enrich himself by it ¹.

A HORRID massacre followed soon after, in which a great many thousands perished, some by the flames, others by the fall from the battlements, and a greater number by the enemy's sword, which destroyed all it met with, without distinction of age, ^b sex, or quality. Among them were upwards of six thousand persons, who had been seduced thither by a false prophet, who promised them that they should find a speedy and miraculous relief there on that very day. Some of them remained five whole days on the top of the walls, and afterwards threw themselves at the general's mercy; but were answered, that they had out-stayed the time, and were led to execution (Y). They carried their fury to the burning of all the treasure-houses of the place, though they were full of the richest furnitures, plate, vestments, and other things of value, which had been laid up in those places for security. In a word, they did not cease burning and butchering, till they had destroyed all, except two of the temple gates, and that part of the court which was destined for the women [†]. In memory of this ^c destruction, and of that of Nebuchadnezzar, they keep a solemn fast on the ninth of the month Ab, answering in part to our August, which lasts full twenty-four hours, during which time they neither eat, drink, or use the least refreshment; but the strictest of them keep themselves barefoot, in prayers and tears, from sun-setting to the next sun-set ^k.

IN the mean time the seditious having made such a vigorous push, that they escaped the fury of the Romans, at least for the present, and retired into the city, they found all the avenues of it so well guarded every-where, that there was no possibility left for them to get out; which obliged them to secure themselves as well as they could on the south side of it, from whence Simon and John of Guisbala sent to desire a parley ^d with Titus. They were answered, that though they had been the cause of all this blood-shed and ruin, yet they should have their lives spared, if they laid down their arms, and surrendered themselves prisoners. To that they replied, that they had engaged themselves by the most solemn oaths never to surrender, and therefore only begged leave to retire into the mountains with their wives and children; which insolence did so exasperate the Roman general, that he caused a herald to bid them stand to their defence; for that not one of them should be spared, since they had rejected his last offers of pardon. Immediately after this, he abandoned the city to the fury of his soldiers, who fell forthwith on plundering it, setting fire every-where, and murdering all that fell into their hands (Z); whilst the factious that were left, went and fortified ^e themselves in the royal palace, where they killed eight thousand Jews, who had taken refuge there ¹.

(Y) Probably to be crucified; for Josephus tells us there, that in his return from Teconah, he observed a number of them fastened each to a cross, and still alive; among whom were three of his acquaintance, whose lives he obtained of Titus, and ordered them immediately to be taken down, and their wounds to be put under the care of able surgeons. He adds, that only one of them outlived it, the other two died under their physicians hands.

(Z) Josephus tells us (42) however, that he spared the family of Izates, king of Adiabene, of whom we have already spoke, with several other persons of distinction, who came and surrendered themselves to his mercy, but he kept them still prisoners.

He likewise dismissed above forty thousand of the inferior sort, who came and implored his pardon, and gave them leave to go and settle where they would. The truth is, that they had already gorged themselves with so much blood, that the streams which ran along the streets did even put the fire out. And as for the prisoners, they were so very numerous already, that they could not find buyers for them, tho' they offered them at the lowest prices (43); so that one would have thought it high time for a prince of that excellent character to have wreaked his fury only on the factious zealots, and to have spared the rest. But in all this he was acting more like a scourge sent from above, against a rebellious nation, than according to his own natural inclination; and it is what he rightly acknowledged, when his army congratulated him on this arduous and glorious conquest ^{*}.

a In the mean time great preparations were making for a vigorous attack on the upper city, especially on the royal palace; and this took them up from the twentieth of August to the seventh of September, during which time great numbers came and made their submission to Titus, among whom were the forty thousand citizens mentioned in the last note, some of the Edomites, and two priests, who upon promise of being spared, discovered to him a private place in the wall of the temple, where they found two candlesticks, some tables, cups, and other vessels of massive gold, with many precious stones, rich garments, and other costly things. By this time the war-like engines plied so furiously on the factious, that they were taken with a sudden panic, and instead of fleeing into the towers of Hippicos, Phisael, or Mariamne, which Year of the Head 3 m8. Of Corist 73 or 70. b were yet untaken, and so strong, that nothing but famine could have reduced them; they run like madmen towards Siloab, with a design to have attacked the wall of circumvallation, and to have escaped out of the city; but being there repulsed, they were forced to go and hide themselves in the public finks, and common shores, some one way, and some another. All the rest the Romans could catch were put to the sword, and the city was set on fire. This was on the eighth of September, when the city was taken, and entered by Titus. He would have put an end to the massacre, but his men killed all, except the most vigorous, whom they shut up in the porch of the women mentioned a little higher. Fronto, who had the care of them, reserved the youngest and most beautiful for Titus's triumph, and sent all that were above seventeen years of age into Egypt, to be employed in some public works there; and a great number of others were sent into several cities of Syria and other provinces to be exposed on the public theatres, to exhibit fights, or be devoured by wild beasts ^m. The number of those prisoners amounted to ninety-seven thousand, besides about eleven thousand more of others, who were either starved through neglect, or starved themselves through fullness and despair (A).

d We have already had occasion to mention the number of the slain, as well as of the prisoners, according to Josephus. Suetonius and Cornelius Nepos do indeed make the former a great deal less; they reckon but six hundred thousand of them in all; but considering the distance of time and place in which they wrote, it will be easily granted, that they could not be so well acquainted with it as Josephus, who was a Jew, and an eye-witness. Whether this last has exaggerated it in compliment to Titus and the Romans, we will not pretend to say. A curious author has since taken the pains to make a fresh computation out of him, of all that perished in the several places throughout that kingdom, and out of it, from the beginning to the conclusion of the war [†]; in which we believe our readers will be glad to see the whole amount of the several bloody articles, as it were, at one view. They are as follows:

According to this account the whole amounts to	1337,490

Besides a vast multitude that died in the caves, woods, wildernesses, common shores, in banishment, and many other ways, of whom no computation could be made; and ten thousand that were slain at Jotapa, more than our author has reckoned. For Josephus mentions expressly forty thousand, but he but thirty thousand. b

To these, if we add the ninety-seven thousand prisoners, doomed in all appearance to a captivity infinitely worse than death, and the eleven thousand, which, as we hinted above, perished either through the neglect of their keepers, or their own sullen despair, the amount will be above one million four hundred and forty-five thousand. What still more aggravates this destruction is, that the far greatest part of them were strangers, that is, were Jews, who, as we observed a little higher, were written to, and invited from remote parts of the world, even from beyond the river Euphrates, by their brethren at Jerusalem, to come and assist them in the defence of their religion and liberties; their country, city, and temple; instead of which they met with the most dreadful deaths there, and shared in the common ruin. Thus did the divine providence order it, that they, who by their strenuous opposition of the gospel in all the parts of their dispersion, had shared in the guilt of the crucifiers of its divine author, should be involved in their punishment. c

Titus, as we have seen, acknowledged more than once the hand of providence, both in his extraordinary success against them, and in the invincible obstinacy with which they, to the last, preferred their total destruction to his oft repeated proffers of mercy. Josephus hath scarce a chapter in which he doth not ascribe all these dreadful calamities, and the final ruin of his nation, city and temple, to an over-ruling power, to the offended deity, or to the sins of the people: but no-where more pathetically than in that chapter in which, besides the old prophecies, he sums up a number of dreadful warnings sent before-hand, not so much to reduce them to obedience, as to let them discern the almighty hand that was now pouring down the most dreadful phials of his anger against them. We have already taken notice of that extraordinary country fellow Ananus, who had kept pronouncing woe and destruction to them during seven whole years. It will not be amiss to close this sad catastrophe with some other signal ones out of the same Jewish historian, which were no less remarkable than dreadful. d

Of this class was that strange comet, which hung over Jerusalem one whole year, in the shape of a sword: the extraordinary light that was seen round the altar at the ninth hour of the night, upon the celebrating of the paschal feast, and which was looked upon by the ignorant as a good omen, but by the wiser sort as a forerunner of a dreadful war: a cow delivered of a lamb, as she was led to the altar to be sacrificed: the eastern gate of the temple made of solid brass, and so heavy, that it required twenty pair of stout hands to open and shut it, and was flung open in the middle of the night, though fastened with strong bolts and bars: the air before sun-set filled with chariots, and armed men, which passed all over that country, and for the truth of which Josephus appeals to several living witnesses, who beheld the dreadful sight; and lastly the voice, which after a kind of rumbling noise, was distinctly heard by the priests, who were going to officiate on the feast of pentecost, and uttered these words articulately, Let us depart; let us depart *. In spite of all which, the Jews, as we have seen, continued as hardened as ever, and listened only to those lying prophets, who flattered them with the hopes of a sudden and miraculous deliverer. But to return to the siege: e

WHILST the soldiers were still busy in burning the remains of the city, and visiting all the sinks, jakes, and common shores, where they found and killed numbers of other poor creatures, who had hid themselves, Simon and John, the two grand

a rebels, were found, and brought to Titus, who ordered them to be reserved for his triumph. John being pinched with hunger, came out first, and having begged his life, obtained it, but was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Simon, whose retreat was better stored, held out till towards the end of October, when necessity forced him out. He appeared on the sudden on the ruins of the temple in a white robe, and a purple cloak. The Romans were at first surprised at him; but understanding soon after who he was, Terentius Rufus, who was left commander, seized on him, and sent him to Cæsarea, whither Titus was got by this time, and from whence he was conveyed with his bloody colleagues to Rome, to adorn the conqueror's triumph *.

b As soon as the Romans had ended their destructive work of burning and massacring, Titus set them on to demolish the city, with all its noble structures, fortifications, palaces, towers, walls, and other ornaments and fortifications, down to the level of the ground, according to Christ's express prediction. He left nothing standing but a piece of the western wall, and the three towers of Hippicos, Phasael, and Mariamne, the former to serve as a rampart to his tenth legion, which he left there, and the three latter to give future ages some idea of the strength of the whole city, and of the skill and valour of its conqueror. His orders were so punctually executed, that except those few buildings above-mentioned, there was not so much as any remains left that could serve as an index, that that ground had been once inhabited (B). Inasmuch that when he came to pass through it, in his way from Cæsarea to Alexandria, in order to imbarque for Rome, he could not restrain himself from shedding plenty of tears at the sight of so dreadful a devastation, and cursing the wretches who had forced him to be the author of it °.

It is not our business to follow that emperor to his capital, or to describe the magnificence of his triumph, the greatest which that city ever saw: that will be best done in the ensuing Roman history. All that is proper to be said on that head here, is, that John and Simon, at the head of seven hundred of the handsomest Jewish captives, were made to adorn the triumphal chair; after which Simon, having been dragged through the streets with a rope about his neck, and severely scourged, was put to death with some other Jewish leaders, and John was sent into perpetual imprisonment (C) †.

d Titus had left three castles still untaken, namely those of Herodion and Massada on this, and that of Macheron on the other side Jordan. The first of them was soon after taken by capitulation by Lucilius Bassus, who had been appointed lieutenant of Judæa. He went presently after at the head of a good number of troops to besiege that of Macheron, which was a very strong place, and likely to have held out a long time. But a lucky accident, which the reader may see in the margin (D), obliged the besieged

(B) The Jewish tradition adds, that Titus caused the plow to be driven over it; which ceremony, according to the Roman law, condemned the ground to perpetual desolation. But that, as well as Josephus's account, seems exaggerated, since there is great reason to believe, there were still many considerable ruins to be seen even in the emperor Adrian's time, as we may have occasion to shew in the Roman history.

(C) Titus's triumph was further adorned with a great number of trophies brought from Judæa; among the principal of which, were those which had been taken out of the sanctuary, such as the golden table of shew-bread, which weighed several talents; the seven-branch candlestick, a rich and curious piece of art; the roll or volume of the law, covered with a costly gold cloth, which was carried the last of the three, as the most venerable of all the trophies. The two former Titus caused to be placed in the temple of Peace, which his father had built; the latter, together with several curious and costly veils of the temple, and other rich furniture, he conveyed into his own palace (45).

There are still some coins extant of that emperor, stamped with a trophy and triumphant chariot, and of his father, with the image of a woman sitting sorrowful under a palm-tree, with the inscription of Judæa Capta; with some others coined in the twenty-first year of king Agrippa, with these words in Greek, Vespasian emperor, and Cæsar. Judæa was taken in the twenty-first of Agrippa.

To these medals we may add some fragments in bas-relief, representing Vespasian and his son Titus's triumph, and on which is still to be distinguished the seven-branch candlestick, with other sacred utensils; some have pretended also to discover the ark in it; but we have already seen, that there was no such thing in the most holy place; and it is most likely to be only the table of the shew-bread, which was not altogether unlike it; but the misfortune is, that time has so defaced this noble monument, that it is not easy to discover any thing in it with any certainty, except the candlestick above-mentioned.

(D) There was in that castle a young nobleman highly esteemed for his valour, who, after having given the besiegers a stout repulse in a silly, unfortunately strayed out of the gates to speak to the people on the wall by way of bravado. An Egyptian then in the Roman army, came swiftly behind him unperceived, took him up in his arms, and carried him off.

When Bassus had got the noble youth in his power, he caused him to be stripped naked, and severely scourged, in the view of the besieged, who filled to surrender, upon condition that they should have liberty to retire whither they pleased; ^a which being readily granted to them, they went and joined some of their revolted brethren, who had sheltered themselves in the forest of Jardes. Hither Bassus came, and attacked them, and after a desperate combat on both sides, totally defeated them, with Judas their chief, who had saved himself out of Jerusalem, through one of the aqueducts of that city ^q.

DEATH having prevented Bassus from putting an end to the war, Flavius Silva, his successor, assembled all his forces to attack Massada, now the only remaining fortress in the rebels hands. The place was prodigiously strong both by art and nature, well stored with all provisions, and defended with a good number of sicarii and assassins; at the head of whom was one Eleazar, the grandson of Judas the Gaulonite, ^b often mentioned in this and a former section. Silva having in vain tried his engines and battering rams against it, bethought himself of surrounding it with a high and strong wall, and then ordered fire to be set to the gates. The wind favouring him, pushed the flame so fiercely against the Jews, that Eleazar, in a kind of despair, persuaded them first to kill all their wives and children, and next to chuse ten men by lot who should kill all the rest; and lastly, one out of the surviving ten to dispatch them and himself, which was accordingly executed out of hand; only this last man was ordered to set fire to the place before he finished this bloody tragedy. On the next morning the Romans, who were preparing to scale the place, were strangely surprized to see and hear nothing move; upon which they made such a hideous outcry, that ^c two women, who had concealed themselves from the massacre in some aqueduct, came out, and told them the tragical end of the besieged, which put an end to that dreadful war ^r. Vespasian ordered the Jewish lands to be sold to his own use (E), and all the Jews within the Roman empire to pay the usual tribute of half a shekel, or two drachmas, to his treasury, which they were before obliged to pay to that of the sanctuary ^s.

THE temple and holy city thus destroyed and levelled with the ground, and the whole nation either miserably buried under its ruins, or dispersed into other countries, might, one would think, have opened the eyes of the poor remains of that once favoured people, and crushed at once all hopes and expectation of any other deliverer, ^d but him whom they had rejected and crucified. Many of them did indeed do so, but the far greater part remained in their insatuated state, and, according to Christ's own prediction have been dispersed ever since over all the world to attest his truth, and their own obdurate blindness, till the happy time comes when the veil shall be taken off their eyes. When that will be, is one of those secrets which God has been pleased to leave as yet unrevealed; and which it would be vain and presumptuous to search too curiously after. Eusebius adds to their sad catastrophe, that after the destruction of Jerusalem, Vespasian caused all the remaining sprouts of the house of Judah to be cut off ^r, to deprive them at once of all hopes of a deliverer, or future Messiah. Notwithstanding which, the zealots made several attempts to regain their power, first in Egypt, ^e where it cost some of their heads, and caused their temple at Alexandria, mentioned in a former section [†], to be quite shut up (F) ⁿ. Next in Cyrene of Libya, where one immediately the air with their cries. Bassus perceiving them so moved at the sight, caused a cross to be erected, and gave them to understand, that he would crucify him, unless they prevented it by a timely surrender. The stratagem had the desired effect; and the Jews, not being proof against so doleful a spectacle, chose to capitulate, and soon after surrendered the place, on the conditions above-mentioned (46).

(E) He only reserved the town of Emmaus, which he bestowed on eight hundred of his best veterans, to plant a new colony there, and from that time that place took the name of Nicopolis (47).

(F) These wretches, which were undoubtedly the relics of the Gaulonitic faction, since even their children suffered the severest torments, rather than acknowledge Cesar for their lord (48), met at first with a kind reception from their brethren of Alexandria. But they quickly became obnoxious to them by sowing their leaven of sedition. To prevent the ill effects of which, they were delivered up to the Romans, and six hundred of them put to death.

Vespasian being apprised of it, and fearing lest their Alexandrian temple should afford them a fresh pretence of assembling themselves, and raising some new sedition in Egypt, sent orders to Lupus his governor there to demolish it. But he contented himself with shutting it up. Paulinus, who succeeded him soon after, stripped it of all its ornaments, and rich furniture, and caused the gates of it to be quite shut up, to prevent any further worship being offered up in it (49).

- a of them, named Jonathan, set up for a prophet, and persuaded about two thousand of his brethren there to follow him into the desert, where he promised to shew them wonders, and where Catullus, the then governor, caused them to be pursued and defeated (G) ^w.

b FROM that time the Jewish nation has been dispersed through, despised and hated by, all the world, hath gone from one age to another through a series of the greatest miseries and persecutions. We have innumerable instances of crowned heads, and even commonwealths, who have spared neither the severest edicts, nor the cruellest butcheries against them. In a word, Pagans and Mahometans, as well as Christians, tho' so opposite in other things, have yet, as it were, joined their efforts in vain, to exterminate that unhappy people, whom the divine providence hath nevertheless upheld under all those disadvantages by a kind of miraculous power, and no doubt for a more glorious purpose; insomuch that, according to a late learned historian, there are still above three millions of them dispersed through almost every nation and kingdom of the world, and still impatiently sighing after that glorious time when God shall restore them to their pristine state. But this, and some other particulars relating to their dispersions, writings, and the like, will be fully seen in the appendix at the end of this volume.

c AFTER the reduction of Jerusalem and Judæa, Agrippa and his sister retired to Rome, probably with Titus, who was excessive fond of both, but especially of Ber-nice. We have seen through the course of this last war how serviceable the brother had been to that general, accompanying him in person, and assisting him with men and ammunition, for which we are told Titus got his kingdom enlarged by the emperor, and procured him prætorian honours. But his extraordinary friendship for that prince flowed chiefly from his special fondness for his sister, who now lived with him in his palace, and ruled every thing as if she had been his real wife. We have hinted some former reports publicly spread concerning her incestuous intrigues with her brother, and for which she had given but too good a foundation. Titus could hardly be ignorant of it; but her beauty had so captivated him, that he overlooked every thing else; insomuch that he had promised her marriage, and would in all probability have kept it, had he not found that the Romans were wholly averse to it, partly on account of her being a Jewess, and partly on that of her royal descent. To pave himself there-fore the way to the empire, he was forced to discard her inventus invitum ^x, as Suetonius expresses it. What became of her afterwards, is not worth inquiring. As for Agrippa, he was the last of the Herodian race that bore the royal title, and is supposed to have died at Rome about the seventieth year of his age, and in the ninetieth of Jesus Christ ^y. Josephus has this remarkable saying on the Herodian line, that they all failed within a hundred years ^z, though they were at first so numerous, as we have seen them in the genealogy of Herod the Great.

c THIS was the end of the Herodian family, and of the Jewish nation and polity, and is so much the more remarkable, considering that the succinct account we have of it is written by a Jew of such extraordinary character, and that the destruction of the city and people, especially of their temple, is found upon the whole so exactly conformable to the prophecies of Christ, denounced against them so long before. One might have expected that this should have opened their eyes, to acknowledge these as well as the many others we have mentioned in the course of this and the last section, which prove him the Messiah, since they had seen their sacrifices, ceremonial law,

(G) Jonathan was taken presently after, and brought to Catullus, before whom he accused many of the richest Jews of having instigated him into this imposture, and whom that greedy governor caused to be put to death to the number of three thousand, and confiscated all their wealth.

He afterwards obliged that wretch to prefer the same indictment against those that were at Rome, among whom was Josephus the historian, whom he accused to have furnished him with arms and money. Tiberias made such a strict inquiry into the matter, that he easily found out the cheat, caused Jonathan to be cruelly whipped, and then burnt alive, and acquitted the persons accused.

Catullus, though deep in the guilt, was yet pardoned by that emperor; but providence did not suffer him to go unpunished; for he was soon after seized with a panic phrensy, which made him fancy himself surrounded with the dreadful spectres of those whom he had unjustly put to death. He was at length seized with an inward intolerable heat, which consumed his very entrails, and he died in that miserable condition unpitied (50).

their temple, their royal stock of Judab, &c. which they till then thought were to last ^a for ever, buried, as it were, under the ruin of their metropolis. Instead of which, their chief aim and study has been to find salvos against these pregnant proofs against them; to depart from the expositions of their ancients, give a new sense to the prophets, and to invent new sceptres for their royal tribe in some unknown parts of the world, and in a word, to oppose every thing that we urge against them, as we shall shew in the appendix.

In the mean time, it will not be amiss to take notice, that the Jews are no less at variance with Josephus, than the christians have admired him. St. Jerom, among other praises he gives him, calls him the Livy of the Jews ^a. Photius and others have been equally lavish of their incense; and Eusebius adds to the rest, that he had a statue ^b reared to him in consideration of his writings ^b. We shall not repeat what we have often observed, of his partiality to his nation, and sacerdotal order, both in this chapter, and our first volume. But his countrymen have trumped up another Josephus, known by the name of Bengorian, whose history is compiled out of the Rufinian version of the true Josephus; for he doth not seem to have seen the original, and has stuffed it with the most absurd falsehoods and contradictions to him; and yet the Jews give him the largest encomiums. In particular Rabby Tban, who has published his history, is not ashamed to affirm, that all he wrote was just and true, without the least falsehood; that his writings come nearer to those of the prophets, than those of any other Jewish author; that the hand of God was upon him, whilst he compiled his ^c work, with some other commendations, which amount almost to blasphemy ^c. That fabulous author is so well known to the learned, that we shall spend no time in exposing him. The readers may see enough of them in that mutilated edition which Munster has given us of it; though he has concealed a great number of them. But those that have seen the full editions that have come out since, will find them so full of them, that he will readily own, nothing but the greatest degree of infatuation and perverseness could induce the Jews to prefer him to the true one, who, setting aside his partiality above-mentioned, hath all the marks of a judicious and exact historian.

C H A P. XII.

The history of the Parthians, from Arfaces, to the recovery of the kingdom by the Persians.

- a PARTHIA, properly so called, was bounded on the east by Aria; on the south by Parthia deserta ^{described.} Carmania Deserta; on the west by Media; and on the north by Hyrkania. Ptolemy divides it into five districts or provinces, viz. Caminisene or Camisene, Parthyene, Choroane, Atticene, and Tabiene. The ancient geographers enumerate a great many cities in Parthia; but those of most note were, Calliope, Iffatis, Europum, known also by the names of Raga, Europos, and Arface, Apamea, Heraclea, Crenonia, Cbarax, Ariacana, Aspa, Marriche, Rbagæa, and Hecatompylos. The latter was the metropolis of Parthia, and the place where the first kings of that country resided; for after they had made themselves masters of Affyria, they abandoned Hecatompylos, passing the winter at Ctesiphon, and the summer at Ecbatan, or in Hyrkania. The city of Ctesiphon stood on the Tigris, a little below Seleucia, and on the opposite bank, in the province of Cbalonitis, which was the most southerly of all Affyria. This city was founded, according to Ammianus Marcellinus ^a, by one Vardanes, and embellished and fortified by Pacorus. Who Vardanes was, we know not; but Valesius takes Pacorus here spoke of to have been the son of Orodes, whom Ventidius defeated. Polybius ^b, Tacitus ^c, Herodianus ^d, and Strabo ^e speak of Ctesiphon as the metropolis of the whole Parthian empire; whereas Hecatompylos was only the metropolis of Parthia properly so called, but nevertheless a place of great note, and about nine miles in compass. It had a hundred gates, whence it borrowed the name of Hecatompylos, as Polybius informs us ^f. Most of our modern travellers are of opinion, that it stood on the very spot where the present city of Isfahan stands. Parthia is at present known by the name of Arach or Erach, and may be called the royal province of Persia, since the king always resides in it. The chief cities it contains at present, are, Casbin or Caswin, built on the ruins of the ancient Arface; Sawa or Sava, Kom, Hamadan, Kasban, and Isfahan, which Holstenius ^g takes to be the ancient Aspa, contradicting therein most of our modern geographers and travellers. The air of Parthia was anciently, and is still, very clear and healthy; but the soil barren, and not yielding wherewithal to maintain the inhabitants, who were once very numerous, and therefore obliged to transplant themselves into other countries. Upon the death of Alexander the Great, it was almost intirely neglected, and left as an appendant to Media,
- d none of that prince's commanders caring for the government of so poor and barren a province. But we shall see this small and obscure province make a great figure in history, eclipse all the kingdoms of the east, and become formidable to the Romans themselves while they were at the height of their glory. But we must not here confound Parthia, or, as others call it, Parthyæa and Parthyene, with what the ancients understand by the Parthian empire. The former was comprised within the narrow bounds which we have described above; whereas the latter was of a vast extent, being bounded on the east by the Indus; on the west by the Tigris; on the south by the Red-sea; and on the north by mount Caucasus ^h; so that it comprehended Arachosia, Parthia, Affyria, Persis and Media. These wide-spreading dominions were, according to Pliny ⁱ, divided by the Parthian monarchs into eighteen kingdoms, which they distinguished by the names of the upper and lower kingdoms. The former were eleven, extending from the confines of Armenia and the Caspian sea, to the borders of Scythia. The other seven comprehended the remaining provinces subject to the crown of Parthia, and were known by the name of the lower kingdoms.
- SOME writers are of opinion, that this country was first peopled by the Phetri or Patbri, often mentioned in scripture ^k, and will have the Parthians to be descended from Pbetrusim the son of Mizraim. This may perhaps be true with relation to the first inhabitants of Parthia; but those Parthians, who are so famous in history, were, without all doubt, originally Scythians, as we are told by all the ancients who speak of them. 'Tis true, there is a great disagreement among authors as to the particular nation or tribe to which they belonged, some taking them to be originally Dæ; others to be Getae, Massagetae, or European Scythians. Strabo tells us, that Arfaces, the founder of this kingdom, was by birth a Scythian, and king of the Dæ or Dabæ. Curtius says, that the Scythians, known by the name of Parthians, came out of *Europe*¹. Jornandes will have them to be originally Goths or Getae; for these, according to him, are one and the same people². They were, according to Justin, driven out of their own country, and finding no other place to settle in, obliged to take up with this barren and inhospitable region. They called themselves, on their first settling here, Parthians, that is, in the old Scythian language, exiles; and hence came the name of Parthia.

THE Parthians were a courageous and warlike people, as we shall see in the sequel of this history, and not undeservedly esteemed the best horsemen and archers in the world. They were accustomed from their infancy, says *Dionysius*³, to the warlike and manly exercises of managing a horse, and handling a bow; and in both excelled all other nations. They had an art or method peculiar to themselves, of discharging their arrows with incredible address, dexterity and order, while they were retiring full speed, which gained them many victories, and rendered their retreat far more formidable to the enemy than their onset (A). To their great skill in archery alluded the consul Crassus, when being told by an astrologer, that his expedition against the Parthians would prove unsuccessful, by reason of the ominous aspect of the constellation Scorpio, the Roman returned answer, That he feared not Scorpio, but Sagittarius. To these exercises of horsemanship and archery the air and nature greatly contributed; for the dry air, as Dion observes, seasoned their bows; and their large plains afforded them sufficient room for the training up of their horses. From the age of twenty to fifty, they were all, without exception, obliged to serve in war, to attend the musters, learn the military exercises, and be ready, at a very short warning, to take the field⁴. Persons of any rank or distinction among them never appeared in public a-foot, but always on horseback, and armed with scymitars⁵; which custom seemed strange to the Romans, who used to lay down their arms when they quitted the sagum or military habit⁶. In war they did not use trumpets like other nations, but large, hollow vessels of brass covered with skins, such as our kettle-drums, which being beat with hammers, yielded a very warlike sound⁷ (B). They are said to have been very spare in their diet⁸, their country not affording any superfluities; but at the same time to have been great lovers of wine, and much addicted to all manner of lewdness, not respecting even their sisters or mothers, whom they were allowed to marry, and as many wives besides as they pleased, nothing being deemed more ho-

(A) This art, peculiar to the Parthians, of discharging their arrows with great dexterity, while they were retiring full speed, is much spoke of by the Latin writers, especially the poets.

(B) Lucretius tells us, that the Parthians carried lions about with them in war, which, in the beginning of the engagement, they used to let loose against the enemy.

But herein the poet deserves no more credit, than some too credulous historians mentioned by Lucian, who, mistaking the dragons which the Parthians carried in their colours for real dragons, wrote, that the king of Parthia was always attended in war with a great number of dragons, which made a dreadful havoc among the enemies troops (9).

- a nourable among them than to have a numerous issue^c. They intirely neglected agriculture, navigation, trade, and all other callings, being wholly taken up in learning the arts of war, which alone were of any repute among them^a.

THEIR religion was much the same with that of the Persians; they worshipped the sun under the name of Mitras^a; believed, that those who fell in battle, enjoyed a perpetual and uninterrupted happiness, a tenet well suited to the genius of a warlike nation; and in most other points of religion intirely agreed with the Persians, of whose religion we have spoke at length in the history of Persia. They were most religious observers of their word, thinking it highly dishonourable not to perform their engagements, or to deceive those who had trusted them on their parole^a, whereof we shall give a glaring instance in the reign of Artabanus.

As to their government, it was, as is well known, monarchical, and absolute in the highest degree, no tyrants having ever required a more servile and blind submission from those who had the misfortune to live under them. They treated their subjects, says Herodianus^a, as the meanest of slaves, and scarce as men, while they put themselves on a level with the immortal gods. Their usual title was, the king of kings, the great monarch, the brother of the sun and moon, &c. These haughty titles they not only assumed in all the laws and edicts they enacted, but in their letters to other princes. Thus Vologeses II. in writing to the emperor Vespasian, used the following superscription: Arfaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasian. The emperor could not help smiling when he read it; and, to shew how little he valued such pompous and high sounding titles, he answered him in his own strain thus: Flavius Vespasian to Arfaces king of kings, giving the Parthian the titles he had assumed, but despising them himself. The same haughty stile Phrabates II. used in writing to Augustus; and Phrabates III. sent ambassadors to Pompey, on purpose to expostulate with him for omitting in his letter to him the title of king of kings, and giving him only that of king. Their whole conduct was answerable to the sublime and lofty titles they assumed; for, not satisfied with the respect paid to other crowned heads, they obliged all those whom they vouchsafed to see, to kiss the threshold on their first entering the royal palace, to prostrate themselves before them with their faces on the ground, and acknowledge their majesty with some offering, as if they appeared, to use the expression of Dion, before the great Jupiter (C)^a.

We can give no particular account of the state of Parthia before Arfaces I. the works of Apollodorus, Artemisius, Creperius, Calpurnianus, Quadratus, Rbrianus, and Seleucus Emisenus, who wrote of the Parthian affairs, and are quoted by Strabo^a, Athenaeus^b, Lucian^c, Stephanus and Suidas, not having reached our times. All we know of them is, that they were first subject to the Medes, afterwards to the Persians, and lastly to Alexander the Great, upon whose death Parthia fell to the share of Seleucus Nicator, whose successors held it till the reign of Antiochus Theus, when Arfaces, shaking off the Macedonian yoke, set up for himself, and founded a new kingdom, which, in process of time, became by far the most powerful in the east, and was held by his successors for the space of four hundred and seventy-five years; at the end of which the empire was transferred anew from the Parthians to the Persians, as we shall see in the sequel of this history.

Arfaces I. the founder of the Parthian monarchy, was, according to some writers, of the race of the Achemenidae; according to others, by birth a Parthian. Strabo says, that he was king of the Dabæ before the revolt of Parthia; and Georgius Syncellus, that he was a nobleman of Bactria. vocation vocation he solicited the Parthians to revolt from Antiochus Theus, and what success attended him in his wars with Seleucus Callinicus, the son and successor of *Antiochus Theus, whom he not only defeated, but took prisoner, and from that time assumed the title of king, having founded, and by that victory firmly established, an empire in the east, which in process of time counter-balanced the over-grown power of the Romans in the west. He reduced Hyrcania, and some other neighbouring provinces, and was at last killed in a battle against Ariarathes IV. king of Cappadocia†. From him all those, who reigned after of the same race, took the name of Arfaces, as the kings of Egypt did that of Ptolemy, and the Roman emperors that of Cæsar.

Arfaces II. HE was succeeded by his son Arfaces, who entering Media, made himself master of that country, while Antiochus the Great was engaged in a war with Ptolemy Euergetes king of Egypt. But Antiochus was no sooner disengaged from that war, than he marched with all his forces against Arfaces, drove him quite out of Media, and entering Parthia, obliged him to retire into Hyrcania, whence he soon after returned with an army of an hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse. With these he put a stop to Antiochus's further progress; so that the Syrian, finding he could not overpower so valiant an enemy, began to give ear to the overtures which were made him for putting an end to so troublesome a war; and a treaty being set on foot, it was agreed, that Arfaces should hold Parthia and Hyrcania, on condition of his assisting Antiochus to recover the other provinces which had revolted‡, as we have related at length in the history of Syria§.

Priapatus. Priapatus, the son of Arfaces II. succeeded his father; but all we know of him is, that he reigned fifteen years, and left three sons behind him, viz. Phrabates, Mitbridates, and Artabanus. The crown he bequeathed to Phrabates his eldest son, who overcame the Mardi, one of the most warlike nations of the east, and never conquered before the reign of Alexander, who, with much ado, reduced them, as well as the other nations inhabiting Media¶. Phrabates left a numerous issue; but having more at heart the welfare of his kingdom than the advantage of his children, he left the crown to his brother Mitbridates, on account of his extraordinary merit; for he had given many instances of an uncommon wisdom, probity and courage. He reduced the countries of the Bactrians, Persians, Medes, Elymæans, and over-ran in a manner all the east, extending his dominions into India, beyond the boundaries of Alexander's conquests. Demetrius Nicator, who then reigned in Syria, endeavoured to recover the provinces of the east, which Mitbridates had taken; but his army was intirely cut off, and himself taken prisoner, as we have elsewhere related at length¶. After this victory, Mitbridates got possession of all Babylonia and Mesopotamia; so that he was now master of all the provinces lying between the Euphrates on the west, and the Ganges on the east¶. He entertained his royal captive with great humanity, allowed him a maintenance suitable to his rank, and sending him into Hyrcania to reside there, gave him Rhodagune, one of his sisters, in marriage¶. However, he kept him still in captivity, tho' with as much freedom as was consistent with the state of a captive; and at his death, which happened in the thirty-seventh year of his reign, left him in this condition to his son Phrabates, who succeeded him in the kingdom¶. The reign of Mitbridates is looked upon by authors as the epoch of the Parthian grandeur; for under him that empire was by far the most powerful and most extensive in the east, all the countries that lie between the Euphrates and mount Caucasus receiving law from him, and most of the princes of Asia being either subdued by him, or obliged to enter into an alliance with him on his own terms. He was a prince of great courage and resolution, and at the same time had a sweetness of temper, which rendered him amiable to all who approached him. As he conquered many nations, he is said to have carefully examined their various constitutions, and, out of the whole collection, to have formed a body of excellent laws for the regulation of his empire; so that he was both a great warrior, and wise law-giver¶.

Phrabates II. Phrabates II. had scarce taken possession of the throne, when Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, marched against him, at the head of a numerous army, under pretence of delivering his brother Demetrius, who was still kept in captivity. Phrabates marched a out against him, but was overcome in three successive battles, stripped of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and all the other countries which his father had reduced, and confined within the narrow limits of the first Parthian kingdom. However, he had the good luck at last to retrieve his affairs, and cut off Antiochus with his whole army, in the manner we have related at length in the history of Syria ^p. Phrabates, flushed with this victory, resolved to invade Syria; but while he was making the necessary preparations for this enterprize, he found himself engaged in a war at home with the Scythians his neighbours. He had called them to his assistance against Antiochus; but that prince being overcome, and his army intirely defeated before their arrival, he refused to pay them the sum which had been promised them. Hereupon the Scythians, falling upon the country which they were come to defend, committed every-where most dreadful ravages ^q. Phrabates, having thus drawn upon himself a war with the Scythians, in order to strengthen his army against so brave and powerful an enemy, took into his service all the Greek mercenaries, who having followed Antiochus king of Syria in his Parthian expedition, had been taken prisoners in the late overthrow of that prince. As these Greeks had been treated by the Parthians with great haughtiness and cruelty during their captivity, they no sooner got arms into their hands, but they resolved to be revenged on them; and accordingly, in the first engagement, they went all in a body over to the Scythians, and, in conjunction with them, falling upon the Parthians, cut their army to pieces, killed their king, and laid waste their country ^r. After this, both the Greeks and Scythians returned to their own countries; and, on their departure, Artabanus, the third son of Pampatius, and uncle to the deceased king, took possession of the crown, which he held a very short time, being killed a few days after in battle by the Togarians, another nation of the Scythian race ^s.

Artabanus was succeeded by his son Pacorus I. who hearing of the great exploits of the Romans, sent ambassadors to Sylla, who was then in Cappadocia, to desire the friendship and alliance of so powerful a people. The Parthians, tho' the most warlike and wealthy nation in Asia, were at that time scarce known at Rome. Sylla therefore was overjoyed to hear, that their king had resolved to send ambassadors to him, and looked upon it as one of the most fortunate occurrences of his life, that he should be the first Roman, to whom so great and gallant a nation should apply for an alliance with the people of Rome. He was then only prætor, and had been sent by the senate to restore Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, to the throne, whence he had been driven by Tigranes king of Armenia. However, to dazzle the eyes of the ambassadors with an air of grandeur, he took great state upon him in the audience he gave them; for in the place where he received them he ordered three seats to be put; one in the middle for himself, that on the right hand for king Ariobarzanes, and the other on the left for Oromazes, the chief of the embassy. This compliance of the Parthian ambassador cost him his life, Pacorus having caused him to be beheaded on his return, for debasing the majesty of the Parthian monarchy, by giving place to a Roman prætor ^t. However, Pacorus afterwards sent ambassadors to Lucullus, to renew the alliance he had concluded with Sylla. He was succeeded by his son Phrabates III. who taking under his protection Tigranes, the son of Tigranes the Great, king of Armenia, gave him his daughter in marriage, and invading Armenia, laid siege to Artaxata, with a design to drive the father from the throne, and place the son on it in his room. But, on the approach of Pompey, he thought fit to withdraw, and, by a solemn embassy, to renew the alliance which his father had concluded, first with Sylla, and afterwards with Lucullus ^u. He was, not long after, murdered by his own children, Mitridates and Orodes, in the twelfth year of his reign. Upon his death, Orodes, who was the elder brother, took possession of the throne; but was soon driven out by Mitridates, who making himself odious to the Parthians by his cruelties, was, in his turn, obliged to abandon the kingdom, and shelter himself with Gabinus governor of Syria. On his flight Orodes was replaced on the throne, by means of one Surenas, who, next to the king, held the first place of honour and power in the kingdom, and had always adhered to the interest of Orodes. Gabinus was easily prevailed upon to undertake the restoring of Mitridates; for as his heart was intirely bent upon gain, he wanted only a pretence to invade Parthia, knowing that it was at that time a wealthy nation. Accordingly he set out on his march, ^a taking Mithridates along with him for his guide; but after he had passed the Euphrates, being accosted by Ptolemy Auletes king of Egypt, who offered him ten thousand talents, on condition he restored him to his kingdom, the corrupt governor, dropping his former enterprize, repassed the Euphrates, and marched directly into Egypt, leaving Mithridates to shift for himself. The Parthian, seeing himself thus abandoned by Gabinus, raised what troops he could, and returning into Babylonia, seized Seleucia, where he was closely besieged by Orodes, and in a short time reduced to such straits, that he was obliged to surrender at discretion. Orodes no sooner got him into his power, but considering him as an enemy, and not as a brother, he caused him to be put to death, and was himself an eye-witness of that cruel execution ^{w.} ^b We must not confound, as Justin has done, this Mithridates with Mithridates II. of whom we have spoke above, it being plain from Plutarch, Dion, Florus, Xiphilinus, and from the very prologue of the forty-second book of Trogus Pompeius, whom Justin has epitomized, that Mithridates II. and Mithridates the brother of Orodes, were two different princes. The former, by his many conquests and noble exploits, acquired the surname of Great; whereas the latter did nothing worth mentioning.

Orodes, by the death of his brother, became sole master of the whole Parthian empire; but did not long enjoy it in peace, a violent storm breaking out at a time, and from a quarter he least expected it. M. Licinius Crassus had been lately created consul at Rome the second time, with Pompey; and, in the partition of the provinces, had obtained, in virtue of a law made by C. Trebonius tribune of the people, Syria, with the neighbouring provinces. To Pompey the two Spains were assigned, with all the provinces of Africa. By the Trebonian law they were both empowered to hold their provinces for the space of five years, to raise what forces they should think proper, and to make peace or war with whom they pleased, according to their own judgment, without having recourse to the senate or people of Rome, as all other governors had ever before been obliged to do ^{z.} Crassus was, according to Plutarch, a man of known valour, and great experience in war, and had, on many occasions, given signal proofs of both in the armies of Sylla, under whom he had learnt the military art. He was likewise an eloquent orator, well versed in history, acquainted ^d with Aristotle's philosophy, and deemed one of the best antiquaries of his time. His obliging behaviour, his wonderful address and affability, prejudiced people at first in his favour, and gained upon their affections; but his insatiable avarice made all his good qualities in a manner overlooked; for tho' he was born of a rich family, and heir to a great estate, yet he let no means of increasing his revenues escape him, and often used such as were wholly unworthy his birth and rank, being of opinion, as he himself declared, that no citizen was to be accounted a rich man, till he was able to maintain an army at his own expence. As he had therefore used all his interest to obtain the province of Syria, so he was overjoyed when it was conferred upon him for such a term of years, and with so unbounded a power and authority, being resolved to carry the war into Parthia, in hopes of enriching himself with the spoils of that nation, which was deemed very rich, as never having been subdued by any foreign enemy. He was so transported with joy at the thoughts of the immense treasures, which he took for granted, he was to bring back with him from Parthia, that he could not forbear talking of his intended expedition in a manner unworthy of his age and character, even with persons whom he scarce knew. He did not confine his view to Syria alone, or Parthia, but flattered himself with achieving such things, as should eclipse the great exploits of Lucullus, Pompey, and Sylla himself, whose names had spread terror over all the nations of the east. He fancied himself already on the banks of the Indus and the Ganges, and over-ran in his thoughts Bactria, India, and ^e the most remote provinces of Asia, beyond the boundaries of Alexander's conquests. Intoxicated with these hopes, he began, towards the end of his consulship, to make his levies, and form the legions, which were to attend him into Syria. But some of the tribunes of the people, disapproving his design of making war upon the Parthians, who had entered into an alliance with Rome, and religiously observed their engagements, did all that lay in their power to reverse the plebiscitum or decree of the people, passed at the instigation of Trebonius, who was now out of office. Ateius Capita, one ^f

- a of the tribunes, having stirred up the people, by representing to them how base and shameful a thing it was to disturb the tranquillity of a peaceable nation, who had done the Romans no injury, would have arrested Crassus, tho' consul, if eight other tribunes had not opposed the violence of their colleague, and rescued Crassus out of the hands of the officer, who had seized him. When the consul, after performing, as usual, his vows in the capitol, was ready to set out for his province, Ateius assembled the people, prepared to obstruct his departure; which Crassus being alarmed at, desired Pompey to accompany him to the gates of the city; which he did accordingly, keeping in awe by his presence, as he was greatly revered by the people, those who had most zealously opposed the consul's expedition. Ateius, seeing he could not prevent the departure of Crassus, hastened to the gate of the city through which he was to pass; and there having ordered a fire to be kindled, as soon as Crassus appeared, he threw some perfumes into it, and invoking the infernal gods, uttered a thousand imprecations against Crassus, which made all those, who heard them, tremble with horror. Tho' Crassus took no notice of these curses, yet the superstitious Romans ascribed to them all the misfortunes and calamities which befel him, and those who attended him in this fatal expedition (D); whereas they were owing, as we shall see anon, to a quite different cause.

- Crassus* having, with the assistance of Pompey, got safe out of Rome, pursued his march to Brundisium; where he immediately embarked his men on board several transports, and notwithstanding the wind blew then very high, set sail for Asia, and, with much ado, reached the ports of Galatia, having lost many ships in his passage. Soon after his landing he had an interview with Dejotarus king of Galatia, who, tho' stricken in years, was at that time employed in building a new city. Crassus, thinking this an unreasonable undertaking, said pleasantly, You begin, O king, full late to build a city at the twelfth hour of the day. The twelfth hour was, with the Romans, the last of the day. As Crassus was upwards of sixty, and looked older than he was, Dejotarus replied, And you, O general, are not too early in your expedition against the Parthians.

Sets out from Rome. Year of the flood 2944. Before Christ 55.

- FROM Galatia Crassus pursued his march into Syria, the province allotted to him; and being there informed, that immense treasures were lodged in the temple of Jerusalem, which Pompey had not ventured to touch, he marched thither with part of his army, in order to seize them. Eleazar, one of the priests, and at that time keeper of the sacred treasure, had under his charge, besides many other things of an inestimable value, a raster of massy gold, weighing three thousand Hebrew pounds, or seven hundred and fifty common pounds. This, for the better securing of it, he had inclosed into a beam made hollow for that purpose, and placed the beam over the entrance from the holy place into the holy of holies, hanging from it the veil which parted those two places. Eleazar, who was apprised of the motive of Crassus's march to Jerusalem, to save the other ornaments of the temple, and the riches which were deposited there by private persons, discovered the golden raster to Crassus, and suffered him to take it away, after having made him solemnly promise with an oath, that he would meddle with nothing else. But Crassus no sooner received it, than forgetting his oath, he seized on the two thousand talents which Pompey had left there untouched; and rummaging the temple, plundered it of every thing else which he thought worth taking away, to the value of eight thousand talents more; so that the whole booty, which he sacrilegiously took from thence, amounted to ten thousand talents^b; that is, to two millions and upwards of our money. Josephus, who relates this, thinking it would scarce be credited by other nations, alledges the authority of Strabo and other writers to prove, that immense treasures had been deposited in the temple by the Jews of Europe, Asia and Cyrenaica^c; but the historical writings of Strabo, which he quotes, have not reached our times.

Crassus, thinking himself now sufficiently furnished for his intended expedition, marched to the Euphrates, and having crossed that river on a bridge of boats, which he threw over it, entered the Parthian territories, and began hostilities, without any other motive than his insatiable avarice, and an eager desire of enriching himself with the plunder of a country, which was generally esteemed very rich. The Romans had, by Sylla, Lucullus and Pompey, made peace, and entered into alliances with the nation he thus invaded, and no complaints of any infraction or injuries had ever been heard, which might give just reason for a war; so that the Parthians, expecting nothing less than such an invasion, and having made no preparations for their defence, were easily driven out of all Mesopotamia. The city of Zenadotia, which Stephanus places near Nicephorium, was the only place that made any opposition. Apollonius, who was governor, or rather tyrant, as Dio calls him, of that city, sent deputies to Crassus, acquainting him, that he was willing to surrender up the place to him; but as soon as the detachment sent to take possession of it had entered the gate, he surrounded them, and cut them in pieces. But both he and the inhabitants paid dear for their treachery; for Crassus having immediately invested the city with his whole army, and taken it by assault, reduced the inhabitants to slavery, confiscated their goods, and sold their persons to the best bidder. For this conquest, and an inconsiderable advantage gained over one Talymenus Ilaces, or Syllaces, governor of Mesopotamia, who having engaged the Romans with a small body of horse, was overcome and wounded, Crassus suffered himself to be saluted by the soldiery with the title of imperator, which was usually given after some signal victory. This turned to his disgrace, the whole army laughing at his vanity, and expecting little from a general who was thus elated with the least success^d. The other cities made no resistance; so that he over-ran all Mesopotamia, and might, if he had taken advantage of the consternation the Parthians were in, have penetrated as far as Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and made himself master of Babylonia as well as Mesopotamia; but instead of pursuing the career he had begun, in the beginning of the autumn he repassed the Euphrates, and leaving only seven thousand foot and a thousand horse to garison the places he had taken, put his army into winter-quarters in the cities of Syria. This was undoubtedly the greatest fault Crassus committed in his Parthian expedition, after that of his undertaking it upon most unjust motives; for his hasty retreat gave the enemy time to recover from the terror which his arms had spread all over the east, and to raise an army against the ensuing year, which the Romans could not withstand. On his return into Syria, he was joined by his son, at the head of a thousand chosen horse. This young Roman had served under Cæsar in Gaul, in quality of his lieutenant, and had been honoured with several military crowns, which generals used to bestow on such as distinguished themselves by their valour. When Cæsar understood that his father had began the war with the Parthians, he gave him leave to go into the east, and serve under him; and indeed Cæsar had all along pressed Crassus to break with the Parthians, to force his way into Bactria, and from thence into India, knowing, that the farther that general, of whose power he was jealous, penetrated into the eastern countries, the more able he himself should be to put in execution his design of subverting the republic; but the unfortunate young Crassus came into Asia only to be a witness of his father's ill conduct, and to partake of his father's misfortunes^e.

In Syria Crassus spent his time more like a publican than a general, being wholly taken up with examining into the revenues of that province, and improving them by the most shameful methods, in order to amass new treasures. The plunder of the temple of Jerusalem was not the only sacrilege he was guilty of; he robbed in like manner all the temples of Syria, appropriating to his own use their rich ornaments and furniture. The temple of the Syrian goddess, named Atargetis, at Hierapolis, which some writers call Bambyces, others Edessa, and the Syrians Magog, was famous all over the east, on account of the immense treasures laid up there, as being the collection of many years. These the avaricious proconsul seized; and left any of the a rich vases and ornaments should be embezzled, he spent a great deal of his time in seeing the money counted, and the gold and silver vessels weighed before him^f. Having thus ransacked all the temples and sacred places within the limits of his province, which Gabinus himself, his predecessor, had spared, he began to load the Syrians with such taxes as reduced them to beggary. He commanded all the cities of his province to furnish him each with a certain number of men, and then discharged them for a sum of money. No one could obtain justice without a large bribe, nor redeem themselves from the insolence of the soldiers, without advancing a large sum to the general. In short, there was not any means of amassing money, how unjust or oppressive soever, which he did not use, as if he had been sent not to govern, but to plunder the province. In the mean time the military discipline was intirely neglected, the soldiers lived in their quarters without any order, and the whole army gave themselves up to idleness, debauchery, and all manner of effeminate pleasures. We are told, that as Crassus was going out of the temple of Hierapolis, which he had plundered, his son, who walked before, stumbled at the threshold, and falling, pulled down his father with him. This was interpreted by the soothsayers as a very bad omen; but the intire neglect of military discipline was the surest presage of the misfortunes, which afterwards befel both his son and the whole army.

Crassus having thus spent the winter, early in the spring drew together his troops out of their several quarters, in order to pursue the war which he had begun with the Parthians. As Orodes their king was a very warlike prince, he had, during the winter, assembled a numerous army; but before he entered with it upon action, he sent ambassadors to the Roman general, to know for what reason he made war upon him. The ambassadors arrived in Syria while Crassus was assembling his troops, and being introduced to him, first put him in mind of the alliance which the Parthians had concluded with Sylla and Pompey, and then told him, that if he was sent against the Parthians by the people of Rome, they did not pretend he should disobey his orders, since in that case a war must ensue, which could not be terminated but by the final ruin of one of the empires; but if Crassus, as they had been informed, had undertaken this war, contrary to the inclinations of the people of Rome, to satiate his private interest, that the king their master, pitying his old age, would suffer the Romans he had left in Mesopotamia, where they were rather besieged than in garison, to retire unmolested. Crassus, without alledging any pretence for his invading the Parthian dominions, answered this speech with a rodomontade, saying, that they should have his answer at Seleucia. Hereupon the chief of the ambassadors, by name Vageses or Vabises, smiling, and shewing him the palm of his hand, said, You shall sooner, O Crassus, see hair grow here, than be master of Seleucia; and, without adding a word more, retired, and acquainted his master, that he must prepare for war^g.

Orodes finding, on the return of his ambassadors, that the proconsul was bent on a war, immediately took the field, and dividing his troops into two bodies, marched in person with one to the frontiers of Armenia, to make a diversion there, the king of that country having raised a considerable army to reinforce the Romans. The other he sent into Mesopotamia, under the command of the brave Surenas, or Surenas. This general, if we may depend on the character Plutarch gives us of him^h, had all the qualifications that form a consummate hero. He was descended from one of the most ancient and illustrious families of Parthia, and had derived from his ancestors the right of putting the crown on the king's head at his coronation: To this illustrious birth he is said to have joined an extraordinary wisdom and discretion, tho' he was but thirty years of age, and to have surpassed in valour and prowess all men of his time. His valour kept the princes and nations of Asia in awe, and prevented their entering into a confederacy against the formidable power of Parthia. Orodes was indebted to him, as we have hinted above, for his crown. The taking of Seleucia, when held by Mithridates, was chiefly owing to him; for he was the first who mounted the ramparts of that capital, struck terror into the enemy's troops, and made them fly before him. His stature was majestic, his air graceful, and his behaviour towards all extremely obliging. In wealth, power and authority, he was, next to the king, the first man in the kingdom. His equipage, when he travelled, consisted of a thousand camels to carry his baggage, two hundred chariots for the service of his wives and concubines, a thousand horsemen completely armed for his guard, and besides a great number of light-armed troops, which, with his domestics, amounted to ten a thousand more. He is said to have united the luxury of an Asiatic with the intrepidity of a conqueror; for he carried with him whatever could contribute to his pleasures, and at the same time was ready to expose himself to the greatest dangers, being always at the head of the troops he commanded in the most perillous and desperate enterprizes. Tho' his courage was such as to brave death in a breach or battle, yet he was not ashamed to paint his face, and perfume his hair, after the manner of the effeminate Medes; whereas the Parthians marched against the enemy with their hair in disorder, and making as hideous a figure as they could, to strike the more terror ¹.

takes most of the cities of Mesopotamia.

But, to resume the thread of our history, Ordes having divided his army into two b bodies, Surenas marched with that which was under his command into Mesopotamia, where he soon retook most of the cities which Crassus had made himself master of the year before. Hereupon several Roman soldiers, who garisoned the other places, making their escape out of Mesopotamia, fled to Crassus, and filled his camp with a terrible report of the number, power and strength of the enemy. They told their fellow soldiers, that the Parthian troops were very numerous, brave, and well-disciplined; that it was impossible to overtake them when they fled, or escape them when they pursued; that their defensive arms were proof against the Roman darts, and their offensive weapons so sharp, that no buckler was fence against them, &c. Crassus looked upon this account only as the effect of a panic and cowardly fear; but the common soldiers, and many of the chief officers, were so disheartened at it, that the c quæstor Caius Cassius, the same who afterwards conspired against Cæsar, and most of the legionary tribunes, advised Crassus to suspend his march, and deliberate with more leisure on the enterprize, before he proceeded farther in it. But Crassus obstinately persisted in his former resolution, contrary to the opinion of all his officers, being confirmed therein by the arrival of Artabazes king of Armenia, who brought with him six thousand horse, which were only his guard, and promised to send to the proconsul ten thousand cuirassiers, and thirty thousand foot, whenever he should stand in need of them. At the same he advised him by no means to march his army through the plains of Mesopotamia, but to take his rout over the mountains of Armenia. d The reasons with which he supported this advice were, that as Armenia was a mountainous country, the Parthian horse, in which the main strength of their army consisted, would prove there intirely useless; and besides, that if he took this rout, his army should be plentifully supplied with all necessaries: whereas, if he marched by the way of Mesopotamia, he would be perpetually harassed by the Parthian horse, and often be obliged to lead his army through sandy deserts, where he would be distressed for want of water, and all other provisions. This was the best advice that could be given him, and the reasons for it were unanswerable; but Crassus, despising all that was said to him, told Artabazes, that as he had left many valiant Romans to garison the towns which he had made himself master of the last year in Mesopotamia, he was obliged to take that rout, lest they should be abandoned to the mercy of the enemy; e but as to the auxiliaries the king of Armenia had offered him, he willingly accepted them, and desired Artabazes to send them to him with all possible expedition. Thus Crassus, hearkening to no advice but what tended to his ruin, set out on his march for Mesopotamia. Dion Cassius, a judicious historian, and at the same time an experienced warrior, observes here, that the Romans under the command of Crassus were on all occasions, either ignorant of what was necessarily to be done, or in no condition to execute it; and adds, that one would have thought they had been blinded and persecuted by some divinity, since they could neither make use of their minds nor bodies. This divinity was, no doubt, the true God, tho' unknown to Dion, who thus revenged the robbing and profaning of his holy temple at Jerusalem.

Enters Mesopotamia, contrary to the advice of all his officers.

The proconsul, being greatly encouraged by the prospect of the reinforcement f promised him by the king of Armenia, began his march, and, contrary to the advice of his chief officers, advanced to the frontiers of Mesopotamia. He had under his command seven legions, four thousand horse, and a great many auxiliaries, the whole army amounting to forty thousand men and upwards. With these he passed the Euphrates, near the city of Zeugma, in the province of Comagene (E), and again entered

(E) Strabo and Pliny place the city of Zeugma in Comagene, a province of Syria, and tell us, that it was so called from a bridge built here over the Euphrates, the word Zeugma in the Greek tongue signifying

- a entered Mesopotamia. Plutarch, Dion Cassius and Julius Obsequens speak of many prodigies, by which the gods declared before-hand, that they did not approve of this expedition, and gave him warning of the ill success that would attend it. While the troops were passing the Euphrates, the sky was all on a sudden overcast, and so dreadful a storm arose, that the soldiers were filled with fear and consternation. The incessant claps of thunder, the flashes of lightning that followed one another, and the violent wind which blew in the soldiers' faces, seemed to have been sent by the gods, on purpose to put a stop to their march. Part of the bridge was broke down by the wind and lightning, while the army was passing. The horse which Crassus used to ride in battle, fell into the river, and was drowned, with the groom who led him.
- b The golden eagle, which was the chief standard of the army, is said to have turned about of itself upon the staff on which it was fixed. Many other standards were, by the violence of the wind, blown into the river, and lost. While Crassus was offering the usual sacrifices for the purifying of the troops, he let fall the entrails of the victim, which the priests had, according to custom, put into his hands. From this event the soldiery drew bad presages; but the general, deriding their superstition, told them, That they had no occasion to be afraid, for his arms should not slip out of his hands in the same manner ^k.

- THE army having thus crossed the Euphrates, and entered the enemy's country, Cassius advised the proconsul to advance to some of the towns in which he had left garisons, and there rest and refresh his troops, till he had got certain intelligence of the number, strength and power of the enemy; but, if he did not approve of this counsel, he thought the best thing he could do was to march along the Euphrates to Seleucia; for, by keeping close to that river, he would avoid being surrounded by the Parthians, and at the same time be plentifully supplied, by means of his ships, with all necessary provisions. Crassus seemed to approve of this advice, and was ready to come into it, when Abgarus king of Edeffa, of whom we have spoke in the end of the preceding volume, arrived at the Roman camp, and prevailed upon the proconsul to follow a quite different plan. Abgarus, as he had formerly served under Pompey, was well known in the Roman army, and looked upon by the soldiery as a friend; but in reality was a traitor, and sent by Surenas, with whom he kept a private correspondence, on purpose to bring about the destruction of Crassus; and this part he acted so well, that the ruin of the Roman army was chiefly owing to him. In the first interview he had with the Roman general, he told him, that he wanted wings and feet more than arms against a nation that was ready, on his approach, to withdraw with their most valuable effects into Scythia and Hyrcania; that they had not courage enough to look the Romans in the face; that the name of Crassus had already spread a general terror among their troops, and that there wanted no more for the obtaining of a complete victory, than to march directly up to them, and give them battle. He offered himself for a guide to lead them the shortest way to the enemy;
- c and Crassus, blinded with his flattering speeches, gave intirely into the snare, and followed the traitor, who had so strongly insinuated himself into his favour, that he would hearken to nobody but him. Under the conduct of this crafty and treacherous guide, they first entered into a vast green plain, divided by many rivulets; and their march proved very easy cross this delicious country: but, the farther they advanced, the worse the roads grew, insomuch that they were obliged at last to climb up mountains and rocks, which brought them to a dry and sandy plain, where they could neither find food to satisfy their hunger, nor water to quench their thirst. Then Abgarus began to be suspected by the tribunes and other officers, who earnestly pressed their general to follow him no longer, but to retreat to the mountains. At the same time
- f an express arrived from Artabazes, acquainting Crassus, that Orodes had invaded his kingdom at the head of a mighty army, and that he was obliged to keep his forces at home for the defence of his own dominions. The same messenger advised the proconsul, in his master's name, to avoid by all means the barren plains, where his troops signifying a bridge. This bridge was, according to Dion Cassius and Josephus, the work of Alexander the Great. But it is not at all probable, that Alexander should have gone so far as Comagene to cross the Euphrates; and besides, Arrian tells us, that he led his army over that river at Thapsacus, after having repaired a bridge there, which had been destroyed by the Persians, in order to prevent him from entering Mesopotamia.

would perish with hunger, and to take to the mountains, and approach Armenia,^a that they might join their forces against the common enemy; but all was to no purpose, for Craſſus, instead of giving ear either to the wise counsels of his own officers, or of a king, who was a sincere and hearty friend to the Romans, blindly and obstinately followed the advice of the treacherous Abgarus, or rather his own ill fate; nay, he flew into a violent passion against the messenger sent him by Artabazes, for the treacherous advice he had given him¹. Cassius could not hear this mad answer without the greatest indignation; but Abgarus endeavoured to soften him, by promising to lead the army very soon into a delicious and fruitful country beyond the deserts, which would make them amends for the fatigue they had undergone. As to Craſſus, he gave no other answer to the complaints of his troops, than that they^b could not expect to meet with the delights of Campania in the most remote parts of the world.

The imprudent conduct of

Thus they continued their march for some days cross a desert, the very sight of which was sufficient to throw them into the utmost despair; for they could not perceive, either near them, or at a distance, the least tree, plant or brook, not so much as a hill, or a single blade of grass; nothing was to be seen all around them, but huge heaps of burning sand. The Romans had scarce got through this desert, when word was brought them by their scouts, that a numerous army of Parthians was advancing full march to attack them; for Abgarus, under pretence of going out on parties, had often conferred with Surenas, and concerted measures with him for destroying^c the Roman army. Upon this advice, which occasioned great confusion in the camp, the Romans being quite exhausted, and tired out with their long and troublesome march, Craſſus drew up his men in battalia, following at first the advice of Cassius, who was for extending the infantry as wide as possible, that they might take up the more ground, and by that means prevent the enemy from surrounding them; but Abgarus assuring the proconsul, that the Parthian forces were not so numerous as was represented, he changed this disposition, and believing only the man who betrayed him, drew up his troops in a square, which faced every way, and had on each side twelve cohorts in front. Near each cohort he placed a troop of horse to support them, that they might charge with the greater security and boldness. Thus the^d whole army looked more like one phalanx, than troops drawn up in manipuli, with spaces between them, after the Roman manner. The general himself commanded in the centre, his son in the left wing, and Cassius in the right. In this order they advanced to the banks of a small river called the Balissus, the sight of which was very pleasing to the soldiers, who were much harassed with drought and excessive heat. Most of the officers were for encamping on the banks of this river, or rather rivulet, to give the troops time to refresh themselves after the fatigues of so long and painful a march, and in the mean time to procure certain intelligence of the number and disposition of the Parthian army; but Craſſus, suffering himself to be hurried on by the inconsiderate ardour of his son, and the horse he commanded, only allowed the^e legions to take a meal standing; and before this could be done by all, he ordered them to advance, not slowly and halting now and then, after the Roman manner, but as fast as they could move, till they came in sight of the enemy, who, contrary to their expectation, did not appear either so numerous or so terrible as they had been represented. But this was a stratagem of Surenas, who had concealed his men in convenient places, ordering them to cover their arms, lest their brightness should betray them, and starting up at the first signal, attack the enemy on all sides. The stratagem had the desired effect; for Surenas no sooner gave the signal, than the Parthians, rising as it were out of the ground, with dreadful cries, and a most frightful noise, advanced against the Romans, who were greatly surprized and dismayed at that sight,^f and much more so, when the Parthians, throwing off the covering of their arms, appeared in shining cuirasses, and helmets of burnished steel, finely mounted on horses covered all over with armour of the same metal. At their head appeared young Surenas in a rich dress, and was the first who charged the enemy, endeavouring with his pike-men to break through the first ranks of the Roman army; but finding it too close and impenetrable, the cohorts supporting each other, he fell back, and retired in a seeming confusion; but the Romans were much surprized, when they saw themselves suddenly surrounded on all sides, and galled with continual showers of arrows.

- a Crassus ordered his light-armed foot and archers to advance, and charge the enemy; but they were soon repulsed, and forced to cover themselves behind the heavy-armed foot. Then the Parthian horse advancing near the Romans, discharged showers of arrows upon them, every one of which did execution, the legionaries being drawn up in such close order, that it was impossible for the enemy to miss their aim. As their arrows were of an extraordinary weight, and discharged with incredible force and impetuosity, nothing was proof against them. The two wings advanced in good order to repulse them, but to no effect; for the Parthians shot their arrows with as great dexterity when their backs were turned, as when they faced the enemy; so that the Romans, whether they kept their ground, or pursued the flying enemy, were
 b equally annoyed with their fatal arrows.

The Romans
galled by the arrows of the Parthians.

- THE Romans, as long as they had any hopes that the Parthians, after having spent their arrows, would either betake themselves to flight, or engage them hand to hand, stood their ground with great resolution and intrepidity; but when they observed that there were a great many camels in their rear loaded with arrows, and that those who emptied their quivers wheeled about to fill them anew, they began to lose courage, and loudly to complain of their general for suffering them thus to stand still, and serve only as a butt to the enemy's arrows, which, they well saw, would not be exhausted till they were all killed to a man. Hereupon Crassus ordered his son to advance at all adventures, and attack the enemy with thirteen hundred horse, five c hundred archers, and eight cohorts. But the Parthians no sooner saw this choice body, for it was the flower of the army, marching up against them, but they wheeled about, and betook themselves, according to their custom, to flight. Hereupon young Crassus, crying out as loud as he could, They fly before us, pushed on full speed after them, not doubting but he should gain a complete victory; but when he was at a great distance from the main body of the Roman army, he perceived his mistake, for those, who before had fled, facing about, charged him with incredible fury. Young Crassus ordered his troops to halt, hoping that the enemy, upon seeing their small number, would not be afraid to come to a close fight; but herein he was likewise greatly disappointed, for the Parthians, contenting themselves to oppose his d front with their heavy-armed horse, surrounded him on all sides, and keeping at a distance, discharged incessant showers of arrows upon the unfortunate Romans thus surrounded and pent up. The Parthian cavalry, in wheeling about, raised so thick a dust, that the Romans could scarce see one another, much less the enemy; nevertheless they found themselves wounded with arrows, tho' they could not perceive whence they came. In a short time the place where they stood was all strown with dead bodies. Some of the unhappy Romans finding their entrails tore, and many overcome by the exquisite torments they suffered, rolled themselves on the sand with the arrows in their bodies, and expired in that manner. Others endeavouring to tear out by force the bearded points of the arrows, only made their wounds the larger,
 e and increased their pain. Most of them died in this manner, and those who outlived their companions, were no more in a condition to act; for when young Crassus exhorted them to march up to the enemy, some shewed him their wounded bodies, others their hands nailed to their bucklers, and some their feet pierced through, and pinned to the ground; so that it was equally impossible for them either to attack the enemy, or defend themselves. The young commander therefore, leaving his infantry to the mercy of the enemy, advanced at the head of the cavalry against their heavy-armed horse. The thousand Gauls, whom he had brought with him from the west, charged the enemy with incredible boldness and vigour; but their lances did little execution on men armed with cuirasses, and horses covered with tried armour.
 f However, they behaved with great resolution; for some of them, taking hold of the enemies spears, and closing with them, threw them off their horses on the ground, where they lay without being able to stir, by reason of the great weight of their armour; others dismounting, crept under the enemies horses, and thrusting their swords into their bellies, made them throw their riders. Thus the brave Gauls fought, tho' greatly harassed with heat and thirst, which they were not accustomed to bear, till most of their horses were killed, and their commander dangerously wounded. They then thought it advisable to retire to their infantry, which they no sooner joined, than the Parthians invested them a-new, making a most dreadful havoc of them with their arrows. In this desperate condition, Crassus (spying a rising to defend himself in the best manner he could, till succours should be sent him from a his father. The Parthians pursued him, and having surrounded him in his new post, continued showering arrows upon his men, till most of them were either killed or disabled, without being able to make use of their arms, or give the enemy proofs of their valour.
 g ground at a small distance, led the remains of his detachment thither, with a design

Young Crassus had two Greeks with him, who had settled in the city of Carrha. These, touched with compassion in seeing so brave a man reduced to such straits, pressed him to retire with them to the neighbouring city of Ischnes, which had declared for the Romans; but the young Roman rejected their proposal with indignation, telling them, that he would rather die a thousand times than abandon so many valiant men, who sacrificed their lives for his sake. Having returned this answer to his two Greek friends, he embraced and dismissed them, giving them leave to retire and shift for themselves in the best manner they could. As for himself, having now lost all hopes of being relieved, and seeing most of his men and friends killed round him, he gave way to his grief, and not being able to make use of his arm, which was shot through with a large barbed arrow, he presented his side to one of his attendants, and ordered him to put an end to his unhappy life. His example was followed by Censorinus a senator, by Megabacchus an experienced and brave officer, and by most of the nobility who served under him. Five hundred common soldiers were taken prisoners, and the rest cut in pieces.

THE Parthians, having thus cut off or taken the whole detachment commanded c by young Crassus, marched without delay against his father, who, upon the first advice that the enemy fled before his son, and was closely pursued by him, had taken heart, the more because those, who had remained to make head against him, seemed to abate much of their ardour, the greatest part of them having marched with the rest against his son. Wherefore, having encouraged his troops, he had retired to a small hill in his rear, to wait there till his son returned from the pursuit. Young Crassus had dispatched frequent expresses to his father, to acquaint him with the danger he was in; but they had fallen into the enemies hands, and been by them put to the sword. Only the last, who had escaped with great difficulty, arrived safe, and informed him, that his son was lost, if he did not send him an immediate and powerful d reinforcement. This news threw Crassus into the utmost consternation; a thousand affecting thoughts rose in his mind, and disturbed his reason to such a degree, that he scarce knew what he was doing. However, the desire he had of saving his son and so many brave Romans who were under his command, made him immediately decamp, and march to their assistance; but he was not gone far, before he was met by the Parthians, who, with loud shouts and songs of victory, gave, at a great distance, the unhappy father notice of his misfortune. They had cut off young Crassus's head, and having fixed it on the point of a lance, were advancing full speed to fall on the father. As they drew near, Crassus was struck with that dismal and affecting sight, but on this occasion behaved like a hero; for tho' he was under the deepest concern, e he had the presence of mind to stifle his grief, for fear of discouraging the army, and to cry out to the dismayed troops, This misfortune is intirely mine; the loss of one man cannot affect the victory: let us charge, let us fight like Romans; if you have any compassion for a father who has just now lost a son, whose valour you admired, let it appear in your rage and resentment against these insulting barbarians. Thus Crassus strove to reanimate his troops; but his efforts were unsuccessful: their courage was quite sunk, as appeared from the faint and languishing shout which they raised, according to custom, before the action. When the signal was given, the Parthians, keeping to their old way of fighting, discharged clouds of arrows on the legionaries, without drawing near them, which did such dreadful execution, that many of the Romans, f to avoid the arrows, which occasioned a long and painful death, threw themselves, like men in despair, on the enemy's heavy-armed horse, seeking from their spears a more quick and easy kind of death. Thus the Parthians continued plying them incessantly with their arrows till night, when they left the field of battle, crying out, that they would allow the father one night to lament the death of his son.

The whole Parthian army falls upon Crassus.

Desperate condition of the Romans.

THIS was a melancholy night for the Romans. Crassus kept himself concealed from the soldiery, lying not in the general's tent, but in the open air, and on the bare ground, with his head wrapped up in his paludamentum or military cloke, and was, in that forlorn condition, says Plutarch, a great example to the vulgar, of the instability of fortune; to the wise, a still greater of the pernicious effects of avarice, g temerity, a temerity and ambition. Othorius, one of his lieutenants, and Cassius, approached him, and endeavoured to raise him up, and console him; but seeing him quite sunk under the weight of his affliction, and deaf to all comfort, they summoned a council of war, composed of all the chief officers, wherein it was unanimously resolved, that they should decamp before break of day, and retire, without sound of trumpet, to the neighbouring city of Carrha, which was held by a Roman garison. Agreeable to this resolution, they began their march as soon as the council broke up; which produced dreadful outcries among the sick and wounded, who perceiving that they were to be abandoned to the mercy of the enemy, filled the camp with their complaints and lamentations; but their cries and tears, tho' very affecting, did not stop the march of the others, which indeed was very slow, to give the stragglers time to come up. b There were only three hundred light horse, under the command of one Egnatius, who pursued their march without stopping. These arriving at Carrha about midnight, Egnatius, calling to the centinels on the walls, desired them to acquaint Coponius governor of the place, that Crassus had fought a great battle with the Parthians; and, without saying a word more, or letting them know who he was, continued his march with all possible expedition to the bridge of Zeugma, which he passed, and by that means saved his troops, but was much blamed for abandoning his general.

HOWEVER, the message he sent to Coponius was of great service to Crassus; for that commander, wisely conjecturing, from the manner in which the unknown person had given him that intelligence, that some misfortune had befallen Crassus, immediately ordered his garison to stand to their arms, and marching out, met Crassus, and conducted him and his army into the city; for the Parthians, tho' informed of his flight, did not offer to pursue him, observing therein the superstitious custom which obtained among them and the Persians, not to fight in the night; but, when it was day, they entered the Roman camp, and having put all the wounded, to the number of four thousand, to the sword, dispersed their cavalry all over the plain, in pursuit of the fugitives. One of Crassus's lieutenants, named Vargunteius, having separated in the night from the main body of the army, with four cohorts, missed his way, and was overtaken by the enemy, at whose approach he withdrew to a neighbouring hill, where he defended himself with great valour, till all his men were killed, except twenty, who made their way through the enemy sword in hand, and got safe to Carrha; but Vargunteius himself lost his life on this occasion. Crassus gets to Carrha.

In the mean time Surenas, not knowing whether Crassus and Cassius had retired to Carrha, or taken a different rout, in order to be informed of the truth, and take his measures accordingly, dispatched a messenger, who spoke the Roman language, to the city of Carrha, injoining him to approach the walls, and acquaint Crassus himself, or Cassius, that the Parthian general was inclined to enter into a treaty with them, and demanded a conference. Both the proconsul, and his quaestor Cassius, spoke from the walls with the messenger, and accepting the proposal with great joy, desired that the time and place for an interview might be immediately agreed upon. The messenger withdrew, promising to return quickly with an answer from Surenas; but that general no sooner understood that Crassus and Cassius were in Carrha, than he marched thither with his whole army, and having invested the place, acquainted the Romans, that, if they expected any favourable terms, they must deliver up Crassus and Cassius to him in chains. Hereupon a council of the chief officers being summoned, it was thought expedient to retire from Carrha that very night, and seek for another asylum. It was of the utmost importance, that none of the inhabitants of Carrha should be acquainted with their design till the time of its execution; but Crassus, whose whole conduct evidently shews that he was blinded, as Dion Cassius observes, by some divinity, imparted the whole matter in confidence to one Andromachus, chusing him for his guide, and relying injudiciously on the fidelity of a man, whom he scarce knew. Andromachus immediately acquainted Surenas with the design of the Romans, promising at the same time, as the Parthians did not engage in the night, to manage matters so, that they should not get out of his reach before day-break. Pursuant to his promise, he led them through many windings and turnings, till he brought them into deep, marshy grounds, where the infantry were up to the knees in mire. Then Cassius, suspecting that their guide had led them into those bogs with no good design, refused to follow him any longer, and returning to Carrha, took his rout towards Syria, which he reached with five hundred horse. Octavius, with five thousand men under his command, being conducted by trusty guides, gained the mountains, called by Plutarch and Appian, Sinnaci, and there intrenched himself before break of day. As for Craſſus, he was still intangled in the marshes, when Surenas, at the rising of the sun, overtook him, and invested him with his cavalry.

The proconsul had with him four cohorts, and a small body of horse; and with these he gained, in spite of all opposition, the summit of another hill within twelve furlongs of Octavius, who seeing the danger that threatened his general, flew to his assistance first with a small number of his men, but was soon followed by all the rest, who being ashamed of their cowardice, quitted their post, tho' very safe, and charging the Parthians with great fury, disengaged Craſſus, and obliged the enemy to abandon the hill. Upon the retreat of the enemy, they formed themselves into a hollow square, and placing Craſſus in the middle, made a kind of rampart round him with their bucklers, resolutely protesting, that none of the enemy's arrows should touch their general's body, till they were all killed fighting in his defence. Surenas, loth to let so fine a prey escape, surrounded the hill, as if he designed to make a new attack; but finding his Parthians very backward, and not doubting but the Romans, when night came on, would pursue their march, and get out of his reach, he had recourse again to artifice, and declared before some prisoners, whom he soon after set at liberty, that he was inclined to treat with the proconsul of a peace, and that it was better to come to a reconciliation with Rome, than to sow the seeds of an eternal war, by shedding the blood of one of her generals. Agreeable to this declaration, Surenas, as soon as the prisoners were released, advanced towards the hill, where the Romans were posted, attended only by some of his officers, and, with his bow unbent, and open arms, invited Craſſus to an interview. So sudden a change seemed very suspicious to the proconsul, who therefore declined the interview, till he was forced by his own soldiers to intrust his life with an enemy, whose treachery they had all experienced; for the legionaries flocking round him, not only abused him in an outragious manner, but even menaced him, if he did not accept of the proposals made him by the Parthian general. Seeing therefore that his troops were ready to mutiny, he began to advance, without arms or guards, towards the enemy, after having called the gods and his officers to witness the violence his troops offered him, and intreated all who were present, but especially Octavius and Petronius, two of the chief commanders, for the honour of Rome their common mother, not to mention, after his death, the shameful behaviour of the Roman legionaries. Octavius and Petronus could not resolve to let him go alone, but attended him down the hill, as did likewise some legionaries, keeping at a distance. Craſſus was met at the foot of the hill by two Greeks, who dismounting from their horses, saluted him with great respect, and desired him in the Greek tongue to send some of his attendants, who might satisfy him, that Surenas, and those who were with him, came without arms. Hereupon Craſſus sent two brothers of the Roscian family; but Surenas having caused them to be seized, advanced to the foot of the hill mounted on a fine horse, and attended by the chief officers of his army. Craſſus, who waited for the return of his two messengers, was surprized to see himself prevented by Surenas in person, when he least expected it. The Parthian general, perceiving, as he approached Craſſus, that he was on foot, cried out in a seeming surprize, What do I see? a Roman general on foot, and we on horseback! Let a horse be brought for him immediately. You need not be surprized, replied Craſſus, we are come only to an interview, each after the custom of his country.
Very well, answered Surenas, there shall be henceforth a lasting peace between king Orodes and the people of Rome; but we must sign the articles of it on the banks of the Euphrates; for you Romans do not always remember your conventions. Craſſus would have sent for a horse; but a very stately one, with a golden bit, and richly caparisoned, was brought to him by a Parthian; which Surenas presenting to him, Accept this horse from my hands, said he, which I give you in the name of my master king Orodes. He had scarce uttered these words, when some of the king's officers, taking Craſſus by the middle, set him up upon the horse, which they began to whip with great violence before them, in order to make him quicken his pace. Octavius, offended at this insult, took the horse by the bridle; Petronius, and the few Romans who were present, seconded him, and flocking all around Craſſus, stopped his horse. The Parthians endeavoured to repulse them, and clear the way for the proconsul; whereupon they began to jostle and push one another with great tumult and disorder. At last Octavius,

- a Octavius, drawing his sword, killed one of the king's grooms; but at the same time another coming behind Octavius, with one blow laid him dead at his feet. Both parties fought with great resolution, the Parthians striving to carry off Crassus, and the Romans to rescue him out of their hands. In this scuffle most of the Romans, who came to the conference, were killed, and among the rest Crassus himself; but whether by a Roman or a Parthian is uncertain. Some writers tell us, that he fell by the hand of one Promonathros or Manarthes, a Parthian; but others, with Livy^a, Florus^b, and Sextus Rufus ^c, leave it in doubt, whether he was killed by his own men, to prevent his falling alive into the enemy's hands, or by the Parthians. However that be, his head and right hand were immediately cut off, in order to be sent to Orodes in Armenia, and his mangled body left unburied, to be devoured by the wild beasts. Upon his death, the rest of the army either surrendered to the enemy, or dispersing in the night, were pursued and put to the sword. The Romans lost in this campaign at least thirty thousand men, of which twenty thousand were killed, and ten thousand taken prisoners. The latter continued in captivity among the Parthians, and contracting ignominious marriages, to the shame of Rome, as Horace emphatically expresses it (F), grew old on the lands, and under the standards of the barbarians. The standards of the vanquished legions were carried to Seleucia, and there shewn for many years as sights; and from this time the Romans looked upon the war with the Parthians as the most important of all their wars, the revenging of the death of Crassus, and the recovering of their ensigns, being ever after the chief object of their application; but how they succeeded herein, we shall see in the sequel of this history. This battle is called by the Latin authors the battle of Carrhæ, because it was fought at a small distance from that city, and was, without all doubt, the most terrible blow, after the battle of Cannæ, which the Romans ever received.
- b Surenas, having thus intirely defeated the Roman army, set out on his march to Seleucia, spreading a report, that Crassus was still alive, that he intended to shew him to the numerous inhabitants of that great metropolis. His design was to entertain them with a comical scene, which he projected on his march. There was among the Roman captives one Caius Paccianus, who greatly resembled the proconsul Crassus. This man Surenas caused to be dressed after the Parthian manner, and having placed him on a stately horse, made him enter Seleucia at the head of the army, with twelve lictors carrying before him their fasces and axes. The guards of this mock consul were mounted on camels, each of them having an empty purse hanging at his girdle. The bloody heads of several Roman soldiers, stuck on spears, served for trophies, and revived in the minds of the citizens of Seleucia the joy, which the first news of the late victory had occasioned in that city. This odd train was followed by a company of lewd women, who, with loose songs, stigmatized the memory and character of Crassus. When the shew was over, Surenas produced in the presence of the senate of Seleucia, a collection of lascivious tales, then known by the title of the Milesian fables, which a Parthian soldier had found in rifling the baggage of a young Roman, whom Plutarch calls Rustius. The general took occasion from thence to inveigh against the debauchery of the Romans, who put such infamous books into the hands of their youth, and corrupted their minds with lewd fables, instead of forming their bodies for the exercise of war ^d.
- c WHEN the battle of Carrhæ was fought, king Orodes was, as we have hinted above, in Armenia, where he had concluded a peace with Artabazes; for the king of Armenia, on the return of the expresses he had sent to Crassus, perceiving by the false measures he had taken, that the army under his command must have been infallibly lost, had entered into a treaty of friendship with the Parthian, and cemented it by giving one of his daughters in marriage to Pacorus the son of Orodes. While the two kings were solemnizing their new alliance with expensive and public feasts, Styllaces or Syllaces, a Parthian officer, whom Surenas had sent with the news of his late a. victory, and the head of Crassus as a proof of it, arrived in the capital of Armenia. The two kings were at table, and Jason, a tragedian of Trallis, was singing some songs out of the Bacchis of Euripides, when the messenger was introduced, and presented Orodes with the head of Crassus, saying, Surenas sends you the head of the Roman general, who has been cut in pieces with his whole army. The transports of joy, which Orodes felt at this sight, and these words, are not to be expressed. The lords of both kingdoms, who attended their sovereigns, raised loud and repeated shouts of joy; and Syllaces was ordered to give a more particular and distinct account of that memorable action: which when he had done, Orodes commanded melted gold to be poured into Crassus's mouth, reproaching him thereby with avarice, which had b been always his predominant passion.

Surenas did not long enjoy the pleasure of his victory; for Orodes, growing jealous of his glory, and great authority among the Parthians, caused him to be put to death soon after, placing Pacorus, his favourite son, at the head of the army in his room. The young prince, agreeable to his father's directions, marched into Syria, which the Parthians expected to find without defence, after the late defeat of the Roman army; but Cassius, the only general officer who survived the defeat of Crassus, meeting them on the frontiers, at the head of five hundred horse, who had escaped with him out of Mesopotamia, and some Asiatic levies, gave them so warm a reception, that they thought it adviseable to retreat to their own territories, and there c raile more forces for a second invasion. Accordingly they repassed the Euphrates, and having spent the winter in making new preparations, early in the spring they crossed the Euphrates anew, and re-entered Syria with a very numerous army, under the conduct of Orsaces, an old and experienced commander; for Pacorus the king's son, being then but fifteen years of age, had only the name of general. Orsaces reduced, without opposition, such places as lay in his way; and being master of all the country between the Euphrates and the city of Antioch, closely besieged that metropolis, Cassius having shut himself up in it, as not having sufficient forces to keep the field, and make head against so powerful an enemy. In the mean Cicero, to whom the province of Cilicia had been assigned, being informed by Antiochus king of Comagene, d that Cassius was besieged in Antioch by the Parthians, and that the king of Armenia was ready to fall upon Cappadocia, drew together what forces he could, and with them marched to the eastern borders of his province lying next to Armenia, with a design to prevent the Armenians from invading Cappadocia, and to be at the same time near at hand to assist Cassius, in case the Parthians should pursue the siege of Antioch with vigour. He likewise sent another body of troops to mount Amanus with the same view, which falling in with a great party of Parthian horse, that had entered Cilicia through the streights of that mountain, cut them off all to a man. The news of this defeat, and of Cicero's approach to Antioch, greatly encouraged Cassius and his men to make a vigorous defence, and so disheartened the Parthians, e that despairing to carry the place, they raised the siege, and marching to Antigonia, another city in that neighbourhood, attempted to reduce it; but as they were quite unacquainted with the manner of managing sieges, their chief force consisting in cavalry, they were attended with no better success there, and were soon obliged to retire. Cassius, who was apprised of the rout they would take, drew them into an ambuscade, in which great numbers of them were cut off, with Orsaces their leader. Those who had the good luck to escape, repassed the Euphrates with Pacorus; but returned again with new forces towards the end of the summer, and wintered in Cyrrhestica, a northern province of Syria.

Return, and besiege Antioch

As soon as the season was proper for action, the Parthians took the field, and f marching to Antioch, besieged that city a second time, and M. Calpurnius Bibulus with all his forces in it; for the province of Syria had been allotted to him, and Cassius, who had defended it before without any legal commission, was now returned to Rome. As Bibulus was no warrior, he did not so much as make one sally, but kept his troops within the walls, suffering the enemy to carry on their works without the least molestation. He would not even acquaint Cicero, who was still in Cilicia, with the danger he was in; nay, he was heard to say, that he had rather be reduced

a to the utmost extremity, than seem to stand in need of his assistance. However, his lieutenants wrote both to Cicero, and to Thermus prætor of Asia, soliciting them to hasten to their relief; but, before their arrival, Bibulus effected by craft what he dared not attempt by force; for having by his emissaries encouraged Ordonantes, a nobleman of Parthia, who had been disgusted by Orodes, to raise a rebellion in the heart of the kingdom, the army before Antioch was recalled to suppress it; by which means the siege of Antioch was raised, and all Syria delivered from the danger it was in of falling under the power of the Parthians ^a. The siege raised

We find no further mention made of the Parthians from this time to the breaking out of the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, when the latter sent ambassadors to b solicit succours from Orodes; which that prince was willing to grant, on condition that Syria was delivered up to him; but Pompey refusing to comply with his demand, he not only denied him the succours he required, but, after the battle of Pharsalia, put in irons Lucius Hortius, whom Pompey had sent to him to implore his assistance anew, or, at least, to obtain for him leave to shelter himself in the Parthian dominions ^w. But, for all this, Cæsar had no sooner got the better of Pompey's party, and settled his affairs at Rome, than he began to make great preparations, with a design to invade Parthia, and revenge the defeat and death of Crassus at Carrhæ; but when all things were ready for his expedition, Cæsar was killed, and the Parthians by his death delivered from a war, which, in all likelihood, would have proved fatal to them ^x.

c Not long after, the eastern provinces being allotted to Marc Antony, in the famous partition of the Roman empire between him, Octavianus, and Lepidus, the cities of Syria being grievously oppressed with the taxes Marc Antony laid on them, rose up in arms, and having killed those who were sent to gather them, invited the Parthians to their assistance, assuring them, that they were all to a man ready to join them, and drive out the Romans. On this invitation the Parthians passed the Euphrates with a mighty army, under the command of Pacorus, and Labienus, a Roman general of Pompey's party. He was the son of Titus Labienus, who had been Cæsar's lieutenant in Gaul, and one of his chief favourites; but afterwards siding with Pompey, became one of his most inveterate enemies, and was slain fighting against him in the battle of Munda. His son, pursuing the same interest, had been sent by Brutus and Cassius, a little before the battle of Philippi, to beg succours of the Parthian king, which he was soliciting when that battle happened. The bad success which attended his friends on that occasion, having discouraged him from returning, he continued in Parthia; and having prevailed on Orodes to undertake this war, was sent with Pacorus to command under him ^y. On his entering Syria, he was met by Saxa, Antony's lieutenant, whom he overthrew in a pitched battle, obliging him to shelter himself in Cilicia. After this victory, having divided his army into two bodies, he marched with one after Saxa into Cilicia, where he killed him, over-ran all Asia Minor; and having obliged Plancus, Antony's other lieutenant in those parts, to fly to the islands, subjected all the places as far as the Hellepont and the Egean sea ^z. At the same time Pacorus, with the other part of the army, reduced all Syria and Phœnice, as far as Tyre, which was the only city that held out against him, being defended by the Romans, who from all parts had flocked thither as to a place of refuge. Thus the Parthians made themselves masters of all Syria, Asia Minor and Phœnice, except Tyre, and exercised their power even in Judæa, where they plundered Jerusalem, drove Hyrcanus from the throne, and placed Antigonus on it in his room, in the manner we have related in the history of the Jews.

d But they did not long enjoy their new conquests; for Antony, after his reconciliation with Octavianus, having sent Ventidius, one of his lieutenants, against them, that general was attended with such success, that the Parthians were soon obliged to quit all they had taken, and repass the Euphrates; for Ventidius managed matters with such expedition, that arriving in Asia much sooner than expected, he surprized Labienus before he was in a condition to withstand him, having no Parthian troops with him, but only a few Roman deserters, and a small body of raw and undisciplined Asiatics, gathered up in Syria, Phœnice, and Asia Minor; wherefore, not daring to stand the approach of a Roman army, he retired as fast as Ventidius advanced, till he got to mount Taurus, where he encamped so advantageously, that he could^a not be forced to a battle, and then sent to Pacorus for assistance. Pacorus sent immediately the flower of his army to the relief of Labi-enus; but the Parthians despising the Romans on account of their late victories over them, engaged Ventidius before Labi-enus could join them, and were intirely defeated. The news of this defeat so disheartened those who were with Labi-enus, that they all abandoned him, every one shifting for himself in the best manner he could. Ventidius pursued them, slew some of them, and took the rest into his service. As for Labi-enus, he made his escape in a disguise; but after having sculked about for some time in Cilicia, from one hiding place to another, he was at last discovered by Demetrius, governor of Cyprus, taken, and put to death^b. After this victory, Ventidius having made himself master of all Cilicia, marched to mount Amanus, which parted that province from Syria; and there met another army of Parthians, who, under the command of Pharnapates, one of Pacorus's lieutenants, had seized the passes leading into Syria, in order to obstruct his further progress; but Ventidius falling upon them, cut most of them in pieces, killed their general, and having gained a second victory as considerable as the former, pursued his march, without any further opposition, into Syria. Hereupon Pacorus, having assembled all his forces, made what haste he could to the Euphrates, which he repassed, leaving the Romans masters of all the countries on this side that river^b.

Antony, who in the mean time was diverting himself with his new wife Octavia at Athens, being informed of the victories gained by Ventidius, made great rejoicings^c in that city; but hearing at the same time that Pacorus was making vast preparations for another invasion, he resolved to head his army in person, and not suffer his lieutenant to reap the whole glory of the war: wherefore early in the spring he left Athens with all his forces, and marched towards the east; but before he got thither, Ventidius had gained a third victory over the Parthians, far more glorious than the other two. It was obtained in the following manner: Ventidius fearing lest the Parthians, whose preparations were much advanced, should pass the Euphrates before he had time to draw all his troops together from their different quarters, had recourse to the following stratagem: there was a petty eastern prince in his camp, under the character of an ally, who was intirely addicted to the interest of the Parthians, with whom^d Ventidius well knew he kept a private correspondence, communicating to them all the intelligence he could get of the counsels and designs of the Romans. This man's treachery Ventidius resolved to improve to his own advantage; for taking the first opportunity that offered of conversing with him, and seeming to repose in him an intire confidence, he told him, that he had heard with much concern, that the Parthians did not design to pass the Euphrates at Zeugma, as usual, but to enter Syria another way, at a passage much below the former; for if they pass at Zeugma, said he, the country on this side the Euphrates is so mountainous, that the cavalry, in which the whole force of their army consists, can do us no great hurt; but, in case they take the lower passage, the country being there all plain and level, they will^e have so great an advantage over us, that it will be impossible for us to make head against them. This conference was no sooner over, than the treacherous Chauneus, for so he is called by Appian, conveyed a full account of it to the Parthians, with whom it had the desired effect; for Pacorus, instead of keeping the road to Zeugma, took the other rout, and in that march lost forty days; during which time Ventidius being joined by Silo, Antony's lieutenant in Palestine, and by all the legions which were quartered on the other side mount Taurus, found himself in a condition to give them a warm reception when they entered Syria. As they met with no opposition either in passing the river, or advancing into Syria, they ascribed that inactivity to fear, and therefore, with great boldness, went directly to attack the Romans in their camp, on the top of a steep hill. This Ventidius expected, and therefore sallying out upon them at the head of his legionaries, as they were ascending the hill, easily put them in disorder, by the advantage of the ground, and pursued them with great slaughter into the plain, where they rallied, and made a most vigorous resistance, the victory being doubtful, till Pacorus was killed fighting with incredible bravery at the head of the Parthian horse. His death was followed by the flight of the whole army, every one striving to regain the bridge, in order to retire into their own country; but^f

Ventidius,

- a Ventidius, with a strong detachment of horse, getting to the Euphrates before them, cut off their retreat; so that only a small number of them escaped by flight, and retired into the dominions of Antiochus king of Comagene; the rest were all put to the sword ^c. This victory, which fully revenged the death of Crassus, and the Romans who were killed with him, was gained on the same day of the year, on which, fourteen years before, the famous battle of Carrhae was lost.

- Orodes*, when he heard of the defeat of his army, and the death of his son, was so overwhelmed with grief, that, for some days, he abstained from all food, not being able to utter a single word the whole time; and when he recovered the use of his tongue, he acted and spoke in such a manner, as plainly shewed, that sorrow had got the better of his reason; for nothing was heard from him but the name of Pacorus, his dear Pacorus; sometimes he talked to him as if he had been present, commended his gallant behaviour, and launched out on the happiness of a father who was blessed with such a son. At other times, remembering that he was dead, he burst into a flood of tears, and was ready to lay violent hands on himself: and indeed never was grief more just; for this was the most terrible blow the Parthian monarchy had ever received, and the loss of the young prince was as great as that of the army, he being commended by all the ancients as the most worthy person for justice, clemency, valour, and all other princely qualities, that the royal family of Arfaces ever produced. He so endeared himself to the Syrians, during the short time he lived among them, that they never expressed more affection for any of their native sovereigns, than they did for him, tho' descended from a family, which had brought many calamities on their country ^d.

- HAD Ventidius pursued the advantages of this victory, he might have driven the Parthians quite out of Mesopotamia and Babylonia, and extended the boundaries of the Roman empire to the Tigris; but as he was afraid of giving umbrage to Antony, with whose jealous temper he was well acquainted, he contented himself with reducing those places in Syria and Phenice, which had revolted from the Romans in the late war. Pursuant to this plan, he was with his whole army in Comagene, making war upon Antiochus king of that country, for siding with the Parthians, when Antony arriving, took the command of the army upon himself, and dismissed Ventidius. His pretence for this was, that Ventidius deserved a triumph, and ought to go to Rome to ask it of the senate; but the true motive that prompted him to act in this manner, was, that he envied him the great glory he had acquired, and the reputation he was in with the army; for Antony was one of those, who cannot bear to be served by persons of such talents as are capable of eclipsing their own; he was therefore glad to get rid of him, and never employed him afterwards, tho' he often stood in need of so able and experienced a general. Ventidius, on his return to Rome, was received there with all possible marks of honour, and granted a triumph, with the general applause of the whole city. In his triumph two very remarkable circumstances concurred; the one, that he was the only Roman who ever triumphed over the Parthians, no one having, either before or after him, attained to that honour. The other circumstance, no less remarkable, was, that he triumphed after having been led in triumph himself; for, in the social war, being made a captive at the taking of Asculum, the chief city of Picenum, by Strabo the father of Pompey the Great, he was, with his father and mother, who carried him in her arms, led before the triumphal chariot of that general. Afterwards his family being brought to poverty by the ruin of their city, he was obliged, when grown up, to betake himself to a mean and sordid employment for his livelihood; for at first he was only a muletier, and being used to provide mules to carry the baggage of such Roman magistrates as were sent to govern foreign provinces, Cæsar employed him in this capacity when he first went into Gaul; and having on that occasion observed in him a great quickness of apprehension and activity, took him with him into his province, and put him in the way of rising to great preferments; for he first gave him a small command in the army, from which he raised himself, by his distinguished merit, through all the stations of the camp to the highest post in the army, and became one of Cæsar's chief generals in all the wars he waged afterwards. Upon his death he sided with Antony, distinguished himself at Mutina and Perusia, and was at last sent as Antony's lieutenant into the east, where a he gained the victories over the Parthians which we have mentioned *.

Orodes barbarously murdered by his son Phrabates.

In the mean time Orodes, being in some degree recovered from the distraction of mind, which the death of his son Pacorus had occasioned, appointed Phrabates the eldest, but the most wicked of all his children, to succeed him in the throne, admitting him at the same time to share the regal power with himself. Phrabates no sooner saw himself vested with the sovereign authority, than he caused all his brothers by the daughter of Antiochus Eusebes, king of Syria, to be put to death, for no other reason, but because they were of a more noble descent than himself. As this was highly resented by his father, he attempted to put him to death also, by giving him a potion of the poisonous juice of hemlock; but that proving only a medicine against the dropsy, which grief had brought upon the king, the cruel and unnatural son caused him to be stifled in his bed, and soon after dispatched all his brothers, who were thirty in number. The same cruelty he exercised over the nobility, and all the rest of the royal family, not sparing his eldest son, lest the discontented Parthians should place him, as he was already of age, on the throne. Hereupon many of the chief lords of Parthia, quitting their own country, took refuge in Syria, under the protection of Antony. Among these was one Monases, a man of great distinction, who having gained the confidence of Antony, prevailed upon him to engage in a war with the Parthians his countrymen †.

Antony undertakes a war against the Parthians. Year of the flood 2963. Before Christ 36.

As Antony had, by means of his lieutenant Publius Canidius, reduced the Armenians, Albanians, and Iberians, and carried his victorious arms as far as mount Caucasus, he was easily persuaded to embark in a war, which he had long designed, all the Romans who served under him, earnestly pressing him to revenge the death of Crassus, and their countrymen, who had perished with him at Carrae. Accordingly he began to make vast preparations for so great an undertaking; and as he formed all his schemes for the carrying of it on by the advice of Monases, in order to attach him the more to his service, he allowed him the revenues of three cities for his maintenance, imitating therein the generosity of Xerxes towards Themistocles; and moreover promised to place him on the throne of Parthia, on his conquering that country. But in the mean time Phrabates, dreading the advantage which the enemy might draw from the advice of so wise and able a counsellor, who was well acquainted with the country, sent a solemn embassy to invite him home, on such terms as the banished Parthian thought fit to accept. This greatly provoked Antony; but nevertheless he did not think it advisable to use any violence with him, for fear of discouraging others from revolting: he therefore dismissed him with great civility, and sent ambassadors with him to Phrabates to treat of a peace, hoping by that means to divert him from making the necessary preparations for a war, and to fall upon him before he was in a condition to withstand him; but herein he was greatly disappointed, for, on his arrival at the Euphrates, which he intended to pass, and enter the Parthian dominions on that side, he found all the passes so well guarded on the other bank, that e he thought it advisable to march off to the left, with a design to reduce Media, and from thence invade Parthia. This plan had been suggested to him before by Artabazes king of Armenia, who falling out with Artavasdes king of Media, had pressed Antony to take that rout, with no other view but to distress the Median his rival. Antony had rejected it when first proposed, intending to invade the Parthian dominions by the nearest cut over the Euphrates; but not succeeding in that, he fell in with the proposal of the Armenian, who in the end betrayed him; for instead of conducting him the straight way from Zeugma on the Euphrates to the river Araxes, which parted Media from Armenia, and was about five hundred miles distance from the place whence he first set out, he led him over rocks and mountains so far about, that f the army had marched a thousand miles and upwards, before they reached the borders of Media, where they intended to begin the war; so that they were not only greatly fatigued, but had not sufficient time, the year being already far spent, to put in execution the design on which they were come. However, as Antony was in great haste to get back to Cleopatra, he left behind him most of the baggage of the army, and three hundred waggons loaded with battering rams, and other military engines for sieges, ordering Statianus, one of his lieutenants, with a body of ten thousand

- a men, to guard them, and bring them, by slower marches, after the army. With the rest of the forces he hastened forward, and marched three hundred miles more, without allowing his men any respite, till he arrived at Praaspa, or, as others call it, Pbraata, the capital of Media, which he immediately invested; but, as the place was well fortified, he was soon made sensible of his mistake in leaving behind him his battering rams, and other military engines; for without them he could make no progress in the siege: and when the Median and Parthian forces came up with him, they did not think it worth their while to attack him, but pursued their march, with a design to prevent Statianus from joining him with the heavy carriages, without which, they well knew, he could never make himself master of the city. Statianus did not expect them, and therefore, being attacked before he had time to draw up his men, was cut off, with the whole body under his command, which amounted to ten thousand men. All the baggage and military engines were taken, and among the rest a battering ram eighty foot long. Polemo, king of Pontus, was made prisoner, and with him a few Romans, to whom the Parthians gave quarter in the end of the slaughter; but all the rest were put to the sword ^b.

- Statianus*, on his first discovering the enemy, had dispatched an express to Antony, who made all the haste he could to his assistance; but nevertheless came too late, and found, on his arrival, Statianus and all his men dead on the field of battle: but as no enemy appeared, he took courage, imagining they had fled at his approach, and returned to the siege, where he was daily harassed by the garison within, and by the enemy's army without. If he sent out small parties to forage, they were generally cut off by the Parthian cavalry; and if he detached large bodies, those who remained were not able to stand the repeated sallies of the numerous garison. To obviate these inconveniencies, Antony attempted to draw the enemy to a general engagement, and twice succeeded therein, but without reaping from thence any advantage; for tho' he put the enemy to flight in both engagements, yet the loss they sustained was very inconsiderable, the Parthians preventing, by the swiftness of their horses, the evil consequences which generally attend such defeats. In the last he thought his victory complete, and pursued it to the utmost; but in the end found that he had killed only eighty of the enemy's men, and taken thirty prisoners, during the whole action. However, he continued before Pbraata till his provisions were near spent, and the forage round the country quite consumed; when he began to think of a retreat, seeing he had lost all hopes of making himself master of the besieged city; but as he was to march three hundred miles through the enemy's country, for at that distance Pbraata lay from the borders of Armenia, before he raised the siege, he sent ambassadors to Phrabates, to acquaint him, that the Roman people was willing to grant him a lasting peace, provided he would return the standards and prisoners taken at Carrbae. Phrabates received the ambassadors sitting on a golden throne, and after having bitterly inveighed against the avarice and unbounded ambition of the Romans, told them, that he would not by any means part with the standards and captives taken at Carrbae, but would allow Antony to retire unmolested, provided he withdrew immediately from before Pbraata. Antony, who was reduced to great straits, no sooner received this answer, than he raised the siege, and began his march towards Armenia, hoping that Phrabates would be as good as his word; but he was therein greatly disappointed, for the Parthian army harassed him the whole way, and fell upon him eighteen times with all their forces, before he reached the Araxes, which was the boundary of the Median territories. 'Tis true, he always repulsed them, but not without great loss on his side; whereas that of the Parthians, as being all horsemen, was very inconsiderable, by reason of their quick retreats. The Romans were very fortunate in their guide, who being a native of Mardia, a country bordering on Media and Armenia, was well acquainted with the roads and by-ways, and conducted them with great fidelity. However, the army was thrice in imminent danger of being intirely cut off by ambuscades, which they could not possibly have escaped, had they not received notice of them from the enemy's quarters. Monases twice forewarned Antony of them by a messenger sent to him for that purpose, in return for the kindness shewn him during his banishment. The other time he had his intelligence from an old Roman soldier, who had continued among the Parthians ever since the battle of Carrbae, and came to the Roman camp to acquaint his countrymen with the danger. This painful

March lasted twenty-seven days, during which time they were not only incessantly harassed by the Parthian arrows, but greatly distressed for want of provisions, the parties that went out to forage being generally cut off, and their beasts of burden either dead, or employed in carrying the sick and wounded. A quart of wheat was sold in the camp for fifty drachmas, and barley-loaves for their weight in silver. At last they were reduced to live upon such roots and herbs as they found in the fields, which occasioned many distempers among them. When the famine first began to rage in the camp, some to avoid it fled to the enemy; but were by the Parthians cruelly murdered in the sight of the rest; which put a stop to their deserting, and proved very advantageous to Antony, who would have been left alone, had the enemy treated kindly such as took refuge with them. Antony seeing his men dying every day in great numbers, was often heard to cry out, O, the ten thousand! admiring the conduct of Xenophon, who marched a far longer way through the enemy's country, and, in spite of all opposition, led his men safe home. At length the army began to mutiny, and falling upon those who had any gold or silver, plundered and murdered them, rifled Antony's baggage, seized on his money and plate, and committed many other disorders. Hereupon the general, quite disheartened, retired to his tent, and calling one of his freed-men, ordered him to kill him, and after his death to cut off his head, and conceal it, lest it should fall into the enemy's hands, and be insulted as that of Crassus had been; but the Mardian guide, coming into his tent in the mean time, prevailed upon him to forbear using any violence on himself, by assuring him, that the worst of the march was over, and that he was at a small distance from the river Araxes, beyond which the Parthians would not pursue him. Accordingly he arrived a few days after at that river, and crossed it, without being disturbed in the least by the enemy. The soldiers seeing themselves at length out of the enemy's reach, and in a place of safety, fell down on the ground, and kissed it, embracing one another with tears of joy ^a.

Antony committed, without all doubt, many mistakes in the management of this war, but none in his retreat; for all the ancients do him the justice to own, that he conducted it with as much art and success as it was capable of. He lost indeed a great many men; for on his reviewing his forces after he had passed the Araxes, he found twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse missing; but the greater part of these had perished by the hardships of the campaign, and very few by the enemy's swords. The greatest error he committed in this fatal undertaking, was his obstinately pursuing his march, after he had, with the utmost difficulty, got back into Armenia; for instead of putting the remainder of his army into winter quarters, and allowing them time to refresh themselves after so long and fatiguing a march, as he was in haste to get back to Cleopatra, he continued his march, tho' winter was far advanced, through Armenia, which was then covered with snow, and, in that mountainous country, lost eight thousand more of his men, who perished by reason of the hard season, and excessive cold; so that, according to the most moderate calculation, he lost in all two-and-thirty thousand men ^b. Florus tells us ^c, that he did not bring back the third part of his army, which, at his first setting out on this destructive undertaking, consisted of an hundred thousand men. He was not indeed overcome in battle, as Crassus had been; but, if we compare the losses of both generals, we shall find Antony's expedition to have been the most unfortunate of the two; and yet, on his return into Egypt, he had the confidence to assume such honours as were due only to conquerors.

Parthians; but is diverted from it by Cleopatra.

Antony was scarce returned from this expedition, when the kings of Media and Parthia, falling out about the booty they had taken on the defeat of Statianus, the former sent an embassy to him, offering to join him with all his forces against the latter. Antony accepted this offer with great joy, the more because he was informed at the same time, that the Parthians, not able to endure the tyranny and cruelty of their king, had taken up arms against him, and were greatly divided among themselves. These circumstances offered him a favourable opportunity of making amends, by a new expedition, for the miscarriages of the former. Accordingly he resolved to lay hold of it, and leaving Egypt, hastened into Syria, there to make the necessary preparations for a second invasion; but Cleopatra feigning that his absence had thrown her into a languishing distemper, and that she could not live without him, he was so a infatuated as to believe her, and giving over all thoughts of revenging his late losses, to drop the enterprize, and return to the embraces of his beloved queen^b. However, he sent such a body of Roman troops to the assistance of Artavasdes king of Media, as enabled him to gain a complete victory over Phrabates king of Parthia; but the ensuing year a war breaking out between Antony and Octavianus, the former not only recalled the troops he had sent to the assistance of Artavasdes, but also retained those which Artavasdes had sent him in their room; by which means the king of Media was intirely defeated in a second battle, and taken prisoner by Phrabates, who pursuing his victory, reduced all Media, and likewise Armenia, restoring to that throne Artaxias the son of Artabazes, who had been driven from it by Antony, as we have related in the history of Armenia.

b Phrabates, elated with this success, began to oppress his subjects in a most cruel and tyrannical manner; whereupon the Parthian nobility, conspiring against him, drove him from the throne, and placed on it in his room Tiridates, one of their own body; but the next year Phrabates returned into Parthia at the head of a numerous army, and having overcome his rival in a pitched battle, recovered his crown. Tiridates took refuge in Syria, where Octavianus found him after the death of Antony, and was warmly solicited by him to lend him his assistance against Phrabates. At the same time ambassadors arrived from Phrabates on the same errand. Octavianus received them both in a very friendly manner, without intending to help either, but rather to egg them on against each other with fair promises, and by that means to waste and weaken the power and strength of that formidable empire. With this view he gave Tiridates leave to continue in Syria, till he should be in a condition to make head against his rival, accepting from him a son of Phrabates, who had fallen into his hands. This son he carried with him to Rome, where he kept him as a hostage^c. Not long after, Tiridates returned into Parthia, and drove out Phrabates; but was soon driven out again by him in his turn. Phrabates was assisted by the Scythians, who not only reinstated him in his kingdom, but supported him in it with a mighty army. Hereupon Tiridates, with the leading men of his party, fled to Rome, to implore the assistance and protection of Augustus, promising to hold the kingdom of him, provided he was restored to it by his means. Phrabates hearing he had fled to Rome, dispatched ambassadors thither after him, to obviate his designs, and to demand of Augustus the delivery of his rebellious subjects, and the release of his son, whom Tiridates had put into his hands. Augustus received Tiridates, as well as the ambassadors, with particular marks of esteem; but answered, that he would not deliver Tiridates into the hands of Phrabates, nor lend either of them assistance against the other. However, to gratify both in something, he gave Tiridates leave to continue at Rome, ordering him, out of the public treasury, a maintenance suitable to his rank; and sent back to Phrabates his son, on his promising to restore the captives and standards that had been taken from Crassus and Antony. This Phrabates then promised to do, but could not prevail upon himself to perform, till the coming of Augustus into Syria, which happened three years after; when dreading a foreign war, as he was greatly hated by his subjects on account of his cruelty, he sent ambassadors to him, to conclude an alliance with the people of Rome; and on this occasion it was that he sent back all the captives and ensigns, which the Parthians had taken in their wars with Crassus and Antony. At the same time he agreed to such terms of peace as Augustus thought fit to propose, giving four of his sons, with their wives and children, as hostages for the performance of them^d. The ensigns Augustus caused to be hung up in a temple, which he built, and consecrated to Mars twice the revenger, and appointed Circensian sports to be annually solemnized in memory of his victory at Philippi, (for, before that battle, he had vowed the temple to Mars) and of his recovering the Roman ensigns from the Parthians^e. Justin observes here^f, that Augustus did more by the greatness of his name, than any other could have done by a long and expensive war; but Tacitus^g tells us, that Phrabates was induced to comply with the demands of Augustus, not for fear of him, but because he distrusted his own subjects. Strabo^h, and *Josephus*ⁱ, agreeing with Tacitus, relate the matter in the following manner: A very beautiful Italian woman, by name Thermusa, having been formerly sent by Augustus to Pbrabates as a present, the king kept her at first as his concubine; but afterwards, on her bringing him a son, married her, and declared her queen. In this station she gained an absolute ascendant over him, which she made use of to secure the succession to her son. With this view she proposed to Pbrabates the delivering up of his other sons, who were four in all, to the Romans; and he readily came into the proposal, as not thinking himself safe against his discontented subjects, so long as there were any of the royal race of Arfaces of an age fit to govern. On this consideration, when hostages were demanded by Augustus, for securing the terms of their agreement, he delivered up to him his four sons, Saraspades, Cerospades, Pbrabates, and Vonones, two of their wives, and four of their sons. These were all carried to Rome, where they remained many years; but Thermusa's son, by name Pbraatices, was bred up at home, and appointed to succeed his father. The Parthians were so superstitiously addicted to the family of Arfaces, that Pbrabates well knew they would bear with him, notwithstanding their hatred to him, as long as they had no other of the same race to set up in his room; and therefore, not for fear of Augustus, but for his own safety, readily yielded up to him his four sons, who being of an age to govern, gave him no small jealousy. But what he thus projected for his safety, proved at last his ruin; for as soon as Pbraatices was of age, Thermusa, impatient to see him on the throne, poisoned her husband, to make room for him the sooner. But he was scarce seated on the throne, when the Parthians, disdaining to be governed by so wicked a parricide, rose up in arms, and drove him from it into banishment, where he perished some years after. In his room they placed one Orodes, who was of the royal family of Arfaces, but generally hated on account of his cruel and savage temper. However, they preferred him to the sons of Pbraatices, who, by their father, were descended from the Italian concubine Thermusa; but not being able to bear his unheard-of cruelties, they killed him soon after at a banquet. Upon his death they dispatched ambassadors to Rome, intreating Augustus to send one of the sons of Pbrabates to rule over them. The emperor readily granted them Vonones, who was received at first with great demonstrations of joy; but as he betrayed a great inclination to the Romans, and affected their dress and manners, the Parthians grew soon weary of their new king; and disdaining to obey, as they expressed it, a Roman slave, had recourse to Artabanus king of Media, who was likewise of the race of Arfaces, inviting him to take possession of the crown of Parthia. Artabanus willingly complied with their request; but being met on the frontiers by Vonones, was by him defeated, tho' he had a considerable army with him, and obliged to fly back into Media, where he raised new forces, and in a second engagement obtained a complete victory over Vonones, who took shelter in Armenia, where he was kindly received, and entertained by some of the chief lords of that country. But Artabanus threatening to invade Armenia, Vonones thought fit to retire from thence, after having solicited in vain the assistance of Tiberius, by a solemn embassy sent to Rome for that purpose. From Armenia the unhappy prince withdrew into Syria, and there delivered himself up to Creticus Silanus governor of that province, who, in regard he had been brought up at Rome, suffered him to live at Antioch, with the pomp and title of a king. He was afterwards removed by Germanicus from Antioch to Pompeiopolis in Cilicia, whence he made his escape, tho' kept under a strict guard; but being soon after retaken, he was killed by one Remmius a Roman soldier. Germanicus had removed him from Antioch to Pompeiopolis at the request of Artabanus, and also because he was in high favour with Cneius Piso, to whose wife Plancia he made rich presents, having brought with him into Syria immense treasures.

Artabanus having now no competitor to contend with, began to treat his subjects with great cruelty; whereupon some Parthian lords, among whom were Sinnaces, a man of great power and credit, and an eunuch named Abdus, entering into a plot against him, sent privately to Rome for Pbrabates, the son of king Pbrabates, who, as we have related above, had been delivered by his father to Augustus as a hostage. The deputies represented, that the Parthians were ready to revolt; that they wanted only a leader; that a descendant of Arfaces, supported by Rome, and seen on the

- a banks of the Euphrates, would occasion an immediate and general insurrection. Tiberius, who had succeeded Augustus, was glad of so favourable an opportunity of raising new disturbances in Parthia; for Artabanus, elated with the success that had attended him in his wars with the neighbouring nations, had not only seized on Armenia, and appointed his eldest son Arfaces king of that country, but sent a proud message to the governor of Syria, demanding the treasures which Vonones had left there and in Cilicia, and claiming all the countries which had been possessed by Cyrus, and since by Alexander. Tiberius therefore, overjoyed at the thoughts of humbling the haughty Parthian, immediately dispatched Phrabates to recover his father's kingdom; but that prince arriving in Syria, and there disusing the Roman way of living, to which he had been many years accustomed, and resuming the Parthian customs, was seized, on that sudden change, with a violent distemper, which put an end to his life. At the same time the plot was discovered, and the chief promoters of it either privately put to death, for Artabanus was afraid to use open violence, or so narrowly watched, that they could not meet, without being observed, to consult together about the necessary measures. However, Tiberius did not abandon the enterprise; but putting Tiridates, another prince of the royal family of Parthia, in the room of Phrabates, wrote to Mitbridates Iberus, requesting him to invade Armenia with his brother Pharasmanes king of Iberia, and by that means to draw Artabanus out of his own kingdom. Mitbridates, pursuant to the directions of Tiberius, entered Armenia, at the head of a numerous army of Iberians, and made himself master of Artaxata, the metropolis of that kingdom. At the same time his brother Pharasmanes, having recourse to treachery, suborned some of the servants of Arfaces to murder him. Artabanus no sooner heard of the invasion of Armenia, and the death of his son, but he dispatched his other son Orodes, with a mighty army, against the enemy, and at the same time sent to hire auxiliaries in Sarmatia and the neighbouring countries. Pharasmanes, on the other hand, having joined the Albanian forces to his own, and received great supplies from Sarmatia, marched to the assistance of his brother, and meeting with Orodes, offered him battle; which he declining, Pharasmanes besieged him in his camp, and reduced him to such straits, that he was obliged at last to put all to the issue of an engagement, which proved very bloody, the Parthians behaving with their usual bravery. The victory was long doubtful; but in the end Pharasmanes having attacked and wounded Orodes, and a report being thereon spread through the Parthian army that he was killed, the Parthians retired in disorder, and left Pharasmanes master of the field. This victory was attended with the conquest of Armenia, which Pharasmanes over-ran without opposition, the Parthians flying every-where before him. In the mean time Artabanus, having raised another army, marched in person against the united forces of Mitbridates and Pharasmanes; but was attended with no better success than his son Orodes, his army being intirely defeated, and himself obliged to abandon his kingdom, and take refuge among the Carmanians and Hyrceanians.

- UPON the retreat of Artabanus, Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria, advanced with his legions to the banks of the Euphrates; and having crossed that river on a bridge of boats, caused Tiridates, whom he had brought with him, to be proclaimed king of Parthia. The new king was immediately joined by a great many Parthian lords, among whom were Ornospades, Sinnaces, and Abdageses. Ornospades brought with him a strong body of horse, and Abdageses all the ensigns of royalty, which had been committed to his care. When Vitellius found the Parthians inclined to receive Tiridates, thinking it enough to have countenanced them, he repassed the Euphrates with his legions, and retired into Syria. He was no sooner gone, than Phrabates and Hiero, two men of great power and authority among the Parthians, out of envy to Abdageses, who governed the new king and his whole court, returned to their old allegiance, and recalled Artabanus, who was, at his first appearing, joined by all those who hated Abdageses. The Scythians likewise, the Dabæ, and the Sacæ, declared in his favour, and sent him powerful supplies; so that he was soon in a condition to take the field; which he did accordingly, at the head of a very numerous and well-disciplined army. Tiridates, who had spent his whole time in besieging a fortress, whither Artabanus had conveyed his treasures and concubines, did not think it advisable to put the whole to the issue of a battle; and therefore retired into

Mesopotamia, with a design to recruit his army in the country of the Elymeans and Armenians, and then try the fortune of a battle; but in his march he was abandoned by the greatest part of his troops, who either retired home, or fled to Artabanus; infomuch that not thinking himself any longer safe within the Parthian dominions, he retired into Syria, leaving his competitor in quiet possession of the crown^a. But it was not long ere new disturbances obliged Artabanus to quit the kingdom a second time. The nobility, not being able to bear his cruelties and haughty behaviour, conspired anew against him, and taking up arms, obliged him to shelter himself in the dominions of Izates king of the Adiabeniens, who not only received and entertained him in a manner suitable to his rank, but, by his kind offices, prevailed upon the Parthian nobility to receive him again, after he had, by a solemn oath, promised to forgive all those who had taken up arms against him. The Parthians had placed one Cinnamus on the throne in his room, who was by the same Izates persuaded to resign of his own accord, the regal power and authority to the banished prince. Artabanus, being thus restored to his kingdom by the mediation of Izates, in acknowledgment of the favours he had received at his hands, bestowed on him the rich country of Nisibis, and allowed him to wear a strait tiara, and to lie in a golden bed; which were privileges peculiar to the kings of Parthia^b. From this time he governed with great equity and moderation, and, after a reign of thirty years, died greatly lamented by all his subjects, leaving behind him seven sons, viz. Darius, Bardanes, Gotarzes, Orodes, Volgeses, Pacorus, and Tiridates. By his last will he appointed Bardanes to succeed him, who, forgetful of the obligations his family owed to Izates, made war upon him, for no other reason, but because he refused to join him against the Romans. His monstrous ingratitude towards a prince who had so well deserved of the Parthian nation, was highly resented by the chief lords of his kingdom, who taking up arms against him, killed him, and raised his brother Gotarzes to the throne^c. This is the account which Josephus gives us, in a few words, of the accession to the crown, and reigns of Bardanes and Gotarzes; but Tacitus, disagreeing with that writer, relates the matter in a quite different manner^d. According to him, Gotarzes and Bardanes were not the sons, but the brothers of Artabanus, who was succeeded by Gotarzes, a most cruel prince, and therefore so hated by his subjects, that they called Bardanes to the throne. Bardanes, as he was a man of great resolution and activity, marched in two days three thousand furlongs, and arriving at Ctesiphon, surprized and drove Gotarzes from the throne. With the same expedition he over-ran the chief provinces of the Parthian empire, and was every-where received with loud acclamations. Seleucia was the only city that refused to submit to him, which he closely besieged; but while he was wasting his time before that place, Gotarzes unexpectedly arrived at the head of a numerous army of Dabans and Hyrceanians, which obliged Bardanes to raise the siege, and retire to the plains of Bactria, where he encamped, with a design to venture a battle in the open fields. Gotarzes followed him; but while the two armies were ready to engage, Gotarzes received private intelligence of a conspiracy formed by the chief men of the kingdom against himself, and also his brother, to whom he immediately imparted it. Hereupon the two competitors had an interview, in which, tho' at first distrustful each other, they were at last thoroughly reconciled, both of them swearing on the altars not to molest one another, but to turn their arms against their common enemies; nay, Gotarzes, judging Bardanes more worthy of the crown than himself, an instance of equity and moderation seldom to be met with, resigned it to him; and, in order to remove all ground of jealousy, retired into the most remote parts of Hyrkania. Bardanes, leaving Bactria, returned to the siege of Seleucia, which voluntarily submitted to him, after he had attempted in vain to reduce it by force. Being now sole master of the whole Parthian empire, he formed a design of recovering Armenia; but Vilius Marfus, or, as we read in Josephus, Cassius Longinus, governor of Syria, threatening him with war, in case he made any attempts upon that kingdom, he thought it adviseable to drop the enterprize^e.

In the mean time Gotarzes, repenting his resignation, and being recalled by the nobility, who, in time of peace, were ever plotting changes in the government, raised new forces, and advanced at the head of a powerful army as far as the river Charinda, where he was met, and intirely defeated by Bardanes, who, elated with

There he was obliged to halt, the Parthians, tho' victorious, refusing to follow him into countries so remote from their own. Having therefore erected monuments with pompous inscriptions, importing, that none of the Arfacidæ, before him, had exacted tributes from those nations, he returned home, loaded with the spoils of the countries he had conquered. The glory he acquired in this expedition, inspired him with such pride, that he became quite insupportable to his subjects, especially to the nobility, who thereupon conspiring against him, killed him at a hunting match, when he was not attended, as usual, by his guards, as not apprehending any treachery or danger. He was,
- b according to Tacitus, a prince endued with excellent qualities, and would have been one of the greatest kings that ever reigned in Parthia, had he studied to be as much beloved by his subjects, as he was feared by his enemies &c.

Bardanes murdered.

UPON the death of Bardanes, new disputes arose among the nobility about the electing a king to succeed him, some declaring for Gotarzes, and others for Meberdates, the grandson of Phrabates, by whom he had been delivered to the Romans as a hostage. At last the party of Gotarzes prevailed, who was no sooner placed on the throne, than he began to use all sorts of cruelty on his subjects, especially on those who had adhered to Meberdates; whereupon they had private recourse to the emperor Claudius, soliciting him to send them Meberdates, since they could no longer bear with Gotarzes, whose cruelties had rendered him odious to all his subjects.

Gotarzes.

Meberdates set up against him by the Parthian nobility, and supported by the emperor Claudius.

- c Claudius readily complied with their request, and having exhorted Meberdates to govern with equity and moderation, blessings, said he, unknown to barbarians, and thence the more likely to please them, he dismissed him, together with the ambassadors; and at the same time wrote to Caius Cassius, governor of Syria, injoining him to attend the young prince to the banks of the Euphrates. As soon as Meberdates arrived in Syria, Cassius, agreeable to his instructions, drew together his legions, and marched with him to Zeugma, where the river was then fordable. There he encamped, and being joined by Abgarus king of Edeffa, and such of the Parthian chiefs as privately favoured Meberdates, he exhorted, in their presence, the new king to press on the execution of his design without delay, lest the Parthians should in the mean time change their mind, as it had often happened, and cooling in their affections to him, retire home, or join his competitor. This advice, the best that could be given him, was frustrated by the treachery of Abgarus, who had, in appearance, espoused the interest of Meberdates, but was in reality intirely attached to Gotarzes; and therefore detained the young king many days at Edeffa, tho' Carrhanes, a leading man among the Parthians, and a sincere friend to Meberdates, pressed him, by frequent messages, to advance with all possible expedition, and assured him, that if he only shewed himself, he would be joined by great multitudes; but Meberdates, neglecting the advice of his friends, followed that only of the treacherous Abgarus,

- e who prevailed upon him to march a great way about, and instead of entering Mesopotamia, tho' he was on the borders of that country, to pass through Armenia, which, as winter was already begun, was in great part covered with snow. As they came down into the champaign country, wearied with the deep snow and steep mountains, Carrhanes joined them with his forces. Thence they crossed the Tigris, passed thro' the country of the Adiabeniens, and advancing to the city of Ninos, the ancient seat of the kings of Assyria, made themselves matters of that place, as they did likewise of the strong castle of Arbela, so famous in history, on account of the signal victory gained there by Alexander over Darius. In the mean time Gotarzes, having offered sacrifices on mount Sambulos to the gods of the place, especially to Hercules, came and encamped in the plain, with the river Carma between him and the enemy. Meberdates endeavoured, by daily insults and haughty messages, to draw him to a battle; but he declined it, soliciting in the mean time, by his emissaries, the friends of Meberdates to abandon and betray him: and herein he was attended with all the success he could have wished for; for first Izates king of the Adiabeniens, and afterwards Abgarus king of the Edeffans, went over to him, with all the forces under their command. Meberdates seeing himself thus forsaken by his allies, and mistrusting those who remained, resolved, as his only recourse, to commit the issue to chance, and risque a battle, which Gotarzes no longer avoided, his army being now as much strengthened as his enemy's was weakened. Both parties engaged with the utmost fury, and the victory continued doubtful, till Carrhanes having put to flight one of the enemy's wings, and pursuing it too far, was surrounded by a body of reserve, which prevented him from returning to the assistance of Meherdates; who thereupon being intirely defeated, and so hemmed in, that he could not make his escape, surrendered himself to one Parrhaces, a dependent of his father's, by whom he was immediately loaded with fetters, and delivered up to the conqueror. Gotarzes looking upon him not as one of the race of Arfaces, but as a Roman and foreigner, ordered his ears to be cut off, in contempt of the Romans, but granted him his life to shew his clemency ^b.

NOT long after Gotarzes died, and was succeeded by Vonones, at that time governor of Media, whose reign was short and inglorious; for he did nothing which writers have thought worth transmitting to posterity. Upon the death of Vonones, the crown of Parthia devolved upon Vologeses the son of Gotarzes, according to Josephus, of Vonones, according to Tacitus. In the very beginning of his reign he invaded Armenia with a powerful army, and having, without opposition, made himself master of Artaxata and Tigranocerta, the two chief cities of that kingdom, he obliged Rhadamistus the Iberian, who had usurped the crown, to save himself in Iberia. Upon his retreat, Vologeses declared his brother Tiridates king of Armenia, having before appointed his other brother, by name Pacorus, king of Media; for Tiridates and Pacorus had yielded the crown of Parthia to him, tho' born of a Greek concubine; whence he thought it incumbent upon him to procure a crown for those, who had so generously parted with one for his sake. But while he was in Armenia, a plague breaking out in his army, occasioned chiefly by want of provisions, he was forced to relinquish his conquests, and retire into his own dominions. Hereupon Domitius Corbulo entering Armenia, drove out Tiridates, with the few Parthian forces that had continued with him, and placed on that throne Tigranes the Cappadocian, as we have related in the history of Armenia. This affront Vologeses could not brook, and therefore having publickly, and with great solemnity, crowned Tiridates king of Armenia, he dispatched Moneses, one of his generals, with a strong body of chosen horse and Adiabeanian auxiliaries, injoining him to drive out Tigranes, and recover Armenia, which had been long held by, and therefore belonged to the princes of the family of Arfaces. As for himself, ^d he dropped his expedition against the Hyrceanians, who had lately revolted; and having drawn together a mighty army, began to make the necessary preparations for a descent on the Roman provinces. Corbulo, whom Nero had charged with the defence of Armenia, was no sooner acquainted with the measures taken by Vologeses, than he sent two legions to the assistance of Tigranes, under the command of Verulanus Severus and Vettius Bolanus, with private injunctions to act rather with caution than eagerness and dispatch; for he was more desirous, as Tacitus observes, of keeping a war on foot, than bringing it to a speedy conclusion; besides, he had wrote to Nero, that another general was necessary to defend Armenia, since Syria was threatened with a terrible storm from Vologeses. In the mean time he posted the remaining legions along the banks of the Euphrates, and having raised new forces in the province, placed guards at all the passes, and erected forts over the several fountains, to prevent the enemy from having any water in that dry and sandy country.

WHILE Corbulo was thus busied in securing Syria, Moneses advanced by long marches towards Armenia, hoping to surprize Tigranes: but, with all his expedition, he found that prince well guarded against him; for he had furnished the strong city of Tigranocerta with all manner of provisions and warlike stores, and retired into it with all his forces. Moneses, after having attempted in vain to reduce it, withdrew, and began to lay waste the country. Hereupon Corbulo, who was unwilling to engage in a war with the Parthians, lest he should lose the reputation he had hitherto gained, ^f sent ambassadors to Vologeses, to expostulate with him for falling upon a Roman province, for besieging a king who was a friend and ally of the Roman people, and for ravaging a country which Rome had taken under her protection. At the same time he gave him to understand, that if he did not forthwith abandon the siege of Tigranocerta, he would look upon it as an infraction of the treaties subsisting between the Parthians and Romans, and in his turn invade the Parthian territories. Vologeses, as he did not care to provoke Corbulo, who had acquired great fame by his military exploits, answered with great moderation, that he would send ambassadors to Rome,

- a to beg of Nero the kingdom of Armenia, and to renew the alliance made by his ancestors with the people of Rome. Agreeable to this answer he immediately dispatched messengers to Moneses, ordering him to raise the siege of Tigranocerta; and retired himself with all his forces into the heart of his dominions, to wait there for the return of the ambassadors he had sent to Rome. The emperor Nero received them in a very obliging manner, but refused to renew his ancient alliance with the Parthians, unless they renounced all pretensions to the crown of Armenia. This answer so incensed Vologeses, that he immediately drew again all his forces together, with a design to invade Syria; but finding the banks of the Euphrates strongly guarded by Corbulo, he turned all his efforts against Armenia; where he gained those advantages over Cesennius Petus, which we have related at length in the history of that kingdom. However, he consented at last, dreading the consequence of a war with the Romans, that his brother Tiridates should go in person to Rome, and there receive the crown of Armenia as a gift from Nero; which he did accordingly. By this means the ancient alliance between the two empires was renewed, and the affairs of the east settled in peace¹. From this time no further mention is made of Vologeses, till the beginning of the reign of Vespasian, to whom he sent ambassadors, offering to assist him with forty thousand Parthian horse². Vespasian, as he was already settled on the throne, did not accept of the succours offered him; but renewing all the ancient treaties with the Parthians, dismissed the ambassadors, loaded with presents, and maintained, during the reign of Vologeses, a good understanding with the Parthian nation. Vologeses being now disengaged from all foreign and domestic wars, applied himself to the building of a city, which, from his own name, he called Vologesocerta, or, the city of Vologeses; but was prevented by death from completing the work he had begun.

- He was succeeded by his son Artabanus III. who falling out with Vespasian, espoused the cause of the counterfeit Nero, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the history of Rome. However, the emperor did not think it advisable to resent the affront, for fear of kindling a new war in the east, the kingdom of Parthia being at that time in a very flourishing condition, and the Roman provinces greatly weakened by a late irruption of the Alani, a barbarous people of Scythia, inhabiting the countries bordering on the river Tanais and the lake Meotis. Artabanus had formed a design of invading Armenia; but died before he could put it in execution³. Upon his death, his son Pacorus II. was raised to the throne; but all we know of him is, that he entered into an alliance with Decebalus king of the Daci, and maintained, during the whole time of his reign, which is said to have been very long, a strict friendship with the *Romans*⁴. He was succeeded by his brother Cosdroes, who invading Armenia, drove out Exadares, who had been appointed king of that country by the emperor Trajan, and in his room placed his eldest son Partabamafiris on the throne. As this was an open infraction of the treaties subsisting between the two empires, Trajan hastened into the east, with a design to humble the Parthians, who relying on their victories formerly gained over the Romans, were daily raising new disturbances in Syria and Armenia, and making incursions into the Roman provinces bordering on their dominions. His arrival in Armenia was so sudden and unexpected, that he reduced the whole country almost without opposition, and took Partabamafiris himself prisoner. Animated with these successes, he entered Mesopotamia; and having there besieged and taken the strong city of Nisibis, after many skirmishes and encounters, he made himself master of that opulent country, never before subject to Rome. From Mesopotamia, which he reduced to a Roman province, he returned, in the beginning of the winter, into Syria, whence he acquainted the senate with the success that had attended his arms against the Parthians, and was by them honoured with the surnames of Armenicus and *Particus*⁵.

- f EARLY in the spring he took the field again; but was warmly opposed by Cosdroes, whom he found encamped on the banks of the Euphrates, with a design to dispute his passage; which he did with such vigour, that the emperor, after having several times attempted to ford that river, and been always repulsed with great slaughter, was obliged to cause boats to be built on the neighbouring mountains, which he privately conveyed from thence on carriages to the water-side; and having in the night-time formed a bridge with them, he passed his army the next day, but not without great loss and danger, the Parthians harassing his men the whole time with incessant showers of arrows, which did great execution. Having gained the opposite bank, he advanced boldly into Assyria, the Parthians flying every-where before him, and made himself master of Arbela. Thence he pursued his march, subduing, with incredible rapidity, countries, where the Roman standards had never been displayed before. Babylonia, or the province of Babylon, voluntarily submitted to him. The city itself was, after a vigorous resistance, taken by storm; by which means he became master of all Chaldea and Assyria, the two richest provinces of the Parthian empire. From Babylon he marched to Ctesiphon, the metropolis of the Parthian monarchy, which he besieged, and at last reduced. But as to the particulars of these great conquests, we are quite in the dark, this expedition, however glorious to the Roman name, being rather hinted at, than described by the writers of those times. While Trajan was thus making war in the heart of the enemy's country, Cosdroes, having recruited his army, marched into Mesopotamia, with a design to recover that country, and cut off all communication between the Roman army and Syria. On his arrival in that province, the inhabitants flocked to him from all parts, and most of the cities, driving out the garisons left by Trajan, opened their gates to him. Hereupon the emperor detached Lucius and Maximus, two of his chief commanders, into Mesopotamia, to keep such cities in awe as had not revolted, and to open a communication with Syria. Maximus was met by Cosdroes, and having ventured a battle, his army was intirely defeated, and himself killed. But Lucius, being joined by Euricius and Clarius, two other commanders sent by Trajan with fresh supplies, gained considerable advantages over the enemy, and retook the cities of Nisibis and Seleucia, which had revolted. And now Trajan, seeing himself possessed of all the best and most fruitful provinces of the Parthian empire, but at the same time being well apprised that he could not, without a vast expence, maintain his conquests, nor keep in awe so fierce and warlike a people at such a distance from Italy, resolved to set over them a king of his own choosing, who should hold the crown of him and his successors, and acknowledge them as his lords and sovereigns. With this view he repaired to Ctesiphon, and having there assembled the chief men of the nation, he crowned one of the royal family, by name Parthaspates, king of Parthia, obliging all who were present to pay him their allegiance. He chose Parthaspates, because that prince had joined him at his first entering the Parthian dominions, conducted him with great fidelity, and shewn on all occasions an extraordinary attachment to the Romans. Thus the Parthians were at last subdued, and their kingdom made tributary to Rome. But they did not long continue in this state of subjection; for they no sooner heard of Trajan's death, which happened soon after, than taking up arms, they drove Parthaspates from the throne, and recalling Cosdroes, who had retired into the country of the Hyrcanians, openly revolted from Rome. Adrian, who was then commander in chief of all the forces in the east, and soon after acknowledged emperor by the army, did not care, tho' he was at that time in Syria with a very numerous army, to engage in a new war with the Parthians; but contented himself with preserving the ancient limits of the empire, without any ambitious prospects of farther conquests: therefore, in the beginning of his reign, he abandoned those provinces beyond the Euphrates, which Trajan had conquered, withdrew the Roman garisons from Mesopotamia, and, for the greater safety of other places, made the Euphrates the boundary of and barrier in those parts, posting his legions along the banks of that river. Some writers are of opinion, that he did this out of a secret envy to his uncle Trajan's glory and reputation; but others commend it as a very politic and prudent action, the maintaining of those distant conquests being attended with many inconveniencies, and no advantages to the empire. Before he left Antioch to return to Rome, in order to keep the Parthians quiet, he dismissed their prisoners without ransom, and, among the rest, the daughter of Cosdroes, who had been taken by Trajan. Cosdroes, in return for these favours, never offered to disturb the Romans in the possession of the provinces bordering on his dominions; but shewed himself always ready to assist them as his best friends and allies.

Vologeses II.

Cosdroes died after a long reign, and was succeeded by his eldest son Vologeses; in whose reign the Alani breaking into Media, then subject to the Parthians, committed there great devastations; but were prevailed upon, with rich presents sent them by

- ^a Vologeses, to abandon that kingdom, and return home. Upon their retreat, Vologeses having no enemy to contend with at home, fell unexpectedly upon Armenia, surprized the legions there, and having cut them in pieces all to a man, entered Syria, defeated with great slaughter Attilius Cornelianus governor of that province, and advanced; without opposition, to the neighbourhood of Antioch, putting every-where the Romans, and those who favoured them, to the sword. Hereupon the emperor Verus; by the advice of his colleague Antoninus, surnamed the Philosopher, leaving Rome; hastened into Syria, and having driven the Parthians out of that province, ordered Statius Priscus to invade Armenia, and Cassius, with Martius Verus, to enter the Parthian territories, and carry the war into the enemy's country. Priscus made himself master of Artaxata, and in one campaign drove the Parthians, tho' not without great loss on his side, quite out of Armenia. Cassius, on the other hand, having in several encounters defeated Vologeses, tho' he had an army of four hundred thousand men under his command, reduced, in four years time, all those provinces which had formerly submitted to Trajan, took Seleucia, burnt and plundered the famous cities of Babylon and Ctesiphon, with the stately palaces of the Parthian monarchs, and struck terror into the most remote provinces of that great empire. On his return, he lost above half the number of his forces by sickness and famine; so that after all, the Romans, as Spartianus observes, had no great reason to brag of their victories and conquests. However, Antoninus Verus, who had never stirred, during the whole time of the war, from Antioch and Daphne, took upon him the lofty titles of Parthicus and Armenicus, as if he had justly acquired them in the midst of his pleasures and debaucheries ^p. We are told, that some of Cassius's soldiers, in pillaging the temple of Apollo at Babylon, found under ground a small golden coffer, which, upon their opening it, cast forth such pestilential vapours, as infected all those who were present, and by their means the rest of the army. As Verus, on his return to Italy, took Cassius's forces along with him, he carried the plague into all the provinces thro' which he passed, and spread the infection through Italy, whence it was communicated to the most remote parts of the empire, and every-where attended with great mortality. After the revolt and death of Cassius, which we shall have occasion to speak of
- ^d in the history of the Roman emperors, Antoninus the Philosopher repaired into Syria, to settle the affairs of that province, and was, on his arrival, met by ambassadors from Vologeses, who having recovered most of the provinces subdued by Cassius, and being unwilling either to part with them, or engage in a new war, solicited the emperor to confirm him in the possession of them, promising to hold them of him, and to acknowledge the sovereignty of Rome. To these terms Antoninus readily agreed, and a peace was accordingly concluded between the two empires, which Vologeses did not long enjoy, being soon after carried off by a distemper, and not murdered by his own subjects, as we read in Constantinus Manasses, who calls him Belegeses.

- UPON his death Vologeses III. the son of his brother Sanatruces, and grandson of Vologeses III.
- ^c Cosdroes, was raised to the throne. He sided with Niger against the emperor Severus, who thereupon, having settled matters at home, marched with all his forces against him, and advancing to the city of Ctesiphon, whither he had retired, laid close siege to that metropolis. Vologeses made a most gallant defence; but the city, after a long siege, and much bloodshed on both sides, was at length taken by assault. The king's treasures, with his wives and children, fell into the emperor's hands; but Vologeses himself had the good luck to make his escape, which was a great disappointment to Severus, who immediately dispatched an express to acquaint the senate with the success that had attended him in his expedition against the only nation that was then formidable to Rome. He sent likewise a particular description of the countries, cities, rivers and mountains he had passed, and of the battles he had fought, all drawn and painted upon tables; for which the surnames of Parthicus, Arabicus and Adiabanicus were decreed him. But he had no sooner crossed the Euphrates, than Vologeses recovered all the provinces, except Mesopotamia, which he had reduced. These expeditions were very chargeable to the Romans, and cost them much blood, without their reaping any advantages from them; for as they had not sufficient forces to keep in awe the provinces they had subdued, the inhabitants, greatly attached to the family of Arjaces, never failed to return to their ancient obedience as soon as the Roman armies were withdrawn. Vologeses was soon after engaged in a war still more troublesome and destructive with his brother Artabanus, who, encouraged by some of the discontented nobles, attempted to rob him of the crown, and place it on his own head. Volageses gained several victories over his brother and rebellious subjects; but died before he could restore the empire to its former tranquillity.

Artabanus IV. Artabanus, who had a numerous army at his devotion, did not meet with any opposition in seizing the throne vacant by the death of his brother, tho' Tiridates had a better title to it, as being his elder brother. He had scarce settled the affairs of his kingdom, when the emperor Caracalla, desirous to signalize himself, as several of his predecessors had done, by some memorable exploit against the Parthians, sent a solemn embassy to him, desiring his daughter in marriage. Artabanus, overjoyed at this proposal, which, he thought, would be attended with a lasting peace between the two empires, received the ambassadors with all possible marks of honour, and readily complied with their request. Soon after Caracalla sent a second embassy, to acquaint the king, that he was coming to solemnize the nuptials: whereupon Artabanus went to meet him, attended with the flower of the nobility, and his best troops, all unarmed, and in most pompous habits; but this peaceable train no sooner approached the Roman army, than the soldiers, on a signal given them, falling upon the king's retinue, made a most terrible slaughter of the unarmed multitude, Artabanus himself escaping with great difficulty. The treacherous Caracalla, having gained by this exploit great booty, and, as he thought, no less glory, wrote a long and boasting letter to the senate, assuming the title of Parthicus for this piece of treachery, as he had before that of Germanicus, for murdering in like manner some of the German nobility. Artabanus, resolving to make the Romans pay dear for their inhuman and barbarous treachery, raised the most numerous army that had ever been on foot in Parthia, crossed the Euphrates, and entered Syria, putting all to fire and sword; but Caracalla being murdered before this invasion, Macrinus, who had succeeded him, met the Parthians at the head of a mighty army, composed of many legions, and all the auxiliaries of the states of Asia. The two armies no sooner came in sight of each other, but they engaged with the utmost fury. The battle continued two days, both Romans and Parthians fighting so obstinately, that night only parted them, without any apparent advantage on either side, tho' both retired, when night had put an end to the contest, crying, Victory, victory. The field of battle was covered all over with dead bodies, there being already above forty thousand killed, including both Romans and Parthians; nevertheless Artabanus was heard to say, that the battle was only begun, and that he would continue it till either the Parthians or Romans were all to a man cut in pieces. But Macrinus, being well apprised, that the king came highly enraged against Caracalla in particular, and dreading the consequences which would attend the destruction of his army, sent a herald to Artabanus, acquainting him with the death of Caracalla, and proposing an alliance between the two empires. The king, understanding that his great enemy was dead, readily embraced the proposals of peace and amity, upon condition that all the prisoners, who had been taken by the treachery of Caracalla, should be immediately restored, and a large sum of money paid him to defray the expences of the war. These articles being performed without delay or hesitation, Artabanus returned into Parthia, and Macrinus to Antioch.

The Persians revolt.

As Artabanus lost on this occasion the flower of his army, Artaxerxes, a Persian of a mean descent, but of great courage and experience in war, revolting from the Parthians, prevailed upon his countrymen to join him, and attempt the recovery of the sovereign power, which, he said, they had been unjustly deprived of, first by the Macedonians, and afterwards by the Parthians, formerly their vassals. Artabanus, upon the news of this revolt, marched with the whole strength of his kingdom to suppress it; but being met by Artaxerxes, at the head of a no less powerful army, a bloody battle ensued, which is said to have lasted three days. At length the Parthians, tho' they behaved with the utmost bravery, and fought like men in despair, were forced to yield to the Persians, who were commanded by a more experienced leader. Most of their troops were cut off in the flight, and the king himself taken prisoner, and soon after put to death by Artaxerxes's orders. The Parthians, having lost in this fatal engagement both their king and their army, were forced to submit to the conqueror, and become vassals to a nation, which had been subject to them for

- a the space of four hundred and seventy-five years. Thus was this gallant and warlike nation subdued at last, and the empire once more transferred to the Persians; whose kings reigns, till they were in their turn reduced by the Arabs, will be the subject of the following section. However, the royal family of Arfaces did not end in Artabanus, but continued to reign in Armenia, till the time of the emperor Justinian, holding that kingdom of the Persian monarchs, to whom the Arfacide of Armenia were tributaries. Among these we find the following princes mentioned in history, Arfaces, Teridates, Artabazdes, Teridates II. Arfaces II. Paras, Tigranes, and Arfaces III. all descended from Arfaces, brother to Artabanus IV. the last king of Parthia. But of Armenia, and the princes who reigned there after that country became subject to the
- b Persians, we shall have occasion to speak in the next section.

The history of the Persians, from their recovering the empire from the Parthians, to their being subdued by the Arabs.

According to the Greek and Latin authors.

- c THE reader hath before seen, after what manner, and how long, the Persians were subject to the Parthian princes. We are here to speak of their achievements after they had again rendered themselves independent; and not only so, but lords also of many spacious provinces, and the first nation in the east. As we have no regular history of Persia by any Greek or Latin writer, what we offer to the reader in this section, is collected as carefully as might be, from such as have occasionally mentioned the Persian affairs. These passages we have digested into their natural order; and, if there be any omissions, they will be supplied in the next article, wherein we shall treat of the same period from the Oriental historians (A).

(A) There is no branch of the Universal History which more clearly evinces the general usefulness of this work, or the peculiar symmetry of its parts, than this before us. All the general histories that have been published in our own, or in other modern languages, are strangely deficient in this article. We have either a loose, unsatisfactory account of the passing of the empire of the east from the Parthians to the Persians, and from them to the Arabs; or we have such a chronological table of their kings, as that inserted in our text, with a few remarks thereon from Scaliger's chronicon, or some other collection; and so we are hurried to another subject. It must be owned, that there are some particular relations which promise fairer, and perform more than is either expected or done by the compilers of general histories; but then we can very truly affirm, that even these fall very far short of the following account. The learned (1) Bizarus, whose history of the Persian affairs is deservedly esteemed the best extant, takes all that he hath relating to this period from a very few Latin and Greek authors; so that, for very want of materials, he is forced to draw in the Roman affairs, and other matters still more so; nay, he once digressed so far as to mention William the Conqueror, and compliment Queen Elizabeth (2). One might say much more as to other compendiums of Persian history (3); but we desire not to prejudice the works of others, or to give any more than a fair account of our own.

We have divided the history of this period into two parts. The first is composed of such materials as the Latin and Greek writers furnish, particularly that noble collection which goes under the name of the Byzantine historians, whence we have taken ten times as much as hath appeared in any modern language, and, by assembling a multitude of divided passages, have presented the public with something that looks like a connected history. Whereas Bizarus found himself so destitute of matter, that, in his history of the Persian affairs, he makes the reigns of the Roman emperors his rule, and refers the series of Persian monarchs to a table. The second part is truly taken from Oriental writers; but more especially from Mirkhond; and what is related therein is so necessary a supplement to what the first part contained, that, without it, there would not only remained a visible imperfection, but, in many places, it would have been unintelligible; because the Greek writers, out of a perverse humour, wilfully misrepresent the manners, customs, and literature of the Oriental nations. The comparison therefore of these distinct histories will illustrate each of them, and enable the intelligent reader perfectly to comprehend both; whereby this wide chasm will be in some measure filled up, and this period of Persian history no longer remain, as it hitherto hath done, under an impenetrable obscurity.

Artaxares.
Year of Chriſt

Artaxares, or, as he is sometimes called, Artaxerxes, the restorer of the Persian kingdom, was not only a private person, but of spurious birth, as we are informed by Agathias (B). His mother was married to one Pabecus or Pabec, who was either a tanner or a shoemaker, but withal a person well skilled in judiciary astrology. It happened, that one Safanus; or Sasan, a military officer, travelling through the country of the Caduceans, took up his lodging in the house of this Pabec, tho' it was a very mean one. Pabec, by his art, perceiving, that a person begotten by this stranger, would become the head of a most potent family, and also arrive at regal honours, he began to fret within himself, because he had neither sister, daughter, nor cousin in the house. At length his ambition getting the better of his sense of shame, he caused his wife to go to bed to Sasan, who begat on her Artaxares. When afterwards Artaxares came to be king, Pabec and Sasan each claimed him for a son; whereupon the story became public, and it was agreed, that he should be styled the son of Pabec of the seed of Sasan *. Artaxares from his youth addicted himself to a military life, and having attained to great skill, and no less reputation in the wars, he projected the delivery of his countrymen from the Partbian yoke. In pursuance of this design, he wrought them to a general revolt; and having in three battles routed, and in the last slain the Partbian monarch, he assumed the double diadem, and the pompous title of king of kings. He was, as all authors agree, a man of great abilities, and undaunted spirit, or, in other words, a person of great courage, and unbounded ambition ^b.

(B) As we have taken the foregoing table chiefly from Agathias, and as we have generally preferred his authority, where-ever he speaks decisively, it is necessary we should say something of the merit of this author. He was a native of Marina, and addicted himself to the study of the law; and as those who dedicated their time to the acquirement of that science, studied mostly in colleges, he came from thence to be called Scholasticus (4), which the learned Vossius will have to signify the same as advocatus (5). He was a poet and a historian; but it is in his last capacity only that we have to do with him. He was, it seems, so pleased with Procopius's memoirs of the Persic wars, that he resolved to continue them, which he did in the history we yet have, divided into five books. In the fourth of these he takes occasion to mention one Sergius, who was so well skilled in the Persian tongue, as to be on that account in great favour with Cosroes the first. This man make-

ing several journies into Persia, and having many opportunities of conversing with the learned of that nation, procured, by their favour, the perusal of the royal annals; from whence he made many extracts, which, at his earnest desire, he communicated to Agathias. These were, in that historian's opinion, of so great weight, that he preferred them to the memoirs of Procopius, differing from him to follow them; which shews, that he was thoroughly convinced of their authority. From these extracts he drew up a short, but very peripicuous and exact account of all the Persian monarchs, from Artaxares, who recovered the kingdom from the Partbians, to Cosroes, with whom himself was cotemporary (6). It is from this short account that we have taken the dates, and such other material circumstances, as, we thought, could not be had with the same probability of exactness from other historians, who wrote from later and less authentic memoirs.

- a HE was no sooner seated on the throne, than he formed a design of restoring the Persian empire to its ancient glory; and having caused the necessary preparations to be set on foot, he gave notice to the Roman governors of the provinces bordering on his dominions, that he conceived himself to have a just and unquestionable title, as the successor of Cyrus, to all the Lesser Asia, which he commanded them immediately to quit, as well as the provinces on the frontiers of the ancient Partbian kingdom, which was already his. Alexander Severus was at this time the possessor of the Roman empire, a very youth, under the tutelage of his mother, and one who had hitherto dwelt always at Rome; he was therefore unwilling to engage in a war, especially if it might be avoided; and for that reason sent letters to Artaxares, importing, that
- b he would do wisely to keep within bounds, and not, out of vain hopes of conquest, to enterprize new wars, which might not be attended with the same success as formerly; that, in the present case, he ought to consider he was not to deal with barbarians, or with a nation unused to war, but with the Romans, whose emperors, Augustus, Trajan, and Severus, had often vanquished the Partbians. The Persian king had little regard to these letters; on the contrary, he began to raise a great army, and to attack the fortified posts of the Romans on the river Euphrates, making such a progress in the reduction of the adjacent provinces, that the emperor Alexander, how unwilling soever he might be, was constrained to raise an army, and to march towards Mesopotamia, in order to give a check to the Persian power ^c.
- c Artaxares was employed in the siege of Nisibis or Antiochia, when he received the news of Alexander's marching towards him; upon which he thought proper to raise his siege, that he might recruit and refresh his army. He sent however deputies or ambassadors, if we may be allowed to call four hundred persons by that title, whom he selected for their extraordinary stature, and great strength; and having furnished them with rich habits, and fine horses, he gave them commission, when they should be introduced to the emperor's presence, to speak thus: The great king Artaxares commands the Romans, and their prince, to depart out of all Syria and Asia Minor, and to restore to the Persians all the countries on this side the Ægean and Pontic seas, as of right descending to them from their ancestors ^d.
- d THESE heralds or ambassadors performed their commission very exactly; which so highly irritated Alexander, who was otherwise a prince of the gentlest disposition, that he ordered all their equipage to be taken from them, and sent them into Phrygia, where he assigned them farms, which they might cultivate for their subsistence. This done, he advanced into Mesopotamia, which he recovered in a great measure without fighting. Historians differ so much in the accounts they give us of the subsequent parts of this war, that it is almost impossible to reconcile them. We shall however relate what appears to us most probable, and give our readers our reasons in a note ^e.
- e Artaxares advanced with his forces into Mesopotamia, as soon as he thought himself strong enough to give the enemy battle. His army consisted of a hundred and twenty thousand horse, ten thousand heavy-armed soldiers, eighteen hundred chariots with scythes, and seven hundred elephants. Alexander however did not decline fighting. An engagement ensued, in which the Romans were victorious, and Artaxares was compelled to retire into the heart of his dominions, where, with great assiduity, he applied himself to the recruiting and restoring his army. On the other hand, the Roman emperor divided his forces into three bodies; the first, marching through Armenia, had orders to penetrate into Media; the second marched over the marshes, to enter the Partbian dominions on the other side; the third, which was the greatest, and which the emperor commanded in person, was to have fallen into the heart of Artaxares's dominions; and if this scheme had been thoroughly executed, in all probability the Persian power would not only have been weakened, but even brought to the very verge of destruction ^f.
- THE body of troops which passed through Armenia, underwent great difficulties, and with very much fatigue arrived at last in Media. Artaxares quickly marched against them with a formidable army; but was not able to do much, for the country being uneven, the Roman foot had the better of his cavalry. While he was considering how these evils might be surmounted, he received advice of the other body of Romans breaking into his territories, which, in some measure, frustrated all his designs; however, having left guards sufficient to secure the passes, he marched with his forces against the new invaders. These troops, finding no enemy to oppose them, plundered all the country, and, proud of their spoils, would no longer be restrained under discipline; nay, at last they became so scandalously licentious, that they slew their commander in chief, Flavius, for endeavouring to restrain them, and for being more careful of their safety than they were themselves. In this situation the Persian king fell upon them, and rather destroyed than defeated them. The Roman emperor in the mean time being under feminine counsels, failed to perform the share he had taken to himself in this enterprize; which was the ruin of his army, the remains of which having joined the corps under his command, he returned first to Antioch, and then to Rome, where he triumphed, and was styled Parthicus and Persicus, with very little reason (C). Artaxares made the best use of his absence, recovering what he had lost, restoring the glory of the Persian name; and having reigned with much reputation, died with honour, and in peace, after enjoying the kingdom twelve years, or, as others say, fifteen years, abating two months &c.

Sapores.
Year of Christ

He was succeeded in the throne by his son Sapores, or Sapor, a prince equally famous for strength of body, and abilities of mind, fierce and intractable in his nature, covetous of glory, haughty, insolent, and cruel. He was no sooner seated on the throne, than he began to meditate a new war with the Romans, to which he was encouraged by a traitor, who dwelt in his court. The name of this man was Cyriades, the son of another Cyriades, an eminent commander in the Roman army. This profligate son, of whom we are speaking, began his exploits with robbing his own father. He was naturally a voluptuous man; and therefore, as soon as he had possessed himself of this treasure, he withdrew into Persia, where he lived in that splendor and luxury, for which he had sacrificed his honour. In conjunction with Odomastes a Persian general, he wasted the adjoining provinces; and having at last prevailed on the king himself to take the field, Cyriades, with the deserters, who, for the sake of plunder, followed him, attacked the cities of Antioch and Cæsarea Philippi, both of which they were so lucky as to make themselves masters of; whereupon Cyriades took first the title of Cæsar, and then called himself emperor, acquiring, by degrees, dominions, revenues and forces, not altogether unworthy of that title^d.

(C) Nothing can be more opposite than the account given by Herodian and Ælius Lampridius of the Persian war. We will give a concise account of what is said by each of them, and leave it to the intelligent reader to decide as he pleases. Herodian affirms, that, in the fourteenth year of Alexander Severus, letters came from the presidents of Syria and Mesopotamia, purporting, that Artaxerxes king of Persia had made an incursion into Mesopotamia, and threatened to invade Syria, claiming all the continent opposite to Europe, from the Ægean sea to the Propontis, as the ancient patrimony of the Persians. Upon this, after writing letters to no purpose to persuade the Persian to be quiet, the emperor Alexander marched into the east, where he divided his army, as we have related in our text, and by failing to perform what himself had undertaken, brought them all into a miserable situation; for which the army was so grievously offended with the emperor, that they openly said, he had most foully betrayed them. Upon this he led them back to Antioch, where he retailed the remains of them, distributed amongst them large sums of money; and perceiving, that the Romans who were slain in Persia, by selling their lives dear, had exceedingly weakened the enemy, he had thoughts of invading their territories again, when he had advice of the German rebellion, which compelled him to return into Italy (7). On the other hand, we are expressly told by the writer of the life of Alexander Severus, addressed to Con- stantine the Great, that the Persians were intirely defeated, and a great number made prisoners. He likewise informs us, that he transcribed from the journal of the senate, a speech of the emperor's after his return, which hath abundance of extraordinary particulars. Amongst others, the emperor assures the senate, that Artaxerxes was not improperly styled the great king; that he brought seven hundred elephants into the field, of which three hundred were taken, and two hundred killed; that the Romans had cut to pieces an army of one hundred and twenty thousand horse, had sold a multitude of Persian prisoners, and that he had defeated the Persians in the plains where Cæsar had been overcome by the Parthians. He affirmed the same thing in gross to the people of Rome, and was thereupon complimented with the title of Conqueror of the Parthians and Persians (8). This author mentions Herodian's account, and also some other accounts less favourable to the emperor Alexander than his; but he thinks the authorities cited by himself sufficient to weigh down all they say. However, Herodian, we know, wrote only of such things as happened within his own life-time, and made it a rule with him to make every thing give way to truth. As for the author of this life addressed to Constantine, some will have him to be Ælius Lampridius, and again others attribute it to Spartianus (9); but, whoever writ it, it hath much the air of a panegyric, or at least of an apology.

a THE young emperor Gordian, when he had settled the affairs of the empire in the west, resolved to rescue the east also from the tyranny of pseudo-emperors, as well as from the terror of the Persian arms. With this view he marched into Syria, at the head of a great army; and as long as his father-in-law, whom some writers call Mysibenus, others Timefokes, lived, every thing went well. The Persian found himself constrained to withdraw into his own dominions, whither the emperor followed him, taking Charra or Haran in Mesopotamia; but while he was preparing to push his conquests still farther, he was murdered by the treachery of Philip, whom he had made captain of his guards, on the death of his father-in-law ¹.

b THIS Philip, having possessed himself of the sovereign authority, made peace with Sapor, and abandoned Mesopotamia and Armenia to him again. Part of these provinces, on the news of the senate's disapproving his conduct, he recovered again, without shewing any regard to his treaty; and leaving a sufficient number of troops to secure the frontiers, marched back into Italy. As soon as the Roman army was withdrawn, Sapor and Cyriades renewed their incursions; and the latter growing stronger than ever, began, in all respects, to be treated as an emperor. Indeed the Roman affairs were in such miserable confusion, that many, who would otherwise have opposed Cyriades, were now glad to be sheltered under his protection. At length however things began to take a new turn. Valerian, tho' he was seventy years old when he was advanced to the empire, yet spared he no pains to reduce all the numerous provinces thereof to a proper degree of obedience. While he was thus employed, first in the west, and then in the north, Sapor, with a numerous army, broke into the Roman territories, burnt and pillaged the country; and at length advancing as far as Edeffa, besieged it in form, one Demosthenes, who commanded therein, making a gallant resistance ².

c Valerian no sooner received advice of this, than he posted with the troops about his person to its relief. His approach gave new spirits to the distressed inhabitants of the Roman provinces, and disposed them to take all the necessary steps for compelling the Persians to retire into their own dominions. The soldiers of Cyriades mutinied against him, put him to death, and declared for Valerian. Sapor however, d confiding in the strength of his army, continued still before Edeffa, in the neighbourhood whereof an action happened, in which Valerian was taken prisoner, whether by his own temerity, or the treachery of one of his commanders, cannot be well determined. This gave a mortal wound to the Roman affairs in the east, where Sapor gained continual advantages, and used his fortune with an insolence not to be endured. This at length drove the people to despair; so that first under the command of Callistus, afterwards under that of Odenatus, prince of Palmyrene, they took arms, and not only protected themselves from any further insults, but also, under the command of the last-mentioned general, defeated the Persian, and took part of his baggage, with all his concubines, which determined him to retire into his own dominions. In e his march he is said to have made use of the bodies of his unfortunate prisoners to fill up the hollow roads, and to facilitate the passages of his carriages over such rivers as lay in his way. On his return into Persia, he was solicited by the kings of the Caduceans, Armenians, Babylonians, and other nations, to set the emperor Valerian at liberty; but to no purpose. On the contrary, he used him the worse, treated him daily with indignities, set his foot upon his neck when he mounted his horse, and, as some writers say, after several years confinement, cause him to be flay'd alive ³ (D).

(D) There is nothing more confused, nothing for which it is more difficult to account, than the manner by which Valerian fell into the hands of Sapor, and his treatment afterwards. Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the life of this emperor, expresses himself doubtfully as to the conduct of Macrianus, whether it was treacherous, or unfortunate only; but, as to the emperor himself, he is positive, that, after he was made prisoner, Sapor made use of him as a footstool when he mounted his horse. The same writer hath preserved three letters; one from king Belshus; another from Balemus king of the Caduci; and a third from Artabazes king of Armenia, to the Persian monarch, in favour of Valerian, who, he says, died in his captivity at a very advanced age (10). Zonaras affirms, that however Valerian was taken, whether fighting in his own defence, or voluntarily yielding himself up, he was afterwards treated with the

FROM this time forwards the affairs of Sapor wore but an indifferent aspect. Odenatus, flushed with victory, at the head of a gallant army, and cloathed with the character of president over the Roman provinces in the east, bridled the Persians, and made them frequent visits in their own territories. Twice this general advanced as far as the city of Ctesiphon, seated on the banks of the Tigris, all the countries between Palmyra and that river being under his obedience. On his death his wife, the celebrated Zenobia, continued to oppose the Persians, and with success, till she was conquered, and made prisoner by the emperor Aurelian, who vindicated the honour of the Romans on this side, and took ample vengeance for the ill treatment of Valerian. Much spoil, many prisoners, and one of the king's chariots, Aurelian carried with him into Italy, and with them graced his triumph at Rome^k. Sapores^b however continued to enlarge his dominions at the expence of his barbarous neighbours, and having reigned, with great variety of fortune, thirty-one years, died, and left the kingdom to his son. An eastern writer informs us, that Aurelian made peace with Sapores, and gave him his daughter in marriage, in whose train were two Greek physicians, who first brought the writings of Hippocrates into the east^l. In the reign of this monarch, flourished, according to the same writer, the famous heretic Manes, whose opinions so long disturbed the church^m (E).

the utmost indignity. He likewise says, that he was carried into the heart of Persia, and was so unhappy as to be an eye-witness of the massacring the Romans, in order to fill up the hollow ways with their carcases; and this, says he, was the end of Valerian (11). Zosimus relates things more particularly. He informs us, that Valerian, finding his army much weakened by sickness, and distrusting the fidelity of most of his officers, endeavoured first to negotiate, and then to buy a peace from Sapor, who refusing to treat with any but the emperor, he imprudently went to confer with him, attended only by his ordinary guards, and so was surprized, put into chains, and carried away prisoner into the inland parts of Persia, where he died of extreme old age (12). Agathias asserts, that Valerian was not only treated with the utmost ignominy after he was made prisoner by Sapor, but that at length he ordered him to be flay'd alive; which was accordingly performed (13). Cedrenus says, that Valerian, with twenty thousand men, were made prisoners by Sapor at the battle of Casarea; and that his skin being pulled over his ears, he died in miserable torture (14). To cite more authors would be tedious, as well as to no purpose; for we do not pretend to ascertain any fact, but to shew, that the death of Valerian is very uncertain; and this we have already sufficiently done.

(E) The ecclesiastical historians are not agreed at what time Manes flourished. However, as Cedrenus (15), who wrote his compend of histories from good memoirs, places him under the reign of Sapor, we may as well speak of him here as any-where else. Concerning him and his doctrines we are told in general, that one Terebinthus, an arch-heretic, having fled out of Palestine into Persia, and being there received into the house of a widow, took the name of Buda, pretended to have been born of a virgin, to have been brought up in the mountains, and to have received a command to teach men a new religion, or at least new notions in religion. He being either killed by the people, or by an evil spirit that he converted with in this woman's house, left behind him in her hands four treatises, containing the sum of his doctrines. This woman having bought a slave called Cabricus, when a boy of seven years old, caused him to be carefully educated, and, when she died, left him all she had. By this means the writings of Terebinthus or Buda coming into his hands, he read, considered them, and resolved to pass for somebody as well as his master. The first thing he did, was to change his name from Cabricus to Manes; then he began to propagate his opinions, which were taken principally from the writings of Zoroaster and the Gnostics. Part of the scriptures he rejected, part he retained; but magnified his own writings above all. He asserted two principles, the one good, and the other evil. He spoke respectfully of Jesus Christ, yet denied that he suffered and rose again, affirming, thus the Jews crucified a phantom. He gave himself sometimes out for the Messiah; at others for the comforter. He chose twelve apostles, and seventy-two disciples, who discharged their offices faithfully, spreading his notions far and wide, some of them penetrating into China (16). As for Manes himself, he was, according to the manner of those times, a person of considerable learning; for he drew a map of the world, and wrote a treatise of its use. He likewise composed a large book of enigmatical figures, which, he pretended, contained a series of revelations to the end of the world (17). In the end, he is said to have lost himself in that whirlpool which swallows up most impostors, the affectation of working of miracles. He would needs undertake to cure the king of Persia's son, who laboured under a mortal disease; but he failed in his attempt, the young prince died, and he was imprisoned. He made his escape afterwards, and for some time wandered about, and was concealed by his disciples. At length he was apprehended by the king of Persia's officers, and, as some say, was crucified by the order of Sapor, tho', as others affirm, he was flay'd alive (18). However, his opinions did not perish with him; for his sect flourished afterwards in Persia, and was encouraged by some of its kings.

- a themselves from the Romans, or rather, as other parts of the Roman empire had done, to assert a right of making emperors. They cast their eyes on one Antiochus, whom they arrayed in purple, and saluted emperor; but Aurelian did not leave them long at liberty to carry on this scheme. He returned with his victorious army, reduced Palmyra, and dyed the cloaths of his soldiers, if we may be allowed the expression, in the blood of its inhabitants. As for Antiochus, he took no notice of him at all. And for Hormisdas, he had not interfered, and therefore Aurelian did not trouble his country; he had the good fortune consequently to die in peace, after having sat on the throne a year and ten days.

- b Varanes the first succeeded him. Of him we know very little more than that he reigned three years, during which space we find not that he enterprized any thing against the Romans, or they against him. In truth, the empire was at this time in a very indifferent condition; for, after the death of Aurelian, the Roman forces in Syria and Mesopotamia were very unquiet. At length Saturnius set himself up for emperor, but with no great good luck; yet, as he was a man of probity, and an excellent commander, he kept the Persians within their limits; so that the prince, of whom we are speaking, never had any opportunity of exerting himself.

- c Varanes the second ascended the throne on the death of the former king of the same name. He had at first some thoughts of invading the Roman provinces; but he quickly found, that the state of things was changed; for, on the first motion of his troops, the emperor Probus advanced in person into the east. Upon this Varanes desisted from his enterprize, and hearing of the emperor's great success, ordered Narjes, who commanded for him in Armenia, to send deputies to compliment Probus, to make him presents, and to treat of peace. The emperor received them very haughtily, refused the presents they brought him, and wrote an answer to the letter of Narjes to this purpose: That all he had was his; that he wondered how he could send him such trifles: wherefore, to him, who might perhaps esteem them; he had sent them back, as well knowing how to have all that he possessed, when the Romans should desire it. However, he granted them peace at this time, and terrified them so much with his power, that the Persians were afraid to make their usual excursions for some time.
- d At length Varanes took heart, and began to think of recovering some of the provinces which his ancestors had lost; but, before he was able to do any thing, he found himself disturbed by domestic seditions; and, before these were calmed, Probus, assembling a great army, began his march towards the east. Varanes conceived himself delivered from this misfortune, when he heard that the army, in a sedition, had killed the emperor; but he was mistaken, for Carus his successor, after subduing several barbarous nations, shortly after entered Mesopotamia, and carrying all before him, advanced beyond Ctesiphon, as if he intended an absolute conquest of that province. The fears of the Persians were however soon over; for the emperor Carus died in the first march he afterwards made, either by an illness under which he
- e had long laboured, or by his tent's being set on fire by lightning. What was still more happy for the Persians, was a notion the Romans took from thence, that fate had assigned Ctesiphon for the bounds of their empire, which they were never to pass but to their hurt (F). Soon after Numerianus, the son of Carus, was also slain; and the

(F) There is nothing so valuable in an historian as truth, and yet there is nothing more frequently wanting. We generally esteem those authors most, who lived nearest the times of which they wrote; and yet we are as often deceived by them as by any others. A desire of praising immoderately those of whom they write, too often influences historians to represent things otherwise than they apprehended them. Vopiscus, in his life of the emperor Carus, affects a great deal of candour and impartiality, especially in respect to the death of that emperor, which had been generally supposed ominous to the empire. He expired in his camp before Ctesiphon, blasted, as the report went, by lightning; whence it was inferred, that the Romans should never penetrate farther than this city. It was built by the Parthians on the east bank of the Tigris, and was a very populous place; and besides, the country beyond it was quite unknown to the Romans, as well as very improper for their manner of making war, which probably gave birth to this opinion. However, Vopiscus was resolved to destroy it, in order to which he produces a letter from Calphurnius, secretary to Carus, wherein he gives a very ambiguous account of that emperor's death. He says it happened after the greatest clap of thunder which was heard during the storm; that his servants, for grief, set fire to his tent, which occasioned the report that he was burnt by lightning; whereas, according to the best account this writer could get, he died of his sickness. Vopiscus then mentions the notion that Ctesiphon was fatal to the Roman empire, and that the death of Carus was

Roman army, under the command of Dioclesian, returned into Italy. Varanes gained a hereby some respite, which he employed in strengthening his frontiers; but when, on the news of the disturbances which had happened in the Roman empire, he began to think of invading its provinces, Dioclesian suddenly returned into Armenia, with a great body of forces, and thereby struck such a terror into the Persians, that they were afraid to undertake any thing. A little after died Varanes, after an unfortunate reign of seventeen years, leaving the kingdom to his son ^a.

Varanes III.
Year of Christ

Varanes the third reigned no more than four months. He is dignified by historians with the title of Segan'aa. Agathias hath given us the reason of this appellation. He tells us, that it was the custom of the Persian monarchs to incorporate the nations they subdued into the body of their subjects, not by removing them hither or thither, b but by allowing them to live, as formerly, under their own laws, themselves adding to their titles that which the ancient princes of the country bore. Varanes the second having, a little before his death, overcome this nation, his son took the title of Segan'aa or Segan'shâb, which, Agathias expressly tells us, signified king of the Segani or Segeftani ^c.

Narfes succeeded next, a prince of high spirit, who designed no less than Artaxares the founder of the new Persian monarchy had done, the reduction of all the Persian provinces, held at this time either by the barbarous nations, or conquered by the Romans. It is certain, that never did a fairer opportunity offer for the execution of this vast design, than at the entrance of this prince's reign. The Roman empire was c in such distraction, that tho' there were two emperors, yet they found the weight too heavy for them, and therefore created two Cæsars to share the burden of government. War was kindled in every corner of the empire, when Narfes, with a great army, broke into Mesopotamia, and in a short time recovered most of the places which had been heretofore in the hands of his ancestors. But it was not long before Dioclesian sent Galerius, one of the Cæsars, with a numerous army, to Antioch, to check the progress of the Persian. Narfes did not decline an engagement; but his success was not equal to his courage, either in this, or in a second battle. Galerius being conqueror in both, passed the river Tigris, and advanced into the very heart of the king of Persia's dominions. Narfes, tho' he retired continually, yet kept a strict eye upon d the enemy, beseeching his own troops not to look upon his conduct as timorous, but to be assured that he would take an opportunity of vindicating their honour, and revenging the loss he had sustained. He was as good as his word; for Galerius, elated with success, abating of his usual care and circumspection, Narfes took advantage thereof, and falling upon the Roman army while they were upon their march, gave them so total a defeat, that scarce any remains of them could be afterwards drawn together. Galerius himself with much ado escaped, and making haste to the army of Dioclesian, prepared to give the emperor the best account he could of his misfortune. Dioclesian used him but very indifferently, shewed a high dislike of his conduct, and in a manner refused to trust him with another army. At length however the e zealous importunities of Galerius prevailed, and levies being made with all possible expedition, he was sent with fresh forces against Narfes. The Persian king had, in this interval, made the best use of his victory, retrieving not only the cities and country which he had lost, but also bringing into the field a numerous army, composed especially of chosen horse, to maintain the conquests he had made, in case the Romans should once more dispute them ^f.

Galerius acted now as Narfes had before; he added prudence to fortitude, and depended no less on his own conduct, than on the courage of his forces. He thought a judgment for attempting to pass farther. But, says he, let cowardice make use of such arts to cover it; the brave will ever despise them. The most excellent Cæsar Maximian will never believe this; but, on the contrary, will attempt and finish the conquest of the Persians, and penetrate beyond them (18). Would it not have been better, if, instead of this flourish, he had told us, that, immediately after the death of Carus, his army, under the command of his son Numerianus, was attacked and beaten by the Persians, and thereby forced to retire into the Roman provinces again (19)? Yet he says nothing of this, either here, or in the life of Numerianus (20), whom some writers affirm to have been taken and put to death by the Persians after their victory (21).

a went with a few of his friends to view the Persian army, and having happily performed this exploit, he returned to his own, which he disposed in such a manner, as to attack the Persians at unawares, whereby he gained a complete victory. Narjes himself was wounded, and forced to fly with a small remnant of his army into the mountains. His baggage, treasure, papers, all fell into the hands of Galerius, as did likewise his sisters, his queen, his concubines, and children. In vain he endeavoured to repair his misfortune; the spirits of his subjects were effectually damped by this blow, insomuch that he found it impossible to collect another army capable of taking the field against the victorious Romans, who were shortly after joined by Dioclesian and his army, who at the time of the engagement lay incamped at Antioch, in order to have b sustained Galerius, in case any thing amiss had befallen him. Overcome therefore with the reflection of his misfortunes, Narjes, to rid himself of these troublesome neighbours, consented to give up five of his provinces; on which condition peace was granted him, and his queen restored; but as for his sisters, his concubines, and the other persons of quality, who were taken in the battle, they were carried to Rome, and there led in triumph. The grief of this broke the heart of Narjes, when he had enjoyed the regal dignity about seven years.

c He was succeeded by Misdates, otherwise called Hormisdas the second, who wore the diadem seven years and five months, but without doing any thing remarkable. As he was long in a declining condition, and had no issue, the nobility of Persia were under the utmost concern for the consequences of his decease, without a successor declared. At length it appeared, that the queen was with child; upon which a council of the magi was summoned, and they were required to inform the nobles whether the queen was with child of a son or a daughter. The magi answered, Of a son. Hereupon the diadem was placed upon the queen's great belly, and all the nobility swore allegiance on the faith of the foregoing prediction to the son she should bear. The king dying in the interim, the public peace was preserved by this expedient; and at the end of nine months the queen was delivered of a son, who was a king before he was born. This was

d Sapores, or Sapor the second, who governed the dominions of his ancestors long and happily. The account we have given in the last reign is strongly controverted, and it must be allowed, that there are more testimonies alledged against it than can be urged in its support. Yet we have given it the preference, for a reason which will appear at the bottom of the page, and which, we are persuaded, will induce our readers to be of the same mind (G). This prince, if we may credit an ecclesiastical historian,

(G) There are several passages in the writings of Ammianus Marcellinus (22), Zosimus (23), Socrates (24), and other writers, which seem to intimate, that Sapor was not a posthumous child, but born in his father's life-time, and educated by his direction. They also speak of one Hormisdas, who fled to the emperor Constantine, as if he had been brother to this prince. Now, if these facts were true, it would follow, that what is above related must be false. But if it be considered first, that the relations found in these authors are so worded, as that they may be made to suit with either fact: That, secondly, there is nothing expressly said of the manner in which Sapor came to the crown: And that, thirdly, these writers appear to be frequently very indifferently instructed as to the history of Persia, and scarce at all acquainted with its religion: We must confess, that no great stress can be laid on what they deliver, much less on what is inferred from their accounts. On the other hand, what Agathias relates, he had from the Persian records, and the Persian records are the best evidence for Persian affairs (25). But besides, there is another reason which so strongly corroborates what Agathias tells us, that one can scarce entertain any doubt of the truth of the fact mentioned by Agathias. Sapor succeeded in the Persian throne about the same time that Constantine became emperor, and he reigned seventy years. In the fifteenth year of his reign, Hormisdas retired into the Roman dominions. Now if Hormisdas had been the brother of Sapor, and had been a man before the death of his father, we must conceive that Sapor was within a few years as old as he, otherwise he could not have been his rival. But this would stretch the life of Sapor to an incredible extent, and would also involve us in new difficulties. It is therefore better to acknowledge Agathias's account, which concurs exactly with the most remarkable events recorded by other historians. As to the story of Hormisdas, it runs thus: He is said to have been a prince of the blood-royal of Persia, and that coming in when his father celebrated his birth-day feast, he observed that the nobility did not rise to salute him. Upon which he threatened, that if ever he came to the crown, he would treat them as Marfyas the Phrygian was treated. Most of the Persian lords knew not what to make of this; but one of them told the rest the story of Marfyas, who, for contending with Apollo, was by him slayed alive. This irritated them so much against the prince Hormisdas, that they not only excluded him from the succession, but caused him also to be closely imprisoned; whence however he escaped by

was educated under the care of an eunuch named Uztazades, who was secretly a christian. a Whoever had the care of his education, certain it is, that he became a very great prince, if we may bestow that character on one who was no very good man. He was a zealous asserter of the dignity of the Persian diadem, and pursued steadily that design which Artaxares had first set on foot, viz. of uniting all the territories of the ancient Persian kings under his obedience. But he did not pursue this design, as some of his predecessors had done, openly, and at the head of armies : if he had, in all probability he would not have been more fortunate than they ; for the Persian militia were by no means able to combat the regular forces of the Romans. This prudent monarch took quite different measures ; he encouraged the barbarous people dwelling on the frontiers of the Roman provinces to ravage and harass them ; this he did more b openly, when the affairs of the Romans were in confusion, and with greater secrecy, when they were better established. He extended his own dominions towards the east, and towards the north ; he increased his revenues, by encouraging industry and trade among his subjects ; he disciplined his forces, and above all things, affected a mighty esteem and veneration for the civil and religious constitution of his country ^c.

christians in his

THIS last-mentioned disposition induced him to persecute the christians, who were represented to him by the magi, and the Jews settled in his dominions, as men of detestable principles, bad subjects to their governors, and avowed enemies of religion ; that is, of its fundamental articles. It is said, that he put Simeon bishop of Ctesiphon, and many other ecclesiastics, to death, and that he even cut off the head of the eunuch before-mentioned, notwithstanding he had been his governor, and his father's old and faithful servant. One great crime objected to the christians was, their regard for Constantine, then emperor of Rome. His power was too great for Sapores to think as yet of attacking him openly ; he therefore sent a solemn embassy to Constantinople to compliment that prince, and to renew that peace which had for so many years subsisted between the two empires, directing his ministers privately to inquire into the strength of the Romans, and to buy up a quantity of arms, of which his subjects stood in great need. The emperor, though well informed of the design of Sapores, received his ministers very graciously, granted their requests, and at their return charged them with a letter for the king of Persia, their master. Of this letter there are two copies d extant, the one more full and correct than the other. The intent of the epistle was to persuade Sapores to treat the christians with greater lenity. The arguments made use of therein are just and natural, delivered in language becoming the writer, and him to whom it was addressed (H). In all probability, it had its effect ; for we are informed by an impartial author, that Sapores treated the christians afterwards with less severity. Indeed, he had never troubled them at all, if he had not been instigated by some

by the contrivance of his wife ; and flying to the emperor Constantine, met with a favourable reception, which he very well deserved, by the diligence and fidelity which he manifested on all occasions in the service of the Romans (26). There is certainly a strong air of fable in the first part of this narration ; for that a Persian prince should be acquainted with the story of Apollo and Mariyas, must appear strange, if not incredible. Again, that so rash and cruel a prince should, in getting out of prison, leave all his ill qualities behind him, and come a perfect wit and hero (for so these writers paint him afterwards) to the court of Constantine (27). This surely is very wonderful also ; and therefore stripping off these marvellous appendages, if we credit the bare matter of fact, that Hormisdas, a prince of the blood royal of Persia, fled to the Romans, and behaved well in their service ; it will answer all reasonable purposes, and the current of our history receive no interruption.

(H) Sozomen hath given us a long account of the cruel persecution raised against the Persian christians by Sapor ; but even this writer intimates, that the whole was not only excited, but managed also, by the magi. Those who are desirous of entering farther into this matter, may find in the works of this historian, a very copious account, not only of the general persecution, but of the principal martyrs, their quality and behaviour (28). Eusebius, in his life of Constantine, affords us a concise view of the persecution ; but then he gives us the letter of the emperor at large ; whereas Sozomen gives us only an extract of it. In this letter the emperor first gives a short account of his faith, then of his success and grandeur, which he attributes wholly to God's blessing thereon ; he afterwards expatiates on the odious folly of idolatry ; but without insinuating any thing of his suspicion that Sapor was an idolater. He then very pathetically represents the miseries which had constantly attended unjust and cruel princes, especially persecutors, of whom he particularizes Valerian ; whom he asserts to have been happy in all his undertakings, until he persecuted the christians. Lastly, he warmly recommends the christians in his dominions to the favour of Sapor, and beseeches him for his sake to look upon them as his good and faithful subjects (29).

- a malicious priests of his own religion, and the indiscretions perhaps of some christian priests.

HOWEVER, he abandoned not the scheme he had formed of raising himself and his successors to the supreme dominion over the east. When he thought he had brought things to bear, he generously acquainted Constantine with his intention, transmitting to him by his ambassadors a letter, or rather a manifesto, wherein he expressly set forth his claim to all the dominions anciently belonging to the Persian emperors, affirming, that the river Strymon was the legal boundary of his empire. Constantine returned him an answer, full of dignity and resolution; and though he was now grown in years, made great preparations for war, assembled a numerous army, and resolved to command it in person. When the season of the year approached, he joined his forces, and immediately began his march for the eastern provinces; but providence prevented his design from taking effect, by removing him out of this life, so that together with his empire, he left the management of this Persian war to his successors. Sapores did not fail to make use of the advantages afforded him by the disorders which happened in the empire on the death of Constantine. He instantly entered the Roman provinces, and reannexed to his own dominions what his ancestors had lost. It is a very difficult thing to give any account of this war from the Greek and Latin historians, notwithstanding the writings of many who lived in those days have come down to our hands, by reason of their evident partiality, some commending the emperor Constans as a very martial prince, others upbraiding him with pusillanimity, both endeavouring rather to suit history to their own opinions, than to the truth. By making proper allowances however for the visible biases of these writers, the truth seems to have been, that in pitched battles, and in defending of towns, the Romans were superior to the Persians; but that in swift marches, horse-combats and surprizes, the Persians had the advantage.

HENCE it came to pass, that altho' Sapores reconquered large tracts of country, and was successful in many engagements; yet could he not prevail against Nisibis, the strongest fortress the Romans had in those parts, though he often besieged it, and exerted his utmost force, in order to deliver his subjects from a thorn that continually pricked them; but he was constantly defeated, and constrained after great losses to rise from before it. As to the circumspection of the emperor Constans, when in the field, it might very probably be owing to the situation of those countries, which were the seat of war. In a plain country, such as Mesopotamia, the emperor was forced to act with great circumspection, because the enemy had all advantages, their cavalry having room to extend themselves, to retire, and to come back to the charge, which in a mountainous situation they could not have done. We need not wonder therefore, that the Romans were backward in fighting, and more solicitous about fortifying their camps than seeking the enemy. In the battle of Singara, which was fought in the night, Sapores had at first the advantage by reason of the surprize the Romans were under; but when they had recovered themselves a little, they repulsed the enemy so briskly, that in the end Sapores was forced to retire, after having lost his son in the battle, and received a dangerous wound himself. Both parties were in the end tired out with the war; the Roman emperor therefore leaving the care of the eastern provinces to Gallus, whom he had lately created Cesar, returned into the western provinces of his empire, while Sapores, who perceived that little was now to be got from the Romans, turned his arms upon his eastern neighbours, and left the care of his frontiers towards the Romans to his most experienced generals. In his expeditions against the Barbarians, he was more fortunate than against the Romans. Some he subdued by force, others readily yielded him obedience; with his most powerful and inveterate enemies he made a solid and lasting peace. In the midst of this success, he received advice that overtures had been made to his generals in the west for the conclusion of a peace. To shew therefore his readiness in this point, he dispatched one Narjes, a nobleman of great credit in his court, to carry his letters to Constans, with the terms on which he was content to enter on a treaty. This minister proceeded to Sirmium, in order to have an interview with Constans; there he presented him with the letters of the Persian king written in the usual strain of the Persian monarchs, i. e. in a lofty swelling style. The purport was, that notwithstanding Sapor knew himself to have a just claim to all the countries between Persia and the river Strymon, yet he was content for the sake of peace to be satisfied with Mesopotamia and Armenia; which once yielded up, he ^a would willingly become the friend of the Romans. Narjes perceiving how ill his master's letter was taken, endeavoured all that in him lay to pacify the Romans, and to obtain from the emperor an account of his demands, with which Constans readily complied. He named on his side ambassadors, who were to go to Sapor, and who were charged with letters, importing that, while himself was possessed of but a part of the Roman empire, he had notwithstanding maintained its ancient boundary in the east; and that now being master of the whole, it was not reasonable to expect that he should yield to such conditions as had been proposed. The Roman ambassadors found the king of Persia at Ctesiphon, where they had many conferences with him and his ministers, though to very little purpose, for the Persian would remit nothing; ^b however time was gained, in which Constans came first to Constantinople, and then prepared to set out for the east¹.

ABOUT this time one Antoninus, an officer of great credit in the Roman army, being persecuted by some of the emperor's favourites, fled to Sapor, by whom he was received with open arms, treated with the utmost kindness, and immediately admitted into the highest confidence. In the mean time the emperor had been prevailed upon to remove Ursicinus, who was general of the horse in the east, and to give his command to Sabinian, a very old man, who thought himself very cautious, but was by others esteemed timid, and most unfit for supreme command. Antoninus quickly gave the Persian notice of the incapacity of the Roman general, who thereupon deter- ^c mined, with the numerous army under his command, immediately to enter the Roman provinces, and to advance as fast as possible without embarrassing himself with sieges, or attempting to divide his forces, in order to garison towns. Accordingly, he passed the Tigris, and marched with all imaginable diligence towards the Euphrates, intending, if possible, to penetrate into Syria, hoping to pillage that fruitful country, which had enjoyed so many years peace². But Ursicinus, who was returned again into the east with the title of general of the foot, prevented him by throwing up works on the side of the river, and posting himself with his troops behind them. Sapor then, by the advice of Antoninus, turned to the left; and before it was expected, invested the city of Amida. In the neighbourhood of this place he took several ^d strong castles, and in one of them a considerable number of christian virgins, who had dedicated themselves to the service of God. The Persian treated them not only with humanity, but with the utmost politeness, being desirous to shew that prosperity softened his disposition, instead of rendering him arrogant. Amida made a long defence, and the siege thereof is said to have cost Sapor thirty thousand men. It was at last however taken by storm after a siege of seventy-three days. The principal officers of the garison he hanged, the men he sent into slavery, after which he put an end to the campaign on this side; he entered however afterwards Mesopotamia, where he took the town of Singara, and ruined it; he then attacked Bezabda, and after a siege of some days, took it, and fortified it; then he advanced to Virta, which he ^e likewise invested; but after a siege of some continuance, was obliged to retire. The emperor Constans in the mean time passed the Euphrates, and came to Amida, over the ruins of which he is said to have wept; he then advanced, in hopes of regaining the places taken by Sapor, proceeded to besiege Bezabda, but to no purpose; for the rainy season, and a scarcity of provision, obliged him to raise his siege, and return into Syria, where he continued all the winter³ (I).

(I) It would have been very easy to have rendered this part of our history more particular and more entertaining than it is, if there had not been two very cogent arguments offered by the very nature of the work to keep us here much within bounds. For first, as all the accounts we have come from Latin and Greek authors, they especially regard the conduct of the eastern emperors, their ministers and generals, and consequently belong rather to the Constantinopolitan than Persian history. Secondly, they agree so little among themselves, and yet are all of them so partial to their own countrymen, that should we relate exactly what those writers are pleased to say of the Persians, we should rather deceive than inform our readers, as too many historians do. There was a necessity of making these observations, that the nature of this part of our history might be well understood. We have herein stuck close to facts, without scrupulously reporting circumstances, because the latter have frequently appeared to us improbable, or at least violently exaggerated. Ammianus Marcellinus is the author on whom we have principally depended in the history of this reign. He was a man of quality, a soldier, and one who actu-

- a Sapor, in the beginning of the next spring, drew together a great army, and made a shew of entering the Roman provinces immediately, which compelled the emperor His prudence saves his forces. Constans to prepare also to take the field. As he had by this time not only a very great body of forces, but those too the very best in the empire, his great excellence lying in an exact knowledge of military discipline, in all probability the war would have been both bloody and lasting, if it had not been prevented by the military prudence of the Persian, to whom when an account was brought of the Roman preparations, he instantly determined to put strong garisons into his frontiers, and then to withdraw the remainder of his forces; which he accordingly did. The Roman emperor perceiving, that, without a peace, the war was at an end, did the like on his side; and having given directions for fortifying the places which were most in danger, he resolved to march away immediately against Julian, who had taken the title of Augustus, and had given just grounds to suspect he aimed at the empire ^b.

In this march the emperor fell sick, and died; whereby Julian was raised to be absolute lord of the Roman empire, the whole forces of which he intended to make use of in order to destroy the Persians; that is, to break their force so effectually, as that it should be impossible for them ever to trouble more the Roman provinces. Full of this great project, he did every thing which might conciliate the minds of the soldiers, raise his own reputation, or by any means contribute to facilitate his enterprise; in which he succeeded so well, that the army discovered an unusual alacrity, and readily followed him into the dominions of Sapor, who contented himself with acting on the defensive, having no hopes at all of defeating the Romans in a pitched battle under so martial a prince. In this expedition Hormisdas the Persian commanded the left wing of the Roman army, and by his advice it was that the emperor regulated most of his designs. As long as he did this, success attended his arms; some strong places he took by force, others yielded through fear; but most were given up to him by treachery. At length he besieged Ctesiphon, which had been the bulwark of the Parthian empire, but without success; for it was well fortified, and had a numerous garison. Here it was that the Romans began to discover how puissant an enemy they had to deal with ^c.

- d THE Persians skirmished with him every day; the country on all sides was burnt and destroyed, insomuch that it appeared impracticable to hope any further advantages on this side. Julian therefore resolved to remount the Tigris, on which he had a fleet of transports laden with provisions. A Persian of quality deserting to him, assured him, that the method he took would be equally prejudicial to his fame and to his affairs; that hitherto he might be justly styled the conqueror of the Persians, and that he might still better deserve this title, if he would follow his advice; which was, to quit the side of the river, to burn his fleet, and to march through a broad, open road, into which he promised to conduct him, where, after three or four days march, he would find an end put to all the difficulties, which he either actually struggled with, or even apprehended. Hormisdas, when the emperor consulted him upon this project, told him plainly, That it was impracticable, and that he would be undone if he pursued it. Julian however was inflexible; he ordered his soldiers to furnish themselves with twenty days provisions, and having so done, he commanded the fleet to Whom he destroys, by drawing him too far into his country ally served in this very war, of which he writes. Besides all this he was a native of Antioch, and therefore perfectly well acquainted with the seat of the war. However, as he was a Pagan, he lessens all the christian emperors, that his hero Julian may appear with the greater lustre; and as he was a Roman, he exaggerates the barbarity and want of discipline among the Persian troops, who yet held the Romans at bay, and made very long sieges, which mutual armies never do (30). Zosimus is by far more outrageous than Marcellinus. He was so bigotted a hearthen, that he will not allow Constantine the Great to have done the least thing worthy of that title. He censures him for withdrawing the garisons from the frontiers of the empire, and intimates, that by this means the Persians ravaged the Roman provinces with impunity (31). The christian writers, on the other hand, magnify all the actions of Constantine (32). In such a situation we could do no more than assemble the matters of fact relating to Persia, and deliver them in a plain style, and in their natural order; for had we entered into comparing of authors, and weighing authorities, we should have exceeded all bounds, and, after all, perhaps wasted our time to no great purpose.

be set on fire, maugre all the solicitations of his friends, who, while it was yet in a flame, convinced him that he was betrayed; whereupon he ordered the Persian nobleman and his attendants to be put to the torture. This was executed upon the servants; but as for their lord, he was fled. It served only to increase the emperor's disquiet; for the men readily acknowledged, that they came on purpose to mislead him. Orders were then given to save as many of the vessels as was possible, which however were but a few; and then, as if he had perfectly lost his senses, Julian threw himself and his army into that road, which had been pointed out to him by his enemies. For three or four days they met with little or no interruption; but afterwards Sapor, with the whole force of Persia, coasted them in their march, and, at the beginning of the night, continually set upon their rear guard. The weather proving intensely hot, water scarce, and provisions failing, Julian saw plainly that his obstinacy had brought him into difficulties almost unsurmountable. He still continued to bear up against them with great constancy, and the soldiers, encouraged by his example, repulsed the Persians with great slaughter, as often as they attacked them. At length, on the twenty-fifth of June in the evening, a mighty cloud of dust arose, occasioned by the advance of the greater part of the Persian horse. On this occasion the Persian noblemen gave full testimony of their valour, making such an impression on the left wing of the Roman army, as obliged the emperor to repair thither in person; whither he was no sooner come, than he received in his body an arrow, whether from the enemy, or from one of his own soldiers, could never be known, of which wound he died the next night. This threw his army into a terrible consternation, notwithstanding they had been victorious in the fight the day before, slain many thousand Persians, and amongst them fifty persons of quality.

Sapor, as soon as he was informed of the emperor's death, made proclamation that he would give a great reward to the man by whose hand he fell; which however was never claimed. At the same time, to shew his desire of peace, he sent deputies to Jovian, who had succeeded Julian. In four days a peace was concluded, whereby the five provinces in dispute were for ever yielded to the Persians, together with the strong fortress of Nisibis, which had so long been the bulwark of the empire. As soon as the treaty was concluded, Sapor furnished the Romans, for their money, with provisions, and also gave and received hostages for the due performance of the treaty; which was exactly executed, tho' with much reluctance, by the Romans; yet of the mighty army led by Julian into Persia, scarce a tenth part returned, and even these perhaps had never returned, but by the favour of this peace, which they so much decried (K).

(K) The various accounts which are given by different authors of the death of the emperor Julian, belong to the Constantinopolitan history; and therefore we have but just touched upon this subject here. Ammianus Marcellinus, and Zosimus, shew the highest commendations to their hero Julian, on account of his penetrating farther into the Persian territories than any of his predecessors. The last-mentioned of these authors carries his eulogy so far, as to pretend, that Julian conquered the greatest part of the Persian empire; than which nothing can be falser, or more ridiculous. Almost all the Greek historians agree in blaming Jovian for the peace he made; and on this account they degrade him far below his predecessor. It may not be amiss to take this opportunity of setting in a true light a point, which hath so generally, and so long, been misunderstood. Julian was, without question, a very gallant man, and an excellent soldier; but he was as certainly no general, since there is scarce a maxim in the art of war, against which he did not expressly act in this Persian expedition. All the Roman generals, who had suffered themselves to be dazzled with the reputation of conquering the Persians, had perished in their foolish attempts; for, from Craesus to Carnus, no Roman had ever penetrated the Persian dominions, but to his own dishonour; and therefore there could be nothing more contrary to reason, than Julian's pushing forwards as he did. Again, he acted without any certain view; he marched he knew not where; he fought he knew not what; he took for guides he knew not whom; he burnt a fleet, when of all things it was most necessary to him; he sacrificed his soldiers, in making them pass rivers almost unpassable in themselves, and in the sight of an enemy perfectly acquainted with the country. In one word, there were five large provinces in dispute: Julian, if he had taken cool and proper measures, might have disposed things so as to have secured them for ever to the Romans; but, instead of doing this, he did the single thing he should not have done; he quitted the ancient Roman method of making war, to take up that of the Persians; and by engaging Sapor in his own way, and in his own country, sacrificed a numerous and victorious army. But if Julian was not, Sapor certainly was a general; he managed the war as it ought to have been managed; he retired, that he might conquer; and when he had conquered, he thought of nothing but making an advantageous peace. In this he shewed himself a

- DURING the rest which so advantageous a treaty afforded to the Persians, their monarch neglected no opportunity of settling effectually the bounds of his empire towards Tartary and India. This took him up some time, and served also to exercise his soldiers; but, after the death of Jovian the Roman emperor, when the affairs of that people were again disordered, Sapor did not fail to make a new irruption, in breach, as the Latin writers say, of the peace subsisting between the two empires. The issue of this war is no less obscure than its commencement. All we know of it is, that, at the beginning, Sapor had great advantages in Armenia, having slain Arfaces, who then reigned in that country, where he also reduced a large territory under his obedience; but on the arrival of Arintbius, he was constrained to abandon a great part of his conquests. However, being intent on aggrandizing the Persian dominions on this side, he still remained in arms, and transferred the imperial seat to Ctesiphon, the old capital of the Parthian empire, that he might be always at hand to improve such opportunities as might offer (L). It does not however appear, that, after this time, he gained any great victory; and all we know farther is, that, in the beginning of the reign of Gratian, this restless and ambitious monarch ended his days, after having reigned seventy years, or, as some say, seventy-two, with great variety of fortune f.

Turns his arms against other

- To Sapor succeeded Artaxerxes; but who he was, is a question. Some writers are positive that he was the son of his predecessor; others are no less positive that he was his brother. Those who will have him to be son of Sapor, give us this account of the matter: They say, that Sapor had four sons, Hormisdas, Adarnassés, and Narses, by great princesses; this Artaxerxes by a lady of exquisite beauty, but of no distinguished family. Hormisdas, by going over to the Romans, forfeited his right to the crown, and so Adarnassés came to be considered as his heir; but this prince threw away his title to the kingdom, by displaying his own unworthiness to possess it; for the inhabitants of Mesopotamia having presented to king Sapor a tent of camels skins, curiously painted, and enriched with gold, the king gave it to his son, and afterwards asking him how he liked it; The thing, replied he, is well enough; but, when I come to be king, I will have a tent of the skins of men. His actions corresponded so exactly with this barbarous expression, that it was judged proper to set him aside. Narses had the misfortune to offend the king, who therefore disinherited him, whereby the crown came to this Artaxerxes, who least thought of it; a most romantic and incre-

wife king, a great captain, and an able statesman. The eloquence of the Greek writers will everlastingly do justice to the military virtues of Julian, and the christian piety of his successor. As we are now writing the Persian history, we thought it but justice to vindicate the character of a Persian monarch, by a short recapitulation of facts, which is all that is intended by this note.

(L) Ammianus Marcellinus hath given a pretty large account of this Armenian war, wherein he charges the king of Persia with breach of faith to the Romans, and with excessive cruelty and treachery towards the Armenians. He says, that he took advantage of that confusion which overspread the Roman affairs after the death of the emperor Jovian, to fall upon the Armenians, first by slight incursions, quickly after more openly, and with greater force; that, in the progress of the war, he, on some pretence or other, prevailed on Arfaces king of Armenia to admit of a personal conference with him; at which he seized him, and instantly caused his eyes to be put out, and himself to be cruelly beaten with silver rods; and a short time afterwards ordered him to be crucified, laying then siege to the capital of Armenia, where the queen, the king's sons and treasures were; that the Armenians, in this distress, had recourse to the emperor Valentinian, who sent to their assistance Arintbius, with an army, which obliged Sapor to retire, tho' he exclaimed against it as a breach of the peace (34). It is easy enough to see that this account is perplexed, and altogether favourable to the Romans; but it is not easy to unravel it, or, at this distance of time, to point out all the misrepresentations contained therein. We know however, that they are not wanting, and that the true ground of the war was this: Julian, when he made his irruption into Persia, compelled Arfaces king of Armenia to attend him with all the forces he could raise, tho' he would not accept the assistance of other princes. This he did, because Arfaces was a christian, and he had a mind to harass him and his subjects. When Sapor came to treat with Jovian, he excluded the Armenians, intending to revenge himself upon them for the assistance they had given Julian; so that the war was not altogether without pretence, any more than the complaint of the Romans assisting them, since they could not do this according to the letter of their treaty with the Persians. Some time after, when Valentinian suspected Para, who succeeded his father Arfaces, he, by fraud, got him into his hands, and, after very ill usage, caused him to be cruelly put to death; which fact was highly resented by Sapor. Henceforward the peace was ill observed on both sides; and, on the whole, it is most evident, that Sapor did not employ either fraud or force more unjustly than the Romans, with whom he had to deal, tho' the authors of that nation are not always ready to acknowledge as much.

dible tale! But the other opinion, that Artaxerxes was not the son, but the brother a of Sapor, is not at all the more probable, as making the foregoing story inconsistent and unintelligible; we ought therefore to suppose he was his kinsman only. However, our European historians tell us nothing more concerning this prince, than that he maintained the peace with the Romans, and governed his dominions quietly four years & (M).

Sapor III.

To him succeeded his son Sapor, the third of that name, who reigned five years; but what he did in that space, we find not in any Greek author, probably because, adhering to the peace made with his grandfather, he troubled not the Roman empire, then governed by Theodosius the Great ^b.

Varanes IV.

Varanes, or, as the Greeks write it, Vararanes, the fourth of that name, succeeded b his father Sapor. He is also known by the surname of Cerma Saa, of which we have little or no account as to its meaning. Elsewhere however this difficulty will be cleared up, and the title shewn to be Kerman Shâb, which province of Kerman was in his reign added to the Persian empire. He also maintained the peace with the Romans, being otherwise employed; and therefore the Greek historians say very little of him, any more than of his predecessors, tho' he reigned eleven years ^c.

Isidigertes.

Isidigertes succeeded Varanes, a monarch deservedly renowned for his many great virtues. He was cotemporary with Arcadius emperor of the east, with whom he lived not only in terms of peace, but of friendship; insomuch that at his death the emperor Arcadius declared him protector of his son Theodosius the second, and of the c Roman empire. Of this when Isidigertes was informed, he sent Antiochus, one of his cunuchs, a person of great wisdom and experience; to take care of his pupil's education, and by him declared to the senate of Constantinople, that he would turn the whole force of the Persian monarchy upon whomsoever should attempt to disturb the young prince's administration, whereby the empire was preserved, during a minority, in perfect quiet. As the young Theodosius grew up, the ties of friendship became stronger between the two empires, and embassies were more frequent than in former times (N). Amongst other ministers whom Theodosius made use of, Maratbas, a Mesopotamian

(M) In this note we are to render a reason for our departing in the text from all authorities, in making the successor of Sapor neither his brother nor his son, but his kinsman only; and this we shall do as briefly as is consistent with the reader's satisfaction: For, first, we will shew, that he could not be the brother of Sapor; secondly, we will shew, that he could not be his son; and, thirdly, we will reconcile our conjecture to history. If this Artaxerxes had been the brother of Sapor, he must have been older, or younger; if older, why was he not king before him? or how came so cunning and so cruel a prince, as the Romans make Sapor to be, to spare an elder brother during a reign of seventy years? Younger he could not be, since Sapor himself was a posthumous son (35). If he had been the son of Sapor, then, the historian says, he had three elder brothers, of whom Hormisdas escaped to the Romans, in the twenty-fourth year of the reign of Sapor, and he was the second son; how then could this be, especially if, as the Greek historians say, Hormisdas was married? It remains, that we account for the expression of Agathias, who expressly affirms Artaxerxes to have been the brother of Sapor; for we have set the credit of Agathias too high to be unhinged by a slight criticism. We say then, that Agathias, writing after the Persian records, retained the word brother, which the Persians, as other oriental nations do, used only in a large sense; and therefore this does not contradict, but confirm our conjecture, that Artaxerxes was the near kinsman of Sapor, and no more. The reason of our introducing this notion into our text, was the desire we had to make the history clear, plain, and consistent, which this account does. As to the story of the tent, we find it in Zonaras (36), as we found the story of Marfyas in Zosimus (37); and we take them both for fictions. Truth is always uniform, and therefore, as far as these stories are consistent with each other, and with common sense, we acknowledge them to be true; but, where they differ from these, we crave leave to differ from them. In all probability the fact was, that the family of Hormisdas settled at Constantinople, and that Artaxerxes was the next of the blood royal resident in Persia, and in a capacity of succeeding to the crown; for, as we shall see hereafter, the Persians were not scrupulous in setting aside young children.

(N) This fact is doubted of by Agathias, and he assures us, was not doubted of by him only, but by many of the learned in his time; the reason of which, he says, was the silence of cotemporary authors, and the story's being traced no higher than the writings of Procopius (38). We have however made no doubt of inserting this as a fact in our text, and we hope to give the reader satisfaction for so doing in this note. As to Procopius, if he was alone, he would be an incontestable witness; for he did not live at any great distance, neither was he one who reported things upon trust. We find this in the introduction to his history, and he says expressly, that Arcadius's will was sent to Isidigertes, and that the nomination of this prince to the tutelage of young Theodosius, preserved the empire in peace (39). All the Greek writers own, that, in the space of twenty-one

- a Mesopotamian bishop, was one, a person equally remarkable for the innocence of his life, and for the winning pleasantry of his conversation. His stay in Persia quite altered the state of the christian church in that country; for whereas before they were looked upon not only as heretics, but as very bad subjects, on account of their inclination to the Roman emperors, who were of their own religion, Maratbas so fully informed him of the true doctrines of the christian faith, that he began to entertain just ideas of the innocency and loyalty of its professors. This alarmed the Persian priests, and they instantly began to form schemes for the destruction of so wise and good a man. He had, it seems, by his prayers, cured the king of a fixed and inveterate head-ach, which induced that monarch to reverence him greatly, and for his sake his religion, without forsaking however his own. To drive the bishop from court, and to revive in the king's mind his ancient dislike to the christians, the Persian magi contrived a very whimsical expedient, which yet had well nigh effected their purpose, ridiculous as it was. They let down a man into a pit behind the sacred fire in the king's oratory, and having covered the person placed therein with carpets, they directed him, when the king came to worship, to speak the following words in a shrill voice; Impious and ungrateful prince, I will chase thee from thy throne, if thou banish not that christian, whom thou believest to be acceptable to God. Isdigertes was mightily surprized when he first heard this; but more so, when he heard it constantly repeated as often as he went to his devotions. At length he determined to send back
- b Maratbas, but with the utmost civility, as well in respect to his master as to himself; but when he came to break it to the bishop, that prelate penetrated the contrivance, and advised the king, when he next heard the voice, to order certain persons to dig in the place whence it came. Isdigertes did so; the man was discovered, the fraud detected, and the magi decimated. The king moreover granted hereupon free leave to the christians to build churches throughout his dominions, where-ever they thought fit, and freed them in all respects from the penal laws enacted against them by his predecessors.

- c Maratbas returned after this to Constantinople, and was employed a second time in an embassy to Persia. The magi hearing of his coming, had recourse to new frauds; but the king easily saw through these without assistance. They were therefore so far from preventing his giving a favourable reception to the bishop, that they engaged him to treat this prelate with still greater marks of favour than he had given him before. Maratbas had not been long in Persia, before a new opportunity offered for raising his credit with the king. The prince of Persia was thought to be possessed. This pious prelate, assisted by Abdas, whom he had consecrated bishop in Persia, joined their prayers to God for the prince's recovery; which soon after happened, to the joy of the whole court, and to the honour of the christian religion. Isdigertes governed in the whole twenty-one years, and, during that space, lived in perfect peace and friendship with the Romans, as also with the christians in his own dominions, whom he treated not only with lenity, but indulgence.

one years, which this Persian king reigned, he never attempted any thing against the Romans; but, on the contrary, lived with Theodosius in the strictest amity all his days, which seems to be a strong presumption in favour of this account. Zonaras, in his history, relates this fact without the least sign of diffidence or suspicion (40). Cedrenus doth the same, with this additional circumstance, that the emperor Arcadius bequeathed the Persian king a great sum of money for his trouble (41). As to Antiochus, all authors agree, that he was the first governor of Theodosius, and that, for a time, the empire was swayed by his counsels (42). The reason Agathias doubted the fact, seems to be his zeal for the Roman glory, which, he thought, was tarnished by the choice Arcadius made of a barbarian for the tutor of his son. Procopius informs us, that it was the high reputation of Isdigertes for wisdom and probity, which induced Arcadius to make choice of him; and for this he commends him (43). Yet Agathias himself yields a higher compliment to Isdigertes than Procopius; for if, without being his tutor, that monarch abstained from any attempts upon his dominions, merely because Theodosius was a child, he was one of the most generous princes that ever lived, and deserved the confidence of all the princes his contemporaries. The truth seems to be, that Procopius, as a man of business, a courtier and a soldier, was free from prejudice; whereas Agathias, who was a downright scholar, and lived in an age when it was fashionable to hate the Persians, could not let a story so much to their honour pass, without intimating a doubt about it (44).

Varanes,

Varanes V.

Varanes, or Vararanes, the fifth, succeeded his father Isdigertes, and seems, notwithstanding what the Greek writers affirm, to have had, in his own disposition, a great tenderness for the christians. He had not however been long upon the throne, before he found himself provoked to such a degree, as constrained him to lay aside all indulgence, and openly to persecute them. Thus it came to pass: Abdas the Persian prelate, in a high and unwarrantable fit of zeal, burnt a fire-temple to the ground. The king sent for him, and having a great respect for his person, reproved him gently, and advised him to rebuild it; which he absolutely refused to do. The christian writers universally condemn the rashness of the first act, and the prelate's constancy in the second. However, the magi resented this matter so warmly, and, by their clamour, so incensed the people, that the king was obliged to proceed to extremities, to order all the christian churches to be demolished, and to put the bishop Abdas to death. After this, a furious persecution began, on the old supposition, that such as differ in religion from their prince, cannot be loyal to his government. As for persons of quality, they were deprived of their places, had their estates confiscated, but were indulged in life and liberty, in hopes of their coming over. Hormisdas, a man descended of the ancient race of Acbemenes, after being stripped of his fortune, was reduced to keep camels for his bread. Another nobleman had his wife taken from him, and given to his slave; but these methods wrought no conversions. The meaner sort of people were still in a worse way; they were delivered over to the mercy of the priests, and consequently were subjected to an inexpressible variety of deaths and torments.

War breaks out with the

THESE things quickly occasioned differences to arise between the Persian and Roman monarchs, especially as reasons of state concurred with these religious jars. Theodosius, in the days of Isdigertes, had lent a certain number of miners, who were to be employed in working a-new some silver and gold mines, which had been long neglected in Persia. These miners Varanes had refused to send home; and therefore, as well on this account, as because multitudes of christians fled out of Persia into the dominions of Theodosius, both parties began to prepare for war. The king of Persia made choice of one Narfes for his general, and sent him to his frontiers, where he expected to have found a numerous army: but he was mistaken; the troops were not come to the place of rendezvous; and, before they could be assembled, the Roman general Ardaburius, marching through Armenia, fell into Azazene, a Persian province, and began to waste it with fire and sword. Narfes no sooner received this news, than he instantly marched to give him battle with the forces he had about him. The consequence was, that the Persian was worsted; but being an able captain, made a good retreat. He saw, that it was now impossible to prevent the destruction of Azazene by force; and therefore, returning back to the place of rendezvous, whither by this time the Persian troops were come, he, at the head of a very numerous army, made an irruption into Mesopotamia, a Roman province, which obliged the Roman general quickly to return, and as quickly to block up Nisibis, the principal fortrefs which the Persians had on that side. Narfes finding himself disappointed, for he conceived, that the Romans would immediately have given him battle a second time, resolved, if it was possible, to provoke them to fight. With this view he sent a message to Ardaburius, telling him, That, if he would appoint a day, he would be ready to meet him in the field. But Ardaburius wisely answered, That the Romans fought when they pleased themselves, and not when their enemies thought it for their advantage. Varanes, in the mean time, had solicited the Saracens to break with the Romans; and they very readily complied, their captain Alamundarus being naturally an enemy to the Romans. This man, having raised a prodigious army, promised the Persian king to perform wonders, at least to reduce Antioch and Syria under his power; neither meant he to perform less than he promised, for, passing the Euphrates, he broke, like a torrent, into the Roman province; but beginning to plunder without mercy, the people recovered their spirits, and joining the Roman army, fell upon Alamundarus in his march, and cut to pieces a hundred thousand men, which forced the remainder of the Saracens to fly with shame into their own country. When this news reached the ear of the Persian monarch, with this further circumstance, that Nisibis was so closely pressed, that it could not long hold out, he determined to put all things to the risk, and to march to the relief of

- a that city, with the whole force of Persia. This resolution once taken, Varanes instantly put it in execution, directing all his troops in the frontier provinces to rendezvous at a certain time, and marched immediately with an army he had collected from the nine provinces of Persia, together with his elephants, that his presence might influence all the necessary preparations. His design succeeded perfectly well; for by that time he entered Mesopotamia, all his generals were arrived; so that he advanced towards Nisibis with a prodigious army. The Romans hearing of his approach, the number of elephants he brought with him, and his mighty strength in cavalry, were seized with a sudden panic, and, without staying for his coming, raised the siege, and fled. This was highly pleasing to Varanes, who thinking now the worst was over,
- b retired to his capital, and left his generals to manage the war. Herein he acted incautiously and unhappily; for the Romans recovering their spirits, defeated the Persians in a pitched battle, repulsed the Saracens a second time, and, under the command of Ardaburius, beat the Persian forces, with the slaughter not only of a great number of men, but of seven generals. However, Varanes continued the war, and being himself a prince of great firmness, and much military skill, he found means to make even victories disadvantageous to the Romans; for, by keeping a court on the frontiers, repairing his armies by constant supplies, and preserving his magazines in good order, he kept the enemy still on the defensive; and as they found it difficult to recruit, all actions that were bloody, were favourable to the Persians, tho' they
- c were beaten. The emperor Theodosius, perfectly sensible of the situation of things, sent Helion, a person of great distinction, with a large body of troops, to reinforce his army, directing him to enter into a negotiation with Varanes, and to conclude a peace, if possible. Helion pursuing his instructions, and finding the Roman army intrenched, sent Maximin, the colleague of Ardaburius, to offer Varanes peace, on certain conditions. Varanes ordered Maximin to be conducted to the tent of one of his principal officers, and, in the mean time, held a council of war, wherein it was resolved immediately to attack the Romans in their camp; and, in case they were repulsed, to accept the terms offered by Maximin. There was in the Persian army a corps of troops, distinguished by the title of immortal, because their number was
- d continually kept up to ten thousand men, by draughts out of other corps. This body of troops took upon themselves this dangerous piece of service, which however they reckoned would prove the less so, if they could take the Romans unprovided. In order to this they divided themselves, and while five thousand attacked the intrenchments, the other five thousand formed behind a hill, waiting there for an opportunity to attack the Romans in flank. But their enterprize miscarried; for Procopius, a Roman general, observing the troops that were formed behind the hill, marched round with a great body of forces, and getting between them and those who attacked the Roman camp, charged them on all sides with incredible fury; so that the victory was quickly determined on the side of the Romans, with a prodigious slaughter of
- e the Persian soldiery. Varanes then condescended to hear Maximin; and when that officer had explained to him his master's demands, he told him, That, for his sake, he would be content to make peace on those terms, and to put an end to the severities exercised upon the christians. An accident however happened, which carried this matter much farther, and contributed more than the peace between the two empires to the re-establishment of christianity in Persia. It was this: When the province of Azazene was ravaged by the Romans in the beginning of the war, seven thousand Persians were brought prisoners to the city of Amida, where they fell into extreme want. Acases, bishop of that place, having assembled his clergy, represented to them in the most pathetic terms the misery of these unhappy prisoners. He then
- f observed, that as the Almighty preferred mercy to sacrifice, so he would certainly be better pleased with the relief of these his creatures, than with being served in gold and silver vessels in their churches. The clergy entertained this motion not only with readiness, but with applause, sold all the consecrated vessels, and having maintained the Persians during the war, sent the whole seven thousand home, at the conclusion of the peace, with money in their pockets. Varanes was so much astonished at this, that he sent to invite the bishop to his capital, where he received him with the utmost reverence, and did the christians many favours at his request. After this, Varanes enjoyed peace as long as he lived; and having reigned twenty years, died, beloved and honoured by his subjects.

Varanes VI.
Year of Christ
442.

To Varanes the fifth succeeded Varanes the sixth, or, as he is called by some authors, Isdigerdes. It is not probable that he ever broke the peace made by his father with the Romans; inasmuch as we meet with nothing concerning him in any of the Greek historians, further than that he was cotemporary with Theodosius the second, and his successor Martianus, and that he reigned seventeen years and four months.

Peroses.
Year of Christ

Perosès succeeded his father Varanes or Isdigerdes. He was a prince of a restless and turbulent spirit, and could not bear that the Hunns, who, at this time, began to be terrible, as well to his subjects as to those of the Constantinopolitan emperors, should inroach, as they daily did, upon his dominions. Those he had to do with, were distinguished by the name of Eutbalites, or white Hunns, and were much more civilized than the rest, as living in cities, and under a certain form of government; which the rest of their nation did not. To rid himself of those neighbours, Peroses marched at the head of a great army, after having carefully settled the affairs of his empire, and done all that in him lay to secure its peace in his absence. Gonza was the capital of the nation he attacked, and lay directly north of Persia. Peroses marched strait thither, hoping to put an end to the war by a general action. But the Eutbalites, or Nepthalites, as some authors call them, were wiser. They knew that a wasted country was not lost; and therefore retiring continually, they drew Peroses and his army so far into their territories, as to cut off their retreat, and, at the same time, to hinder them from receiving provisions. The distress of the Persians was so great, and the soldiers were so enfeebled and dispirited, that they were constrained to accept any conditions that were offered them. The king of the Eutbalites being informed of their condition, sent to acquaint Peroses, that if he had a mind to deliver himself and his army, he might do it upon these terms, viz: Swearing never to invade the Eutbalites, and coming to do homage to him as his lord. To the first of these Peroses readily yielded; but the last seemed intolerable. At last the magi, who were about his person, proposed to him an expedient, which removed all difficulties. This expedient was, that he should go pay his compliments to the king of the Eutbalites at sun-rising, when his prostrating himself would be understood by that king as an act of submission; but by himself would be conceived to be no more than an act of reverence to the sun. This expedient was approved, and carried instantly into execution. The king of the Eutbalites was satisfied, and Peroses, with the remainder of his army, returned back into Persia. As soon as he had a little settled his affairs, and had leisure to look about him, the Persian monarch, unmindful of his oath, provided for a second expedition against the Hunns. He took however more prudent measures than before; that is, he not only raised a very numerous army, but he likewise took care to be well furnished with provisions. He also settled his domestic concerns in the best manner possible; and leaving the prince his son regent of the kingdom, he began his march a second time towards the northern frontiers of his empire. The Eutbalites supposing, as they very well might, that Peroses would expect to penetrate, as he did before, into the heart of their country, carried off their effects, but concealed their forces behind certain mountains, from whence issuing suddenly on all sides of the Persian army, they totally routed it, and, at their leisure, killed or made prisoners almost all the soldiers of whom it was composed, amongst whom Peroses himself perished, when he had worn the Persian diadem twenty years (O).

(O) The story of Peroses is related at large by Procopius, in the beginning of his memoirs of the Persian war. He informs us, that, in his first expedition, the Persian monarch carried with him a certain Roman ambassador, whose name was Eusebius, a discreet person, and one equally beloved by the king and by his nobility. Him therefore, when the Persian generals had discovered the miserable situation they were in, they made choice of to break the matter to Peroses, that, before it was too late, some method might be taken to extricate them out of their misfortunes. Eusebius having artfully drawn the king into a discourse of the present state of mind necessary in great distresses, and being desired to speak his mind freely of the state they were now in, he told Peroses this story: A lion once saw a kid tied at a distance, and, pressed by hunger, leaped at it with all his force; but, falling short of his prey, he dropped into a pit, which had been prepared for him, and out of which all his force could not deliver him. Peroses easily comprehended the drift of this fable, and, by the advice of his magi, acted as the reader hath been told above. In his second expedition, Peroses wanted such an adviser, otherwise he had not fallen as he did. The enemy, it seems, having timely notice of his intention, spent many months in digging a vast ditch in the midst of a plain, and in removing all the earth which was thrown out of it. In the middle they

- a WHEN the Persians had received advice of the disastrous death of their king, they made choice of his brother Obalas, or, as he is usually called by the Greek writers, Valens, not caring to trust so young a person as Cavades then was, with the reins of government, tho' his father had left him regent. This Valens proved an excellent prince, tender, compassionate, just, affable, and desirous of assuaging, as far as he might, the misery of his country, almost wholly subjected by the Euthalites, to whom, for two years, he paid tribute, and with whom, for two others, he held war. At length, worn out with cares, he died, after a short and troublesome reign of four years, the less regretted by his subjects, on account of his being a man peaceably disposed, and therefore very unfit to restore the ancient lustre of the kingdom ⁹ (P).
- b Cavades, or, as he is frequently called, Cabades, ascended the throne on the demise of his uncle. He was a prince of a high spirit; one who loved war, and understood it; ready to undertake any thing for the extending his dominion, and jealous to the last degree of his authority, and the glory of the Persian name. At first these qualities were extremely useful to his subjects; for, in all probability, had they not been governed by so warlike and enterprising a prince, they had never recovered their independency, but had sunk under the weight of those continual invasions made upon them by the Euthalites, whom no tribute could content, no treaties restrain. Against these enemies Cavades set himself with great resolution; and, making use of the same policy which they had done towards his father, drew them, by small bodies, in hopes of plunder, far into his country, and, in their return, cut them off. When, by this means, they were cured of their practice of invading, he turned his arms upon them; but warily, sustaining one body of troops by another, that by a third, wintering sometimes in their country, till at last he quite broke their spirits, and obliged them to own him for their sovereign, whom they thought to have had for their subject. This war finished, Cavades, from being terrible to his enemies, became no less so to his subjects. His enterprising, restless genius, incapable of brooking any restraints, put him upon altering the constitution of his kingdom, and depriving all the nobility of those privileges and prerogatives, which they had enjoyed under his predecessors. He likewise became intolerably proud, would scarce allow any of them to enter his
- c presence, or advise him in his affairs; but acted with such an arbitrary fierceness, as would have given a very bad colour to his proceedings, had they been really just in themselves. At length he pushed his extravagancy so far, as to publish an edict, whereby all the women in the empire were declared common to all the men therein. This the Persian nobility thought too much to be endured; and therefore they instantly assembled, seized on the person of the king, deposed him, and cast him into prison, supposing that less than this could not secure themselves in safety, or the kingdom in peace. This happened after he had reigned eleven years, and appears to have been as total a revolution as ever happened in any kingdom, there being they left a narrow neck of land, and having covered this mighty ditch with hurdles, they strewed these with mold, and covered them with grass plots. This done, they drew all their forces, on the approach of Peroses, into a line of battle before the ditch, and, as the Persian troops advanced, they drew off in close order crows the neck of land. The Persian cavalry following them with great fury, pushed each other into the ditch, and so became a sacrifice to this incensed people. Peroses is said to have had no less than thirty sons grown up to man's estate, who all perished with him here, Cavades being left at home, on account of his youth, and that the kingdom might be preserved to the immediate offspring of Peroses (45).

(P) There cannot be any thing more perplexed than the accounts given us by the Greek writers of these white Huns, who, for a time, so terribly distressed the Persians. Procopius, who speaks more at large of them than any other writer, calls them Ephthalites, and says, they inhabited a country to the north of Persia. Their chief city, according to him, was Gorgo, on the very frontiers of Persia (46). Agathias calls these people Nephthalites. They are generally agreed to have been the same people, who, in other ancient authors, are called Indo-Scythia (47). All this will give the reader but very little, if any light at all. From the Oriental historians we learn, that their true name was Haiathalites, and that they possessed a large tract of country between the Indies and Persia, till they began to make incroachments on the country last-mentioned, after they had made choice of Balkh for their metropolis (48). This is plain and intelligible to every man that is acquainted with the Oriental geography; and we shall make the whole history of this war much more uniform and perspicuous, when we come to speak of it from the memoirs of the Eastern writers. At present this is sufficient to demonstrate the great utility of these comparisons, despised only by such as either cannot, or are unwilling to be at the pains necessary to such an undertaking.

Zambades.
Year of Christ

Zambades, whom some call Blases, others Lamases, and who is by some said to have been the son, by others the brother of Peroses, consequently the uncle or brother of Cavades, was elected king in his stead. The first thing the new king did was to assemble a general council of the nobility, in which he desired they would consider and determine what should be done with Cavades. The people had before declared, that they considered the person of their prince as sacred; however, the council were very much divided, especially when Gusanastades, who was possessed of the highest office in the kingdom, drew a little knife out of his pocket, with which he was wont to pare his nails; and when he had made them take notice of the smallness of its blade, This, b said he, properly applied now, will do what twenty thousand men will not be able to do, if you let this opportunity slip. At last it was unanimously determined, that the king should for his unworthy administration of the government suffer perpetual imprisonment, and be for ever forgotten by his people, whose allegiance from thenceforwards was to be transferred to Zambades. This prince had indeed all the properties necessary to give lustre to a crown justly attained. He was equally wise and indulgent, desirous of restoring order, and of making the people happy; he applied himself with great industry to remedy those evils, which had taken birth from his predecessor's conduct and example. But while he was thus employed, a new storm arose, which after throwing the whole kingdom into violent convulsions, at length produced a second c revolution. Thus it happened^r.

THE keeper of the castle, in which Cavades was imprisoned, became enamoured of his queen, who alone remained attached to him in all his misfortunes, and who failed not to bring him necessaries with her own hands, though she was not permitted to see him. With much ado however she procured leave to write to him, and having acquainted him with the situation of things, Cavades by letter directed her to sooth the passion of his gaoler, in order to get admittance to him. This the lady did so effectually, that she had access to her husband when she pleased, and thereby an opportunity of acquainting him that he had still one friend left, who was ready to undertake any thing for his service. The name of this man was Seoses, a person of quality, d who had a great number of dependents, among whom he collected a troop fit to attend the king where-ever he should think fit, when he should be once safely out of the castle. The care of this the queen took upon herself; for staying, as she often did, late in the evening, she dressed the king in her cloaths, wherein he went out, and having put on his, remained in his stead. As she pretended to be sick, and not to leave her bed for some days, the cheat was not discovered, so that Cavades had time enough given him to save himself, which he did in the company of Seoses, and his friends, who conducted him quite through Persia into the territories of the Euthalites, whose king received him with great honour, and readily granted him his protection. As for the queen, there is nothing said of her fate with certainty; however, e historians intimate, that more of resentment than of pity was shewn in the treatment towards her. As for Cavades, the king of the Euthalites entertained him splendidly, treated him as his good friend and ally, and gave him his daughter in marriage. After this the Persian king began to hold correspondence with some of the nobility, and finding or believing he found in his people a propensity to receive him once more as their sovereign, he persuaded his father-in-law to furnish him with an army; and this favour being readily accorded to him, he no sooner saw the troops in a readiness, than he put himself at their head, and marched directly into Persia^r.

Cavades entered first into the province, of which Gusanastades, who had threatened his life, was governor; where he instantly caused proclamation to be made, that f this man, as a rebel, stood deprived of his charge, and that himself would instantly confer it on him, who should first pay his duty to him on a day assigned. His friends represented to the king, that this was innovating the established laws, which fixed the governments of provinces in certain houses. Cavades however affected to remain firm; but at the day conferred the office of governor upon Adergunabades, a young nobleman next of kin to the deprived governor, who, as it was concerted, paid his compliments to him first. After this he proceeded to the capital of Persia, and a repossessed himself of the throne almost as easily as he had been ejected. His conduct upon this extraordinary change in his affairs was suitable to the fierceness of his temper. Zambades he deprived of sight, and imprisoned, after he had for four years worn the royal title. Gufanastades he put to death; and that his restoration might be adorned with one act of generosity amidst so much severity, he erected a new office for his friend Sesajès, whom he made lieutenant general of his kingdom.

b It was not long before the king of the Eutbalites pressed his son-in-law to repay the great sums of money he had lent him. Cavades found he had it not in his power to comply with his demand, and therefore desired Anastafius, then emperor of the east, to accommodate him with the sum he wanted, offering to pay interest for it, which was refused. Cavades readily conceiving that there was now no way to avoid breaking with his father-in-law, but by making war upon the Romans, chose this as the lesser evil of the two; and having a considerable body of forces about him, made a sudden irruption into Armenia, preventing by the quickness of his march, the very report of his expedition. By this method he answered his purpose; for the inhabitants having no time to withdraw their effects, he raised excessive contributions; after which he besieged Amida, the principal fortress in those parts, in form. As the province had for many years enjoyed a profound peace, the city was wholly unprovided either of garison, or of magazines; however the citizens refused to open their gates, and prepared to make an obstinate defence. Cavades, who delighted in war, and who understood it perfectly well, practised all the methods then in use for reducing fortified places, but in vain; at length, however, when he and his principal commanders were almost in despair, a tower was surprized by the supine negligence of certain monks on the eightieth day from the commencement of the siege. At first Cavades suffered his soldiers to put the inhabitants to the sword. A citizen thereupon told him, it was unworthy of a hero to put those to death who were unable to resist. Why then, said the king, did you pretend to treat me as an enemy? Because, said the citizen, it was the will of God to deliver Amida, not to your will, but to your valour. Cavades, charmed with this compliment, ordered the citizens to be spared. Some time afterwards he restored to them their privileges, directed the walls and public buildings to be repaired, and leaving therein Glones, a Persian nobleman, with a garison of a thousand men, he treated it afterwards rather as a benefactor than a conqueror.

c As soon as the news of this invasion reached Rome, the emperor took the necessary precautions for assembling an army, which was accordingly done; and orders were given them to march to the frontiers with all imaginable expedition. The Greek writers tell us, that there never were better forces sent against the Persians, than this army was composed of, or generals of greater reputation. Cavades on his side took the field early, and being informed that the Roman officers differed among themselves, and had divided their forces into several independent corps, he resolved to attack them as speedily as he could. He first fell upon Ariobindus, who on the approach of the Persians shamefully abandoned his camp, and fled to an adjacent city. Eight hundred Eutbalites, who were the forlorn hope of Cavades's army, in their next march fell in with a considerable body of Roman troops, commanded by Hypatius, and were by them intirely cut to pieces on the side of a river, the stream of which they dyed with their blood. It was not long before the Persian monarch arrived on its banks, where guessing by the colour of the water what had happened, he immediately conceived that he should find the Romans secure and unprovided. Whereupon, instead of making a halt, he pushed on with his cavalry; and, as he conjectured, finding the Romans eating, drinking, and washing themselves in the river, he severely revenged the death of his friends, by putting almost this whole body of Romans to death without any resistance.

f UPON the heels of this victory, he received advice of the Huns having broken into the northern provinces of his empire; upon which he was obliged to return with his whole army into Persia, whence he happily expelled those barbarous invaders. While Cavades was thus employed, things on the frontiers went not altogether so well, tho' not at all less honourably for the Persians. After the departure of the army, the Romans in several bodies drew nearer to Amida, in order to streighten its garison, and to prevent its receiving provisions. They likewise found means to betray Glones the Perſian commander into an ambuſcade, wherein himſelf and two hundred horſe were cut to pieces. This was not only a very unfortunate accident for the garriſon in point of the loſs they ſuſtained of their governor, and a fifth part of their forces, but it was alſo fatal in its conſequences, by reaſon of its reſtraining them from making any excuſions, in order to fill their magazines. The command devolved upon the ſon of Glones, a young man, but an excellent officer, and one who acquired a greater reputation by loſing this city, than his maſter had done by gaining it. After a long blockade, in which, though the Romans did little, the Perſians ſuffered much, being conſtrained to feed on the vileſt and moſt nauſeous things to ſatisfy their hunger, while the provisions in their magazines remained untouched, in order to ſerve another purpoſe, hopes of ſuccour being loſt, the governor entered into a treaty with the Romans for the delivery of the city. During this treaty large diſtributions were made from the magazines; whence the Roman officers-conceiving that the beſieged had ſtill plenty of provisions, they agreed to let the garriſon march out, and to carry with them all that they had, giving alſo to the governor a vaſt ſum of money for ſurrendering a place, which in a few days muſt have fallen into their hands, with all that was in it. Some time after a truce for ſeven years was concluded between the Romans and Perſians, and hoſtages given on both ſides for its being duly kept, which afforded Cava- des leiſure to purſue his wars againſt the Hunns ^a (Q).

IN theſe he had his uſual ſucceſs; yet all his foreign victories could not ſecure to him peace or tranquillity in his family. He had three ſons, Caofes, Zames, and Cbofroes, the laſt of whom he deſigned for his ſucceſſor. Caofes the eldeſt is ſaid to have been a prince of merit; neither are we told why his father at firſt diſliked him. But ſo it was, that conceiving againſt him a moſt violent hatred, he reſolved to deprive him of the ſucceſſion. Zames had the miſfortune to be blind of an eye, on which account, by the laws of Perſia, he was incapable of reigning. Cbofroes very much reſembled his father in temper, fierce, warlike, and ambitious; he was continually contriving great things, and addreſſed himſelf with as much diligence to achieve them, as with facility he had planned them in his head. On this young prince Cava- des repoſed his hopes, and being deſirous to eſtabliſh him in a more glorious ſituation than any of his predeceſſors, he entered into a negotiation with Juſtin, who had ſucceeded Anaſtaſius in the empire, in order to induce him to adopt Cbofroes. At firſt this motion was well entertained at Conſtantinople, but by degrees the emperor was perſuaded that it might be injurious to his family, and his ſubjects, which determined him againſt it. However, commissioners met on both ſides, to treat of a laſting peace, and to ſettle the boundaries of the two empires. For this important buſineſs, Cava- des made choice of Seſoſes, whom he had raiſed to the principal offices in his kingdom, and Mebodes, a military officer of great experience. On the other hand, the emperor Juſtin ſent Hypatius, the nephew of his predeceſſor, and Rufinus, a man of great quality. After frequent conferences, diſputes aroſe; and it being propoſed to adopt Cbofroes in a new and particular manner as a barbarian, that prince conceived ſuch a diſpleaſure thereat, as induced him to manifeſt an irreconcilable hatred to the Romans. The conferences being broken off, Mebodes, at their return to court, charged Seſoſes with having contributed to the miſcarriage of their negotiation. He was likewiſe accuſed for burying his wife contrary to the law of Perſia, whereby all dead bodies were expoſed to the fowls of the air. On theſe pretences he was tried, and

(Q.) While Cava- des made uſe of the peace ſubſiſting between him and the Romans to carry on war on his oppoſite frontier, in order effectually to quell the barbarous nations inhabiting on that ſide, the Greek writers tell us, that there happened an event, which effectually reconciled this prince to the Chriſtians, to whom hitherto he had not only been averſe, but even an open enemy. Of this remarkable event we have the following account. Cava- des came with his army before a certain caſtle on the frontiers of India, called Tzudader. This was filled with immenſe riches of all ſorts, and kept by a garriſon, not of men, but of evil ſpirits. Cava- des employed to no purpoſe his own magi, the prieſts of the Jews, and other religious perſons, in exorcizing this infernal guard. At length the Chriſtian biſhop undertook and effected what the king deſired; for he expelled the dæmons, and delivered the caſtle, with all its riches, to Cava- des. Henceforwards the Chriſtian biſhops had acceſs to the king, and when their preſence was neceſſary, were called to council, inſtead of the Jewiſh and Manichean prieſts, who till then had enjoyed his favour. There is ſuch an air of fable in this relation, that we could not think of inserting it in our text; and yet, as it is to be found in more than one Greek author, we did not think fit to paſs it over in ſilence (49).

- a adjudged worthy of death. Cavades expressed a mighty sorrow for his friend, but was grown so tender of the laws, that he would not hinder their course. In this manner died Sesofes, and with him that high office, which had been created on purpose to gratify his pretensions^a.

Justinian having succeeded Justin in the empire of the east, pursued also his politics, in causing all the frontiers towards Persia to be surveyed, the old fortresses repaired, and new ones erected, as the situation of the country required. With this view he sent instructions to those who commanded on the frontiers of Mesopotamia to fortify Min-done, the nearest place in the Roman territories to Nisibis; and a body of troops under the command of Culzes and Buzes, brothers, were sent to protect the workmen. The Persians, who could not look but with an evil eye on the progress of this structure, just in their neighbourhood, took a proper opportunity, when the Roman forces did not observe exact discipline, to fall upon them; and after defeating, cut most of them to pieces, together with many of the workmen, demolished the place, and sent the prisoners into Persia, where Cavades employed them in his buildings. This stroke opened a new war, for the carrying on of which the Persians took the field with a very numerous army under the command of Perofes, who had under him several generals of reputation. On the other hand, Belisarius had the command of the Roman forces. After some preparatory motions, the armies came to a general engagement, in which, after a very obstinate resistance, the Persians were defeated with very great slaughter. Yet the Romans gained little ground by this victory; for the Persian generals, being supplied with fresh forces, continued to keep the field; only they contented themselves with slight excursions, and did not pretend to give the Romans battle a second time^b.

In Armenia things went no better; for Mermeroes, who commanded the Persian forces in chief, was twice defeated by Deritbeus the Roman general. Two castles, and certain districts dependent upon them, fell also under the power of the Romans, and in these districts were the gold mines belonging to the king of Persia. The Tzani, a free and barbarous people, were the chief occasion of these losses; for they now embraced the party of the Romans, and in consequence thereof, possessed themselves of the gold which belonged to the Persian king; at which the Romans were not ill pleased, and Cavades was constrained to be content, his forces not being numerous enough to reduce them; besides, his generals, Narjes and Aratius, deserted, and with all their families, and much wealth, retired to Constantinople. This situation of things did not at all discourage Cavades, who, when Rufinus, the Roman ambassador, came to treat with him of peace, adhered to his first demands; and when the ambassador had his audience of leave, insinuated to him, that if ever he departed from them, it must be in consideration of a large sum of money. To restore the lustre of his arms, he set several new armies on foot, disgraced Perofes, and gave the command of the army, which he intended to send into the Roman territories, to Azarethas, a very valiant man, and who well understood the duty of his charge. This general made an irruption into the country bordering on the Euphrates, and finding himself superior in force to Belisarius, wasted all before him with fire and sword. The Roman soldiery saw this with indignation, and notwithstanding the visible disparity of numbers, and other disadvantages, clamorously urged Belisarius to give the enemy battle; he declined it as long as he could; but at length, by the near approach of the enemy, and the obstinacy of his own troops, was forced to fight. The Persian general knew exactly the advantages he had, and improved them to the utmost, so that the Romans were defeated with very great slaughter. However, Belisarius, with the remains of his army, so well covered the country, that the Persians were not able to take any place of importance; for which Azarethas on his return to court, notwithstanding his victory, fell into disgrace^c.

The war still continued, Mermeroes had the command of the Persian army given him; and as Belisarius was recalled in order to be employed against the Vandals, he found it not so difficult a matter to deal with his successors; but after deceiving the Roman generals by certain marches, and counter-marches, he at last invested the city of Martyropolis, a place of the last importance to the Roman empire, and in sight of their armies carried on the siege in form. Sittas, who commanded for the emperor

Justinian, finding that himself and his colleagues were able to do little good by force, ^a began with better success to practise some of the frauds of war; for having found a person fit for his purpose, and having thoroughly taught him his lesson, he sent him into the Persian army, where coming privately to Mermers, he acquainted him, that the Massagetae, whom Cavades had hired to fall into the Roman territories, had accepted a sum of money from Justinian, and were on the point of invading Persia. This greatly intimidated Mermers, engaged him first to turn his siege into a blockade, and afterwards to consent to a truce with the Romans; which was the reason that the Massagetae, who remained firm to the Persian interest, made only a short incursion, and returned without doing much good to themselves, or hurt to the Romans. ^d

his younger son.

In the mean time Cavades, who was oppressed with years, and whose activity had ^b been drawn upon him in his declining age many infirmities, began to feel the approach of death (R). Upon this he sent for Mebodes, his confident and minister, to whom having explained the reasons, why he desired to have Chosroes for his successor, he put his will, which contained the same things, into his hands, conjuring him to use his utmost endeavours to see it executed; which Mebodes then solemnly promised, and afterwards punctually performed. Thus died Cavades, after reigning thirty years from the time of his restoration, forty-one in the whole, and forty-five, if we take in the time of his imprisonment and exile. As soon as he was expired, Caoses, his eldest son, took upon him the title of king; but Mebodes interposed, representing that the crown of Persia was never to be taken by stealth; that an assembly of ^c the nobles was necessary to recognize his title, and that until this was done, his subjects could not lawfully obey him. Upon this an assembly was called, but whether by Caoses or Mebodes, does not appear. In this assembly the will of the king was produced and read, and such a regard was paid by the nobility to his memory, that the claim of Caoses was set aside, and Chosroes, in virtue of his father's designation, declared monarch of Persia. ^(S).

(R) It is evident from this part of the Persian history, which is more entertaining, and fuller of events, than the foregoing, that this people were at this time not only numerous and warlike, but prudent also, and polite. The Roman authors, for so after the oriental custom we call those who treat of the Roman empire, are not fond of owning this; but affect to attribute all the success of the Persians to their vast armies, their sudden incursions, and the little respect which their monarchs had to treaties, and to oaths. One thing however is certain, that the Roman emperors paid constantly certain subsidies to the Persian kings; and this seems to be a very strong proof of the prowess of those monarchs, since it was not the custom of those times to pay subsidies for nothing. This was one of the great causes of the wars which so frequently happened between these empires. As often as the Roman empire was in disorder, or had a pacific prince upon the throne, the Persian received these subsidies; but when the Romans were in a good condition, or a martial prince was at their head, then they were stopped, and of course the Persians began their incursions, till either they were beaten by the Roman armies, or bought off again with Roman money. On the other hand, it must be owned, that when ambitious and turbulent princes wore the Persian diadem, scarce any thing could content them. They knew well, that the Constantinopolitan empire could not for any length of time support a war with Persia, because of the immense expence to which it was put, by keeping a great army on the frontiers. Whenever therefore one of these princes wanted money, he began a war, and as soon as the Romans would come up to his price, he sold them a peace. Hitherto we have explained the Persian history and chronology; we intend this note as a key to their politics.

(S) Most of the Greek historians are silent as to the reasons which induced Cavades so vehemently to oppose the succession of his eldest son. It appears from what Procopius says, that it was not any sudden fit of anger, or the effect of the peevishness of old age, but a settled resolution, which he had taken many years before (50). We are obliged to Theophanes for unravelling in some measure this mystery, since from him we learn, that Cavades was jealous of the Manichees, who were in great favour with this son, and who were supposed to have drawn him to their party; for which great numbers of them, together with their bishop, suffered death (51). We are likewise told elsewhere, that these heretics, having once drawn Caoses to favour them, were next very impatient to hoist him to the throne, even before the death of his father; which intrigues of theirs were fatal to them, and to him. To them, in drawing on a persecution, which they might otherwise have avoided. To him, in that it deprived him of his birth-right, as well as that of his father's affection. It is very probable, that these schemes were chiefly in the heads of the Manichees, and their priests, and that Caoses had very little, if any, knowledge of them; for if it had been otherwise, it will be difficult to assign a cause why he escaped, or at least how he came to remain still in the kingdom, nay even at court, and in a condition to appear as a competitor with Chosroes on the death of his father. It has also the appearance of reason, that the true ground of rejecting him, and of exalting Chosroes, was the diffidence the nobility might have of him as to his religion. For it appears from the history of Agathias, that the magi

- a Chosroes being settled on the Persian throne, quickly received an embassy from Justinian, composed of several persons of distinction, at the head of whom was Rufinus. The intent of this embassy was not only to compliment the king on his accession, but also to treat of peace. Chosroes, who was a prince of quick parts, received the first kindly, and entered readily into the second; but when they came to adjust the articles of the peace, then it was he discovered his true intention, by insisting that a sum of money should be given him; that the pretensions of the Persians and Roman should be thoroughly canvassed, and finally settled; all places taken on either side restored, and this peace declared to be perpetual. Some delays happened in the negotiations, and a report being spread that Justinian had put Rufinus to death, who, at the request of the Persian king, had returned to Constantinople for instructions, Chosroes instantly took the field with a mighty army, which struck such a terror, that the inhabitants began to retire from the villages in all the frontier provinces, supposing that the war would become more bloody than ever. But before Chosroes proceeded to hostilities, Rufinus arrived, and perfected the treaty; whereupon the Persians retired, and the inhabitants of the frontier provinces returned to their habitations.

- The morning of this great prince's reign, like that of his father, was not only darkened with flying clouds, but its lustre in danger of being totally obscured. The Persian nobles, perceiving that Chosroes had much in him of the same spirit which had made Cavadès terrible to his subjects, when he ascended the throne, determined amongst themselves to procure their own safety at the expence of the king's, by deposing him, and setting up in his stead one more tractable. This was Zames the brother of Chosroes. The law incapacitated him from being king, but they had a salvo for that; he had a son, whose name was Cavadès, who was extremely like his grandfather; him they intended to proclaim king, and to vest the regal authority in Zames, as his tutor and protector. Into this scheme, when it was communicated to Zames, he readily came, and promised the conspirators to act in all things according to their councils. As Chosroes made it a rule throughout his life to spare no money for intelligence, so it was not long before he was informed of all these machinations. He suffered them however to go on, that he might by this means discover who were, and who were not, devoted to his service; for as he had the troops intirely at his devotion, and knew every step his enemies took, he was not in any great pain for his own safety. When things grew ripe for execution, he seized the conspirators at once, and had no sooner seized them, than he put them to death. His executions were as wide as the conspiracy; he had no idea of reconciling traitors; but every man, who had the least share therein, or the least knowledge thereof, paid for it with his life.

- The young Cavadès alone escaped, and escaped only by accident. He was not in the king's power immediately, being brought up by Adargudunbades, to whom therefore Chosroes dispatched orders to put him out of the way. This extremely grieved the good old man, who had educated him as carefully as if he had been his own son; but the royal orders, and the royal safety, were things not to be trifled with. But when he came to acquaint his wife with the command he had received from court, she, who had nursed Cavadès, forgot all concerns, but for his safety; and as her husband was naturally inclined to pity the unfortunate child, she prevailed upon him to think of concealing the youth in their house, and to dispatch a messenger to court to inform Chosroes that his orders had been exactly complied with. This was happily executed for Cavadès, who thereby escaped a death he no way deserved. It was no less prudently conducted by his wife and generous protector, who intrusted none with the secret but his eldest son, and an old servant. In process of time, when Cavadès magi had not only a great influence in all affairs civil and ecclesiastical, but that in the recognition of kings especially, they had a sort of negative voice. Agathias, and indeed all the Greek writers, censure this influence in terms, that shew that they did not understand it (51). The Persian magi did not interfere as clergymen, but as men of learning and experience. Politics was with them a science, not learned, as amongst us, by a long observance of events, but by contemplation of certain maxims, and by acquiring a skill of applying these to the management of public affairs. It is not our business here to enter into any farther detail of this matter, which we mentioned only to prevent the reader's being tinged with the prejudice of the Greeks. He who would be further acquainted with this curious subject, may consult the learned book of the president Briffon; as also the no less learned and curious treatise of the celebrated lord Bacon, written in imitation of the magical policy of the Persians.

was grown to years of discretion, Adergudunbades furnished him with a considerable sum of money, advised him to retire out of Persia, and to be careful of his safety, and his own. Sometime afterwards Varrhames, this nobleman's eldest son, discovered this secret to Chosroes, and produced the servant who was privy to it. The king, who was then employed in an expedition against the Hunns, sent instantly for Adergudunbades to attend him. That excellent man, being now far in years, fell through weakness from his horse, as he hastened to attend Chosroes, and broke his thigh. The king being informed of it, ordered him to be sent to a certain castle, under pretence of taking care of his cure, but in truth to have him privately murdered; which was done, and his office given to his son Varrhames (T). As for Cavadēs, he retired to Constantinople, where he was treated by the emperor Justinian with all the respect due to his birth. We have digressed a little, in order to follow so remarkable a transaction to its close; let us now return to the thread of our history ^b.

As a peace with the Romans was at first very convenient to Chosroes, so he very faithfully observed it; and when he was informed of the victories obtained by Belisarius in Africa, he sent ambassadors to congratulate Justinian thereupon; and by way of raillery, directed them to tell the emperor, that he had a right to share the spoils of his enemies, since, had he not been at peace with Persia, he could not have had either forces or leisure to make these conquests in Africa. Justinian received these ambassadors kindly, assured them of his great affection for their master, and on hearing his message, presented Chosroes with a considerable sum of money. But this fair correspondence did not last long. The Saracens, encouraged by the Persian king, made several incursions into the Roman territories; of which when Justinian by his ambassadors made loud complaints, Chosroes returned for answer, that he believed what they alledged was not altogether without foundation; but that he could scarce believe his brother Justinian took this amiss, because they were arts of empire himself had taught him, having practised, not only on the Saracens, but the Hunns, to invade Persia, as he could prove by his own letters; so that he had only turned his own weapons upon him, as he was obliged to do to preserve his subjects. For a time, however, he suffered himself to be pacified, yet not without making the necessary preparations for carrying on the war whenever he thought fit; to this he was principally excited ^c by Vittiges king of the Goths, who sent an embassy on purpose to represent the formidable power of Justinian, and how much it was the interest of Chosroes, as well as himself, to see it reduced. On the heels of this came an application from the Arfacidæ, or petty princes of Armenia. They set forth abundance of grievances under which they laboured from the Roman power; they painted the methods taken by Justinian for attaining universal empire in the strongest light, and besought Chosroes to consider not so much their case as his own. This determined the Persian monarch to break the peace, and to fall upon Justinian before he was at leisure to fall upon him. The ^d

(T) This conspiracy against Chosroes was an event remarkably fortunate to him, if we consider it in a political light. It gave him an opportunity of freeing himself from all who were disaffected to him, and he used it without reserve, sparing not his own uncle, who had been in the number of the conspirators. But the most cruel of all his actions was, the putting to death this old general, who had been the faithful servant of his father, and who had subdued twelve barbarous nations, and made them tributaries to the Persians. There seems however to have been some justice in giving to his son Varrhames the government which Adergudunbades had possessed. But it is to be observed, that the Persians were extremely strict in two of their maxims, viz. in punishing treason without mercy, and in preserving governments in the hands of one family, so long as they continued faithful to their sovereigns. These customs are so opposite to ours, that of course we have an indifferent opinion of them; but if it be considered, that in the east the slightest disaffection, if disregarded, ripens presently into a general revolt, fatal alike to the person and government of the reigning prince, the reason of this conduct will be no more a secret, nor can we with any colour of justice deny, that it is full as justifiable as many of our political maxims. As to the other, it is generally supposed, that it arose thus: The Persian empire, though extremely wide in extent, being no more than an aggregate body of little principalities, some united to it for the sake of protection, and others, after long wars, by capitulations; their princes, who were formerly independent, by this means became only governors for the Persian monarchs, but hereditary governors, with most of their old prerogatives, which in case of treason, however, were forfeited; and this it was which made the children of governors so many checks upon their fathers, as appears, not only in the instance of Varrhames, but in what we have heretofore read in the conduct of Cavadēs, who by the same policy drew a nobleman to sacrifice his parent to the preservation of the family interest. We cannot pretend to justify such extraordinary transactions. All we have to do is, to account for them; and this, we hope, is effectually done (§3).

- a season of the year did not permit this resolution to be executed as soon as it was formed; but it influenced Chosroes to assemble such an army as might be able to act in the beginning of the spring, notwithstanding he was advised of the death of Vittiges, and the absolute ruin of his kingdom. Justinian being informed of the preparations made in Persia, found himself under a necessity of providing for the worst; yet not willing to have recourse immediately to arms, he wrote letters to Chosroes, wherein he described at large the bad consequences which would attend a hasty and unjust breach of the peace subsisting between them. To which letters, Chosroes being already fixed in his resolution, returned no answer; but went on with his military preparations, as openly and as vigorously, as if there had been a war declared ¹.
- b In the beginning of the spring, Chosroes, at the head of a great army, entered the Roman territories. He did not, as it was generally expected he would, fall into Mesopotamia; but, on the contrary, made the provinces of Syria and Cilicia the seat of the war. The first place of consequence which he reduced, was Sura, seated on the Euphrates, a place of great strength, rich and populous; yet Chosroes quickly mastered it, rather by fraud than force, and treated the inhabitants very indifferently, notwithstanding that he married a woman from among the prisoners taken there; for whose sake it might have been expected he would have better treated her country. From hence he moved on, using severity where any resistance provoked him, and using great clemency towards the inhabitants of such places as readily submitted, imposing however heavy contributions upon all. At length, finding no Roman army in the field, he proceeded to Antioch, and encamped in its neighbourhood, on the banks of the river Orontes. Thence he sent to acquaint the Antiochians, that, if they paid him a large sum of money, he would spare them, and retire from before their city. As it was very strong, its fortifications newly repaired, and a numerous garrison in it, the mob were so elate, that they not only rejected the Persian monarch's proposition, but also mal-treated those he sent, and threw out unmannerly and impudent speeches against Chosroes and his family. This irritated him so far, that, quite contrary to his intention, he invested the place, and, against the ordinary rules of war, and even the dictates of reason, stormed the city, before the walls were at all battered, making use of machines to raise his soldiers against them. This was a rash and desperate attempt, and, notwithstanding the presence of Chosroes, who did all that man could do to encourage his soldiers, they were beaten off with a miserable slaughter. When they returned to the charge, a worse accident happened; for the besieged, encouraged by their former success, attacked those who had the keeping of the machines, and having cut the ropes and chains which held them, precipitated them, and all who were upon them, from the top of the walls over the craggy mountains, on which they were erected, into the distant plain underneath. This proved the destruction of the city; for the dreadful noise of the rolling machines, and the horrid cries of the dying soldiers, being heard in the city, and the cause not known, the garrison caused the gates to be thrown open, supposing the walls on the other side had fallen down, and, without staying for better information, hastily riding over women and children, they abandoned the place. Those on the walls seeing this, apprehended, that the Persians had made some other attack, and thereupon quitted their post, to retire into the market-place. Chosroes did not neglect so fair an opportunity; but drawing fresh forces out of his camp, scaled the undefended walls, and, after a bloody struggle in the market-place, inflicted all the severities that could be expected from an incensed enemy on the miserable inhabitants of Antioch. Soon after this, and while the Persian army still remained at Antioch, came ambassadors from Justinian, to expostulate with Chosroes on this breach of peace, and to treat of an accommodation. The Persian monarch received them with much civility; he heard them patiently, and seemed to pay a great regard to what they said. When they had done speaking, he began to answer them with tears in his eyes; he made a more pathetic description of the miseries induced by the war, than they had done: he declared it was with the utmost reluctance he had taken arms; that he was, in a manner, compelled to it by the nobility of Persia, who could no longer see, with patience, Justinian stirring up enemies against them on every side, and encouraging his subjects to treat them, on all occasions, with outrageous contempt. He delivered all this with such a solemn sadness in his countenance, with such vehement a gestures, and with expressions so calculated to stir the passions, that the ambassadors were quite confounded, openly confessing, that the eloquence of Chosroes was more dreadful to the Romans than his arms. In the end however he began to intimate, that a considerable sum of money in hand, and an annual tribute, would send him back into Persia, and fix the peace between the empires. As the ambassadors demurred a little upon this, Chosroes, to quicken them, burnt the city of Antioch to the ground, and, not long after, concluded a peace very advantageous to himself, as well as very ignominious to the Romans. However, he did not even keep this; but burning with a mistaken desire of accumulating wealth, went on taking city after city, and raising contributions where-ever he came. He did not indeed pretend to b keep, but, on the contrary, slighted all the places he took, after he had extorted what he could from the inhabitants; but, by this means, he alarmed and terrified the Romans, raised the courage of the Persians, and filled his coffers. The last city he besieged was Dara, a place of mighty importance, and which he was very desire-ous of having in his power; but whether he intended to keep or demolished it, is uncertain. The citizens however, weighing within themselves the treatment wh ch other people had received from the Persians, and considering also the strength and advantageous situation of the place, determined to defend themselves to the utmost; in which they succeeded so well, that Chosroes, finding his troops fatigued, his forces diminished, and the season far advanced, raised the siege, and returned, loaded c with wealth, into his own territories ^k.

As he had now answered all the ends he proposed in the war, he was well enough inclined to let peace take place; to which end he endeavoured to renew the negotiations, and to establish things on the plan of the treaty he had concluded. But Justinian, by this time, had quite altered his opinion; and having recalled Belisarius, determined to make the Persians feel the weight of the Roman power, since, without it, there seemed no probability of preserving peace for any length of time (V). The seat of the war was now suddenly transferred to Colchis, much to the disadvantage of the Romans, and yet intirely through their own management. This region was at d that time inhabited by the Lazi, a rude and barbarous people; but who had notwithstanding, for a long course of years, adhered steadily to the Roman interest.
This they did merely out of choice, the Romans having never subdued them; for the princes of this country observing, that, by the situation of their dominions, they should, some time or other, be reduced either under the power of the Persian kings, or of the emperors of Constantinople, conceived it to be alike for their own and their subjects good, to demand the protection of the latter; which was readily granted

(V) The history of all these wars, treaties and disputes between the Romans and Persians, are to be found at large in Procopius, who wrote expressly on this topic, who had himself a perfect knowledge of all these transactions, and as little partiality for his countrymen, as is to be found in any Greek writer.
From thence we might indeed have taken much more than we have done; but then this part of our history would have exceeded its natural size; for it is one thing to use memoirs, and another to trans-scribe them; and therefore we have endeavoured to reduce what we have taken from Procopius within such bounds, as might suit it to this history. In this note however we shall attempt to explain some particulars in the text, which need illustration. We have followed Procopius cautiously in what he says of the dissimulation and insatiable ambition of Chosroes, and for this reason: We find in all the Greek historians, and in Procopius himself, that the Persian king pretended to be compelled to act in the manner he did, by the formidable power of Justinian, and by the attempts he had made to the prejudice of his empire, both in his own days, and in those of his father. Now, if this charge was true, either in whole, or in part, then was Chosroes more or less culpable in his conduct. But tho' Procopius, in his memoirs of the Persian war, seems generally to excuse the emperor his master; yet, in his anecdotes, he plainly confesses, that Justinian was a prince boundless in his ambition, and who acted under no very strict ties of conscience; yet, as this piece hath the air of a satire, we ought not to give full credit to it, but rather believe on the whole, that each of these princes had indifferent qualities; that there were faults on both sides, and that their subjects suffered through the restless and unquiet tempers of their governors. As to the complaints of the Armenian princes, they were, in all probability, pretty well founded; but, in order to discover this, we must remember who these princes were. In the foregoing period, we have shown how the Arfacide, after losing the Parthian empire, came to be contented with small principalities in Armenia, where they sometimes pretended to be independent, sometimes submitted to the Persians, and sometimes again chose the emperors of Constantinople for their protectors: no wonder then that they were seldom perfectly easy, or that, under so ambitious a prince as Justinian, they were anxious for those shadows of sovereignty, which they still preserved (54).

- a them, without prejudice however to their liberties; for they were neither charged with any taxes, nor obliged to admit any new magistrates as a conquered people. The emperor of the east however, on the death of any of their princes, appointed his successor, and thereby manifested a kind of superiority, rather honourable than of any great consequence. But the emperor Justinian, having thoroughly considered the importance of that district, which those people inhabited, and which, as it lay upon what is called the Black-sea, was a kind of frontier to his empire, and, at the same time, covered his metropolis; moved therefore with the apprehension of the consequences that might follow, if this nation should, at any time, prove unfaithful, he resolved to make some further provision for his security on that side. To this end
- b he recommended it to one Tzibus, whom he named a prince of the Lazi, to build a city, well fortified, and secured by a strong citadel on the shore of the Euxine sea, that it might be a check on the Lazi, if they should be at any time inclined to revolt. This commission Tzibus very faithfully executed, his countrymen assisting him to the utmost of their power, rejoicing to behold so large and fine a city built in their country at the expence of the Romans; but when they found to what end it was erected, and saw that Tzibus had received into it a Roman garison, they began to be quite of another opinion; and thus all the pains and expence employed about this city and fortrefs, turned to no other account than producing that very effect, which they were erected to prevent; for the Lazi instantly dispatched their deputies into
- c Persia, to invite Cbofroes to their assistance. This they did in the name of Gabazes, the greatest of their princes, who besought him to take under his protection a free people; whom Justinian was about to enslave. There wanted not much intreaty to induce so enterprizing a monarch to undertake an expedition so visibly for his service. He therefore closed speedily with the proposal of the deputies; and having given out, that the Hunns were about to invade the frontiers of his kingdom, he suddenly assembled a great army, with which he marched towards Iberia; but, turning short when it was least expected, he entered Colchis, through a thick, and, till then, impenetrable forest, which he caused to be cut down before him. As soon as he descended into the plain country, Gabazes met and paid his compliments to him, acknowledged him for his sovereign, and joining his army with a considerable reinforcement, they marched together towards Petra. Tzibus, with the Roman garison, made at first a gallant defence; but finding at last, that the place would be infallibly taken, they made their escape by sea, and left to the enemy not only the city and fortrefs, but also all the treasures and valuable merchandize, which had been laid up therein¹.

- WHILE Cbofroes was victorious on this side, the Roman general Belisarius assembled an army, and laid siege to Nisibis; but to little purpose, for Nabades, the Persian governor, made so firm a defence, and so many vigorous sallies, that Belisarius was, in a short time, obliged to raise the siege, and, to console himself for that misfortune, to march farther into Persia, where ravaging the country, taking some inconsiderable
- e places, and carrying off some spoil, he sent advice to Constantinople, that he had triumphed over the Persians, tho', in fact, his expedition was rather honourable than advantageous, the enemy having no army in the field. As soon as Cbofroes had intelligence of this incursion, he made all imaginable haste back again into Persia with his army, that he might, early the next year, be ready to return the Romans this favour, by an irruption into their dominions. This he accordingly performed, and having wasted a great part of the frontier country, and raised vast contributions, he at last entered Comagene, intending to march from thence into Palestine, there to sack and plunder the city of Jerusalem. And in this design, if we consider the terror and confusion of the Romans, we must allow that he had a fair prospect of success;
- f but Belisarius, having with incredible diligence, posted quite athwart the empire to the banks of the Euphrates, there unexpectedly assembled an army, which checked the progress of Cbofroes, and forced him to have recourse to his old method of negotiating, since nothing was to be got by force. Another reason concurred to drive Cbofroes home into Persia; for the pestilence, which had wasted Egypt, passing over into Asia, made such a havock in the Roman territories, that the Persian king retired hastily out of Assyria, and directed his march towards the north. At first the Romans conceived, they were intirely rid of this formidable enemy; but it quickly appeared, that their hopes were vain; for having recruited his army in the northern provinces, he began to discover his true design, which was to fall into Armenia.^a Justinian being informed of this, ordered an army to assemble on that side, and sent likewise ambassadors to endeavour, by all means, to engage Chosroes to think of peace^m.

His general
Nabades beats
under Narfes.

In the mean time Narfes being appointed general of the Roman forces, and finding the Persians not yet in the field, he determined to make himself master of Anglon, a little town, but of great strength; in which Nabades, a Persian general, had taken up his quarters, with four thousand men. Full of this conquest, he marched, against the advice of many of his officers, with the utmost diligence to reach the place. When he drew near it, he sent out parties to make prisoners; and these reporting that Nabades was retired, Narfes, reproaching his officers with timidity, pushed on to take possession of the place. The van-guard of the Roman army consisted of a body of the Heruli, lightly armed. These entering the skirts of Anglon, and perceiving the Persian troops regularly drawn up, and ready to charge them, broke, even before they were attacked, and fled. The Persians made the best use of this advantage, following them close at the heels; and charging the Roman forces vigorously, disordered them also, and soon after compelled them to a plain flight, in which numbers were slain, and more would have been slain, if the Persians had not been apprehensive of the ill consequences that might attend their pursuing them too far. With this action ended that campaign; for Chosroes, having changed his views, did not endeavour to penetrate any farther on that side; and the Romans, taught by their misfortunes, forbore also the siege of this placeⁿ.

shamefully repulsed at E-

THE next year Chosroes made his fourth expedition into the Roman territories, and, if we may credit Procopius, upon a very extraordinary account. He had, in his first expedition, besieged the city of Edeffa, and, tho' he had taken much stronger, and more considerable places, was constrained to raise that siege. This was said to be owing to the particular favour of Jesus Christ to that city, whose letter to their prince Abgarus was inscribed over the principal gate of the place. This report so irritated Chosroes, that he made this expedition, not so much against the Romans, or against Justinian, as against the God of the christians, who had been said to have driven him from Edeffa. His army was very numerous; and it is certain, that tho' he might have done many things more for his glory, and the advantage of the Persian empire, yet he chose, after ravaging the open country, to encamp in the neighbourhood of Edeffa. In that camp however, having either formed some new project, or doubting of the event of this, he sent deputies to demand of the inhabitants of Edeffa a large sum of money; which, if immediately paid him, he offered to turn his arms another way. But as what he demanded was not in their power to yield unto, Chosroes was forced to carry his first design into execution, tho' now against his will. We have, in the memoirs of Procopius, a long and circumstantial account of this siege, which was by far the warmest that any Roman city had sustained; and, after all, tho' it was not either succoured or relieved, the vigorous defence made by its citizens, so diminished the Persian army, that, as the season advanced, Chosroes lost all hopes, and was compelled, notwithstanding the boast he had made of turning Edeffa into sheep-cotes, and placing all its inhabitants in the heart of Persia, shamefully to raise the siege, and retire into his own dominions (X). Thither he was quickly followed by the Roman ambassadors,

(X) As to the miracle which was wrought at the siege of Edeffa, it makes a great figure, as well in the memoirs of Procopius, as in the writings of ecclesiastical historians. As it is a fact which very nearly concerns the Persian history, we might justly have been censured with want of exactness, had we omitted it; and therefore we chose to give it place in a note, in which we shall relate it, as we find it recorded in the history of Evagrius. There was an old report, that Christ had promised to Abgarus king of Edeffa, that that city should be inexpugnable. It is true, that no such promise appears in the letter said to have been written by Christ to Abgarus, and which is printed at large in the history of Eusebius; but, notwithstanding that, the report spread of this prophecy was believed, and some extraordinary deliverances which the city had met with, contributed to keep up its credit. To destroy this report, and thereby to wound, as he apprehended, the honour of the christian religion, Chosroes sat down before this place. When all the attempts he had made to induce the people to surrender had failed, and his forces had been repulsed in several assaults, he at length determined to enter upon a laborious and troublesome undertaking; which he did however the more patiently, because he made no question that by it he should effect his purpose. He ordered his soldiers to cut down a vast quantity of timber, with which he began to erect a mount over-against the town-walls; to which when it was become equal in height,

- a ambassadors, whom, as he had often done before, he drew into an insidious treaty; more destructive to their master than an open war °.

THINGS however did not remain long in this situation: Chosroes was too stirring a prince to indulge his neighbours with much quiet. He had discovered, that his new subjects the Lazi were become already disaffected; and, upon examining the reasons, he found cause to apprehend, that their discontents were such as could never be removed. The country they inhabited stood in need of corn, of salt, and of wine.
